MR. EDITOR: I think there is four times more valuable reading matter in THE TRUTH SEEKER than I get from any other source for the same amount of money. Three dollars a year for 832 pages, the size of THE TRUTH SEEKER, made up of extracts from all books, thoughts moulded by the greatest and best brains of humanity living in every age of the world's history, is cheap enough to all of us who hav learned to appreciate its value.

LINCOLN, CAL., Jan. 8, 284.

MR. EDITOR: Looking over the preface to the revised version of the New Testament, I found this: "We may in the last place notice one particular to which we were not expressly directed to extend our revision, namely, the titles of the books of the New Testament. These titles are no part of the original text; and the titles found in the most ancient manuscripts are of too short a form to be convenient for use. Under these circumstances we hav deemed it best to leave unchanged the titles which are given in the authorized version as printed in 1611."

Can you giv a few samples of those ancient titles to the books of the New Testament? It may be that those long "whereas's" of "Paul, an apostle of Christ Jesus," etc., are some of the titles that are "no part of the original text."

I am "jubersum." T. R. STEPHENSON.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $5 to pay for renewal of THE TRUTH SEEKER, for Geo. Gray and J. F. Bloodgood.

I think your paper is doing good; and it is quite gratifying to me to know that so many people are holding similar opinions to that of my own. I hav been an Infidel all my life. When a little boy, about seven or eight years old, I had to learn a few verses from St. Matthew when at school, and dear old Matthew was my savior, or I might hav grown up and blasphemed like millions of others. I was reading the fourth chapter about Jesus and the devil; I thought it was very foolish for Jesus to allow the devil to put him on the pinnacle of the temple, etc., and I told my mother so when I got home, and that I did not believe it. She said I was a bad, wicked boy, and that I must believe it. She told my father about it, and I expected what Paddy gave the big drum, but he only asked me a few questions, which I answered. Now the town that I was raised in was a cathedral city in England by the name of Chichester, in the county of Sussex. The spire was over three hundred feet high, with pinnacles around the base of the spire. I asked my father if he thought the devil could carry God up and put him on the pinnacle of our spire. He did not answer my question, but looked at mother and smiled, and, after a short pause, looked at me and said, "Well, boy, it don't matter much what the book says, all you've got to do is to always speak the truth, be honest, learn to work and get your living, and always keep the laws of your country, and you won't do much wrong." That instruction I never forgot, and I still think it is good for any parents to teach their children. It is what I teach my children, and they hav all been a comfort to me. They are grown up and get their own living, and they never disobey me or their mother.

I wish to say that I think I am no Liberal, for it seems to me they are composed of some of all sorts, and, so far as I can see, lots of them would deprive others of the right they claim for themselvs. Some would force others to love as they think right; some to raise as many children as they think best; some to wear clothes as they think right; some to eat what they think is right; others to drink what they think right—the latter I hav the least respect for, for I think they would, if they could, be the most despotic.

I remain yours for truth, CHICHESTER SPIRE.

THEY TOLD ME TO BURN THEM.

SALESVILLE, MONTANA, Dec. 30, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I paid for THE TRUTH SEEKER for three months, and sent it to my sister-in-law, who livs in that good old Christian state of Tennessee, and I received a letter from her, in which she says: "I don't care to hav you send me those Infidel papers; and, also, "They told me to burn them." I suppose the "they" means her brother-in-law, the Rev. David Fitzmiller, a Baptist minister, who was educated for the ministry, and has been regularly in the service of the Lord, preaching damnation to all who don't believe, since, as far as I know, he has conducted himself well. He was raised by rich, slave-holding parents, and had all the advantages that education could giv him, and here, in this enlightened day, advises his good sister to burn that which he cannot answer. I hav written my good sister a letter, and asked her to hand it to him with a request to answer if he can. And now, after this introduction to great TRUTH SEEKER family, I ask him to come up to the scratch and defend his God and his instruction to burn THE TRUTH SEEKER. The columns of this paper are open to all to discuss these great questions, and hav an audience far larger than he ever addresses, and, no doubt, far more intelligent.

The substance of my answer to my sister is as follows: It was truly Christian for them to advise you to burn those papers, for Christians hav ever burnt that which they could not answer. Since the days of Constantine they hav burnt and destroyed every thing that was against their holy religion, and burnt Infidels, too, so long as they had the power; and would now burn at the stake every Infidel in the land. John Calvin, the founder of Presbyterianism, burnt Servetus at the stake. So Protestants are no better than Catholics. The Christian religion has caused more bloodshed and slaughter than all other causes combined, and has done less good for humanity. The war of the Crusades, a war waged to rescue the holy sepulcher from the hands of the Mohammedans, caused the slaughter of millions. See the history of the holy Inquisition that dragged both old and young of both sexes and threw them into loathsome dungeons, and subjected them to the most cruel tortures that the holy fiends could invent. They believed their God would damn all unbelievers, and torture them in hell forever, and that it was perfectly Christian to giv them some in this life, and hurry them through to their final doom. Then your good Bible taught of the doctrin of witchcraft, "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to liv." That text gave them authority to burn witches, and even in our own good state of Massachusetts they tied poor women behind carts and whipped them through the streets, and even hung some. Then, again, your Bible teaches that human slavery was right. You and I were taught that the negro was made to be a slave by our parents, our teachers, and from the pulpit, too. And to deny this would hav cost us our lives any time before 1860. That cursed institution that caused us a great war, and the slaughter of a million of men; that caused us to mourn the loss of many dear ones; that merciful institution that allowed the mother to be sold and chained and carried away from even her sucking babe; that separated husband and wife. I hav seen many human beings sold on the auction-block as though they were horses or cattle. I despise any book that teaches such doctrins, and any God that orders, or any people that practice it. These good Christians said because a man or woman was black, and his hair was kinkey, God had ordained through his holy book, the Bible, that they should be slaves to their white brothers. It was Liberals that led the way to free our land of this cursed institution.

Again, dear sister, it was your holy patron saint, Paul, that placed the bane of inferiority on woman, that ordered her to be a slave to man; and the church that ordained that she should not teach or speak in public. And had you read THE TRUTH SEEKER, and not burnt it, and the noble, heart-stirring appeals made for woman's rights, you would hav seen who is woman's friend, and who is not.

Again, dear sister, look at the horrid doctrin your Bible teaches—"He that believeth not shall be damned." A merciful, loving God making millions of human beings, and then for doing just what he made them to do, sending nine out of ten to hell! Did you ever think that you were raising kindling-wood for hell—nine for hell and one for heaven? The idea that nine out of ten of our dear children are destined for hell is horrid to think of. Better by far believe as I do—that death ends all, and there will be no suffering after death.

Again, read Numbers xxxii, where God bade Gen. Moses to kill all the Midianites, except the virgins, which he saved for his priests and soldiers. Such a cruel monster every good man should despise.

Now, this letter is too long, and I must close. You may send me any Christian books or papers, and I will read them, and not burn them.

"His life is long whose work is well,
And be his station low or high,
He who the most good works can tell,
Livs longest though he soonest die."

The Water that has Passed.

Listen to the water-mill,
Through the livlong day;
How the clanking of the wheels
Wears the hours away!
Languidly the autumn wind
Stirs the greenwood leaves;
From the fields the reapers sing,
Binding up the sheaves;
And a proverb haunts my mind,
As a spell is cast:
"The mill will never grind
With the water that has passed."

Take the lesson to thyself,
Living heart and true;
Golden years are fleeting by,
Youth is passing too.
Learn to make the most of life,
Lose no happy day;
Time will never bring thee back
Chances swept away.
Leave no tender word unsaid;
Love while life shall last—
"The mill will never grind
With the water that has passed."

Work while yet the daylight shines,
Man of strength and will;
Never does the streamlet glide
Useless by the mill.
Wait not till to-morrow's sun
Beams upon the way;
All that thou canst call thine own
Lies in thy to-day.
Power, intellect, and health
May not, can not, last;
"The mill will never grind
With the water that has passed."

Oh, the wasted hours of life
That hav drifted by;
Oh, the good we might hav done,
Lost without a sigh;
Love that we might once hav saved
By a single word;
Thoughts conceived, but never penned,
Perishing unheard.
Take the proberb to thine heart;
Take! oh, hold it fast!—
"The mill will never grind
With the water that has passed."

Miss Brown's Valentine.

In a big, old-fashioned farm-house, over a hundred years old, lived Miss Betsey Brown, all alone. All the furniture and belongings of the house were old-fashioned and she herself was old-fashioned. There were straight-backed sofas, fiddle-backed chairs, rag carpets, antique desks, mahogany tables with lions' feet, three-legged stands, old arm-chairs, high-post bedsteads with calico canopies, and piled so high with feather beds that, to our modern eyes, would seem to require uncommon agility to mount which without a step-ladder. In the attic were reels, foot-wheels and spinning-wheels, quilting-frames, and looms for weaving cloth. Miss Brown knew how to use all these articles, and had earned much money spinning yarn and weaving cloth. She declared that if people had only stuck to the old way of making cloth, instead of turning to new inventions, and building "great arks of cotton mills," they would not hav so much "street yarn" to spin, nor so many lies to weave! She said there would be no occasion for so many "strikes" either, for folks would only be too glad to get work to do, and would not think of striking at it.

Miss Brown did not believe in modern improvements, and would not hav a stove in her house, but still adhered to the great old-fashioned fire-places. In the kitchen the fire-place was nine feet across, and was hung with a crane, and pot-hooks and trammels. Her cooking utensils were all the same that were used by her mother and grandmother—and great-grandmother for aught that I know. She made bread in a huge bake-kettle, with a cover and coals of fire on that. This, with the heat beneath, baked bread beautifully. She baked short-cake on a tin, and roasted meat on what was termed a "spit." She had a grid iron, upon which she broiled fish and meat. Her dishes were all brought from England, long, long years ago, and were marvels of old-style beauty. People had come from a great distance to induce her to part with some of her odd pieces of crockery, or some of the antique furniture; but she could not be prevailed upon to let anything go out of the house.

"I know I am poor," she said, "but I will not sell these things that my ancestors loved and handled—no, not if I hav to starve. It's a great idea they hav coming here dressed up in their silks and satins, and wanting to get my things away from me. They wanted the old spinning-wheel. 'What for?' says I. 'Why, we want to tie it up with blue ribbons and put it in the parlor for an ornament,' says she—that was Angeline Brackett—her father was a shoemaker, and her poor old mother used to go out washing for folks.

"'Ornament!' says I. 'You'd better learn how to use one instead of spending all your time gadding the streets.'

"'I work,' she says.

"'What do you do?' I asked.

"'Oh, I'm making the handsomest silk bed-quilt you ever saw—you havn't any pieces of silk, or ribbon, hav you, to giv me?' 'No,' says I, 'I havn't. In my time we made patchwork quilts of calico, for use, and not for ornament.' Then she called me a foolish old woman, and flounced out of the house."

Miss Brown was sitting in what she called her "fore-room," and as it was in the month of February she had a blazing fire in the fire-place. There were two brass andirons, polished till they shone like gold, and on one side of the fire-place there leaned a pair of tongs and a shovel. An old clock in the corner, that reached from floor to ceiling, ticked loud and solemnly. Miss Brown was sitting in front of the fire watching the crackling, curling flame, and thinking. She wore a brown flannel dress of her own manufacture, and was evidently in a brown study. People called her hard, and cold, and stern, but if they could hav seen her as she sat there alone that evening, and followed her thoughts, they might hav reversed their judgment. We can not judge correctly from the exterior always. Sometimes the hard lines of a hard face cover the warmest, tenderest, truest heart.

Miss Brown was thinking of the past, of her childhood, and her youth, gone long since, but still fresh in her memory. Out of seven children, she and two brothers only were left. The brothers, after the death of the parents, had secured to themselvs the greater part of the property, leaving her the old farm-house, which they did not want, and a bare pittance to keep her from starvation. They claimed that they had families and were entitled to the property. Worse than all, they neglected the sister who stood alone in the world, and seldom came to see her or showed any interest in her whatever.

"It is the way of the world, I suppose," she said to herself, "but it seems cruel." She recalled the long years that she had toiled in the kitchen and in the field, for she always had helped and worked in-doors and out. While her brothers had been placed in advantageous positions, she had been kept at home as cook, nurse, and house-girl. Nobody thought of securing place or position for her—she was only a girl. When her parents became aged and infirm, she nursed them tenderly and cared for them in their old age. Now, childless and alone, she herself was growing aged. There was no child to care for her, no one to guide her footsteps to the grave, no gentle voice to sing glad songs to her, nobody to love her. The tears came to her eyes, and dropped upon her hard, brown hands. She remembered one who had once sought her for a wife, and because she felt her duty was first to her infirm parents, he had gone away in anger. "If I had chosen differently—if I had been more selfish," she thought, "I might not now be sitting here in the firelight alone, but loving children might be prattling about the old house—grandchildren, maybe, and in their company I would not be lonely." The tears fell afresh, and she sobbed aloud.

Presently she was startled by a loud rap on the door. The old door-knocker seemed almost to shake the house.

"What in the world can that mean? No one comes here nights. Somebody must be sick, or dead. Oh dear, what new trouble is it, I wonder?" Rising, she lit a candle, and went to the door. Opening it, she saw no person, although she held the light far out until it flickered in the darkness. Looking down, she saw a small parcel on the door-step.

"Good gracious! What is this? Had I better pick it up? Maybe it's a valentine!" and she laughed at the odd idea of a valentine for her, at her age. "It is the fourteenth of the month," she added, "and anyhow, I'll see what is in the package."

Picking it up carefully, she closed the door, and went in and laid the package on the hearth before the fire. As she snapped the strings of the brown paper covering it, she said:

"I guess somebody has sent me a turkey for a valentine." And the bundle looked as if it might contain a good-sized turkey; but, as she divested it of paper after paper, and came at last to the thing itself, she stopped suddenly in her work and gazed at the object before her with wide-open eyes and mouth. "Valentine! I should think it was! What shall I do with it? Oh, what shall I do? A queer turkey, this!" She didn't take long to consider what to do, however, but caught up the little object and kissed it.

It was a chubby, rosy, little baby boy, fast asleep, dressed nicely, and wrapped in soft white flannel.

"Where did you drop from, baby? And who are you? I don't know, and you don't know, but evidently you are given to me. You are mine, baby, mine; do you hear?" And Miss Brown cuddled and kissed the babe, and held it close to her bosom, looking around, as if she feared some one would come to claim it.

The next day the neighbors heard of the wonderful valentine, and came to see it.

"What are you going to do with it, Miss Brown?" they inquired.

"Do with it? Why, I'm going to take care of it, bring it up, love it, care for it. It's mine, isn't it?"

"Why yes; it is yours, but then you are poor, and it will be quite a tax on you to bring up a child so young and tender as this," the well-meaning people said.

"I don't care—I shall keep it. 'Tis mine, my baby, and I'll work for it. It shall not starve. I never had anything like this to love before," and she kissed the dimpled face of the baby that lay in her arms, and reached up its fat little hands, as much as to say, "Love me, and I will love you."

So Betsey Brown kept the baby, and named it Valentine Brown. Her eyes grew bright, and the color came again in her cheeks, as she went about the house caring for her little Valentine. The old clock seemed to tick more cheerfully, as if it realized that a fresh young life had come to watch and wonder at its old face.

Miss Brown weaves many pretty fancies for her baby, who loves her very dearly. The two are deeply attached to each other, and there is no prouder woman on the face of the earth than Betsey Brown, when the little Valentine lisps, "Mamma! Mamma dear! My mamma dear!"

Bobby and the Ram.

When Bobby Smart was six years old, he was left to the care of his uncle James, who lived in the country. His aunt took him to his future home, and at the depot he saw his uncle for the first time.

Bobby was lonely and sad: his uncle often treated him with harshness and even cruelty. The cold winter had come on early. Bobby was the only boy about the farm, and he had to work very hard. His clothing was unfit for the winter weather, and he often suffered from the cold.

Among the duties which this poor boy had to perform was that of tending a flock of sheep. One afternoon, when there were signs of a snow-storm, he was sent to drive the flock to the barn. He started for the field, but his clothes were so thin that he was benumbed by the intense cold. He sat down on a large rock to rest himself. He felt strangely tired and cold. In a little while he began to feel drowsy. Then he thought it was so nice and comfortable that he would stay there awhile. In a very few moments he was asleep, and perhaps dreaming.

Suddenly he was aroused by a tremendous blow which sent him spinning from his perch on the rock to the ground. Looking about him, he saw an old ram near by. The creature looked as though he had been doing mischief, and Bobby was no longer at a loss to know where the blow came from; but he thought the attack was an accident, and in a short time he was again in the land of Nod.

Again the ram very rudely tumbled him over into the snow. He was now wide awake, and provoked at the attack of the beast. He began to search for a stick to chastise his enemy. The ram understood his intention, for he turned upon Bobby as if to finish the poor boy. Bobby was forced to take to his heels, and run toward home.

The ram chased him, while the rest of the flock followed after their leader. The inmates of the farm-house were surprised to see Bobby rushing toward the house as fast as his little legs would allow him. His hair was streaming in the wind, and he was very much terrified. Close upon him was the old ram, kicking up his heels in his anger. Behind him could be seen a straggling line of sheep, doing their best to keep up.

Bobby won the race, however. His uncle came out in time to turn the flock into the barn. It was a long time before Bobby would venture near the ram again.

Bobby knows now that but for the efforts of that old ram in knocking him from his seat on that bitterly cold day, he would hav been among the angels in a very short time. The sleepy feeling which overcame him would hav ended in death.

Bobby declares that the ram knew all the time what ailed him, and that he butted him from the rock on purpose. I cannot explain it, but do know that "God moves in a mysterious way his wonders to perform."—Our Little Ones.

[God may "move in a mysterious way his wonders to perform," but there is no mystery about the performances of an old ram when he is angered. The attack of the animal undoubtedly saved Bobby's life, but it is ridiculous to say that any power was urging him on but just his own mischievous, angry nature.—ED. CHILDREN'S CORNER.]

Correspondence.

HAMBURG, ERIE CO., N. Y., Jan. 31, 1884

MISS EDITOR: Seeing that you conduct the Childrens Corner so well and ably, we think Christians can no longer claim that Freethinkers are always tearing down, and never building up. It would be a good idea to hav some reports of our Sunday-schools occasionally, and also specimens of what is being taught. We Freethinkers of Hamburg think of starting a Sunday-school, and teaching science, morality, and virtue, leaving out the Bible altogether, as containing too much licentiousness in its ancient dime-novel compilation. There are, undoubtedly, many children who might be brought together on Sundays to their profit. Some parents are indifferent about their children on Sunday, while others, wishing them to keep out of bad company, send them to orthodox Sunday-schools, rather than hav them idle on the street; yet do not encourage them to learn orthodox lessons. From this class a large number of well-bred children could be brought together. A few determined workers could do a vast amount of missionary work, with a few good books and cheerful songs. We should not teach children to "fear and be just," but to be brave and just. There are thousands of noble precepts that could be taught without the aid of orthodoxy.

Yours respectfully, A. C. STOLTING.

A Psalm of Life.

SUNG IN THE YEAR OF GRACE, 1884.

Ring out, wild songs of a mad world's soul;
Ring out through the light and the gloom;
While the war-cries of Life through the ages roll,
Till their death-rattle dies in the tomb!

Ring out, mad song from the battle-plain;
Ring out through the thunder and flame;
Moan low, sad song, o'er the bed of Pain;
Moan, wail of a nation's shame!

Ring out, blithe songs of the revel's mirth;
Laugh, wine-lighted, love-glowing eyes;
Wail back, O Dirge, from the night-shadowed earth,
From the gloom of the starless skies!

Ring out, shrill laugh of the Daughter of Sin;
Burn, flush on the fevered brow;
Sigh, stifled sob in the heart within,
As it broods o'er the Then and Now!

Float, solemn song from the lips of Faith,
On the pealing organ's swell;
Ring out, O Curse, from the lips of Death,
Through the echoing glooms of Hell!

Ring, triumph-song of victorious Wrong,
Round the Altar and the Throne;
Wail on, deep voice of the stricken Throng;
Wail, voice of the Multitude's moan!

Ring, devilish laugh from the lips of Greed,
And rhyme with the ringing gold;
Drip, drip, O Blood, from the hearts that bleed,
Till the pulseless veins grow cold!

Ring, drunken howl, through the night-covered street;
Shriek, lips beflecked with foam;
Ring, curses, where Madness and Misery meet,
Echoed back from the empty home!

Ring, thunder-song of the dreadless brave,
Ring clear through the mad world's din,
Till the deepening roar of the gathering Wave,
Shall silence the discords of Sin!

Then wake, ye lays of the coming days;
Wake, Harp of the million strings:
Ring out, glad Cry, through the sun-lit sky,
Upborne on the free winds' wings:—
Lo! the Curse hath passed
From the earth at last,
And great MAN is the master of Things!

—Lara, in Secular Review.

W. H. Gantz on the Death of his Wife.

Here in the chamber of death, from which has just been borne she whom I love and for whom I weep, I sit with my two little ones; and in this chilly atmosphere of the "last sad agony" I am constrained to write the thoughts that come to me.

I must express the thanks and gratitude of my heart to the many friends who during the illness of my wife contributed so much of their time to cheer her with their presence, and who furnished her so many delicacies to appease a sensitiv taste.

Your many kind attentions lessened greatly the burden of her declining hours; your cheering words were sunshine in her waning twilight, and your smiles carried to her tired heart the forgetfulness of pain.

In return for these priceless gifts my ability can only giv, nor would your generous hearts accept more than, the fullest appreciation of a thankful heart. From her for whom I weep to-night, you had her smile and a place in the garland of her love.

Our hope is that the circling ages of the future, as they hurry through a living present and drop into memory's garner, will bring to us the freshness of that love's fair beginning, and leave to us the recollection that we are the objects about which it twines.

The insatiable iconoclast has defaced my idol, has hewn down my shrine into senseless clay, and covered the chalice of my joy with his paten of agony. For the sunshine of home I hav only the gloom of death.

The little one on my knee, as I write, and the one at my side, look into my face and ask, "Where is mamma?" As I look down through their innocent eyes into the dismantled chambers of their hearts, I see a longing that will be satisfied with but one answer. That answer must be the nearing presence of that mother. "Where" must be localized—must be made palpably clear for their childish minds. What do I answer? What can I answer? I hesitate. I falter. I say nothing. But the little one on my knee, in her baby tones, and with a cruel, though innocent, disregard of my aching heart, reminds me that silence has not answered her. With earnest determination she says, "I want mamma." Then I say, "Mamma has gone to sleep." "Where?" "Gone to rest; gone where is no aching pain, no hungering grief; gone into the light of infinit knowledge, or into the darkness of pulseless clay."

To the little ones these answers mean nothing. I would hav them mean much. My heart yearns to satisfy them. But this is all I can say. Can you say more? Are we not all children when brought face to face with death? Death! the leveler of all aspiration; "the anodyne of pain;" "the panacea of all our ills."

All the tribes of men, scattered along the banks of laughing brooks and angry rivers, along the shores of the murmuring sea and smiling lakes of all the earth, we are told, hav each had their philosophy; but in the light (?) of all their philosophies we are standing as they hav stood, dumb, before this anxious question, "Where are the dead?"

There hav, we know, been men at every point in the flooding tide of time who, possessed of more credulity or finesse than their fellows, hav essayed to answer this question for them; but the ebb of each individual ripple on the ocean of life has verified only the ignorance or hypocrisy of the answer. From the savage fetichist who rocked the cradle of mankind, through the centuries of astrolatry and polytheism, through the evolving sects of monotheism, down to the selfish Christicolist of our present civilization, all in the face of this great question, hav been and are but as the child on my knee or the one at my side. The one at my side, possessing the more voluble tongue, is enabled by it to express more readily his childish wisdom or ignorance.

So it is with those who would answer love's inquiry for the dead. Some make answer, as my baby answers, only in infant prattle they hav copied from others. Others giv, as the child at my side often givs, an answer remarkable only for its volubility and the ignorance it exposes.

To my babies' pleading question I can only answer, "Mamma is dead." But this to them is nothing. It does not bring them near enough to that mother, "whose every word was love, and every smile was joy," to satisfy the longings of their childish hearts—nor mine, nor yours.

In my efforts to soothe them, the couplets of Mary Mapes Dodge occur to me, and truth forces their utterance:

"We know not what it is, dear, this sleep so deep and still;
The folded hands, the awful calm, the cheek so pale and chill;
The lids that will not lift again, though we may call and call;
The strange white solitude of peace that settles over all.

"We know not to what other sphere the loved who leave us go;
Nor why we re left to wonder still, nor why we do not know."

Then, to explain to them what it is to die, I talk to them of life, of being, and what it is to be, and of "how sweet it is to us this life we liv and see." They comprehend this, for their young natures hav in a measure already sensed the conditions of physical being. I see in their eyes the sunshine of interest, and on their cheeks the flush of satisfaction. But the one at my side asks with eagerness, "Where does mamma liv now?" This is a knife to me. I answer only with my tears, and by drawing her close to my wounded heart. Their faces become grave and troubled. I am dumb. Where the one life is so palpably clear, the other life is gloom.

How forcibly comes the thought of Howells, "If we wake, we shall know. If we do not wake, we shall not even know we hav not wakened."

For the Christian gentlemen who hav offered me the consolations of their creed. I hav only feelings of gratitude and tenderest regard; but for their creed and its "consolations," they must pardon me, and let my candor plead that pardon, if I hav only a frigid contempt. Your creed's theology is barbarous, and its eschatology childish. The former is based on chaos, and supported by credulity. The latter is but the plagiarized and garbled ebullition of the human heart. The one is venerable stupidity; the other systematized cupidity. The cries of its victims, of woe, of destitution, are an accompaniment to every anthem of its praise. The hovel of wretchedness is shaded, but not wholly concealed, by its palatial church. In the view of its imperious clergy, the background is marred by a cringing laity, and its "hope of heaven" is dwarfed by a stultifying fear of hell.

I hav, kind friends, your hope; but for the heaven of your creed I hav no desire; and its hell to me has no terrors.

The hope of another life is grounded in our love of this life. It is the "balm in nature's mighty Gilead" for the aggrieved heart of man.

We are told "the waves of the ocean once laved the shores of a lifeless world; that in a simple protoplasmic cell-life came life—the sublime reality." But in "the mother instinct of the first mammalia" was born the infinit magnificence of that "sublime reality"—love. Since the birth of love, hope, with loving touch, fingers the keys of the future, and, to the listening human heart, givs only the symphony of joy, the cadence of rest. I love to liv; therefore I believe our "futures will be fruit of all the past."

My moiety of knowledge as to the arithmetic of the universe cannot giv mathematical proof of that "other life," and, instead of asserting what I cannot prove, I affirm only the "hope," and what nature has given all men to feel.

You would send me to the Bible for the proofs I so earnestly seek. It is but a flash of darkness on the present twilight of my search. I open it; I find a cosmic genesis that brings a smile for its peuril simplicity.

I read the "garden scene," and think: For eating an apple in violation of her express commands, she, for whom I sorrow to-night, in her most irritable moments, would scarcely box the ears of the child on my knee; yet, for such trifling offense, the Jehovah of the Jews consigns, not only the childish Adam and Eve, but unnumbered millions of their progeny, to a "hell," compared with which physical death is a thrill of joy.

The learned divines (?) hav told us the first pages of "inspiration" are allegorical, and I am urged to read further. I do so; but I must take my reason with me. With it, aided by the subtleties of your scholastic commentaries, I discover that your Christology rests upon these juvenile allegories of Genesis.

To one whose faith enables him to swallow mountains as well as move them, they may afford great consolation; but in men, taught at the feet of an altruistic Gamaliel, these fables do not fill the "aching void."

So I must respectfully lay your Bible aside. "Respectfully," for its literary value and the moral value it contains. The latter, though, form but a thread of gold in a cable of dross, dewdrops in the putrid well of Kali.

The plowshare of time is rapidly converting our hopeful future into broken past; and soon will turn the garden of our smiles and tears into the fallow of eternal rest.

Rest!—What is that rest? "A dreamless sleep?" An eternity of prattling the praise of egotism? Or shall it not rather be a refreshing, potent, reciprocal altruism?

These questions must be settled at the bar of reason, under the pleading of fact, and not by one nor any number of ethereal guesses.

Man's history is brief. A birth, a rivulet of joy, a torrent of pain, then—death. A mother's breast, a struggle, then a grave. This much we know.

The canvas of the future is spread upon the easel of human affection. It is unsullied by any Materialistic "dust" or Theistic "shadow;" and to-night, from the palette of my heart, hope guides the brush through a sketch of home—a real terrestrial genre—in lines of love and beauty. This sketch is for me. There is yet ample room upon the canvas for the sublime perhaps of every man, woman, and child in nature's universe.

I trust no one will exhibit so broad and comprehensiv a want of judgment as to take personally any word, thought, or shade of thought in the above.

My hope is that those who know me best will best understand me..

I hav written, not to wound, not for controversy. I simply write the thoughts that come to me at an hour when man must think, must feel the force of his thought.

The noble, generous, Christian hearts who gathered round me to-day—my day of trial; who would not allow a single expressed wish of mine to go ungratified; who gave me the honest commiseration of honest hearts—these must ever occupy a prominent seat in the temple of my love and esteem. W. H. GANTZ.

OF

Consumption, Constipation, Bright's Disease, Neuralgia, Rheumatism, "Colds" (Fevers), Etc.

How Sickness Originates and How to Prevent it. A Health Manual for the People. 12mo, 218 pp., extra cloth, $1.00.

The most original Health Manual published in many years, and should be in the hands of all who would either retain or regain their health. Many of the supposed chief causes of sickness are shown to be of comparatively little influence, while the real causes are pointed out and shown to be constantly operative in the daily practices that are well-nigh universal.

How to Feed the Baby,

TO MAKE HER HEALTHY AND HAPPY. With Health Hints. By C. E. PAGE, M.D. Fourth Edition, Revised and Enlarged. 12mo, paper, 50 cents; extra cloth, 75 cents.

Dr. Page has devoted much attention to the subject, both in this country and in Europe, noting the condition of children and then making careful inquiries as to the feeding, etc., and this work is a special record of experience with his own child.

HORSES:

THEIR FEED AND THEIR FEET. A Manual of Horse Hygiene, invaluable for the veteran or the novice, pointing out the causes of "Malaria," "Glanders," "Pink Eye," "Distemper," etc., and How to Prevent and Counteract them, by C. E. PAGE, M.D., with a Treatise and Notes on Shoeing by Sir George Cox and Col. M. C. Weld. 150 pages; 12mo, paper, 50 cents; extra cloth, 75 cents.

We have here in a condensed form much that is valuable on the care of horses, that has not before been published.

Will be sent by mail, post-paid, to any address on receipt of price.

D. M. BENNETT'S LAST WORK.

A TRUTH SEEKER

Around the World.

FOUR LARGE VOLUMES.

With a steel plate engraving of the author in Vol. I. and each volume illustrated with forty-seven cuts.

BY D. M. BENNETT,

Late editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, author of "A Truth Seeker in Europe," "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," "Champions of the Church," etc., etc.

Handsomely bound in red cloth, $6.50; in leather, red edges, $9.50; in morocco, gilt edges, $10.50.

Readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER know the circumstances under which this work was written. The last words penned by the great author were for the fourth volume which was nearly completed at his death, and which will now contain an account of his world-lamented death and burial. Mr. Bennett was a very patient and faithful chronicler of the habits and customs of the different peoples of the many places he visited. The every-day life of all nations is laid before the reader by one who has visited them and beheld them with his own eyes. Particular attention is paid to the progress of Freethought in the various countries he visited, and the morality of so-called pagan nations is contrasted with the morality of Christian countries, much to the detriment of the latter. The work is a

Freethinker's History of the World.

This work and "A TRUTH SEEKER IN EUROPE" should be in every Liberal's library. Besides its intrinsic worth it is a memento of one of the greatest Freethinkers the world has known—of one who ranks with Voltaire and Paine in the force and clearness of his writings.

TESTIMONIALS:

Read the following testimonials, and be convinced that our claims are correct in every particular and that your ailments can be eradicated without the aid of MEDICIN. THESE APPLIANCES ARE THE ACME OF PERFECTION:

CINCINNATI, Dec. 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: As I feel greatly indebted to you for the benefit I hav received from your treatment, and the use of your Magnetic appliances, I can say without hesitation to those afflicted as I hav been that the effect was simply marvelous. Two weeks ago I was stricken with paralysis in my right arm and could not use it at all, but after wearing a suit of your MAGNETIC CLOTHING for one week, can use it quite as well as ever. I hav also been troubled with Dyspepsia and Kidney Complaint for a number of years, from which I hav suffered intensely, and, although doctoring all the time, never found but temporary relief. Since putting on your appliances I hav experienced great benefit, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav in the past two weeks, will soon be well. I would, therefore, recommend to those suffering as I hav your Magnetic appliances as the only means of effecting a sure cure. Yours respectfully,

WM. H. CLEMMER,
No. 80 Eastern avenue.

Remember that the same appliances which will effect a cure in a case of Paralysis will at the same time eradicate CATARRH or DYSPEPSIA in the same patient. We do not, like the Old School Physician, change medicins every day until, after dosing the patient almost to death, he may possibly strike something (if he is very skilful) that brings relief for the time being.

Neuralgia of the Heart of Six Years Standing Cured in Three Weeks.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., Dec. 11, 1882.

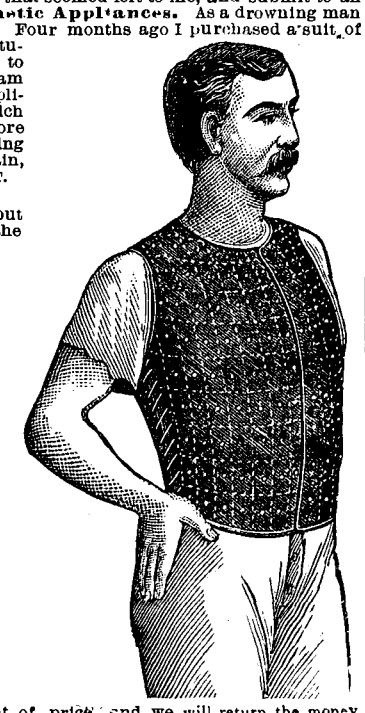
DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: After wearing one of your MAGNETIC VESTS for about three weeks, I was entirely cured of Neuralgia of the Heart and Side, which had been a source of misery to me for the last six years. I had tried numerous remedies before without benefit, but as soon as I put on the MAGNETIC VEST I got relief instantly. With unbounded gratitude, I remain

Yours respectfully,
H. A. BROWN.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been under drug treatment for eight years with nervous prostration and female weakness:

OSBORN, O., Dec. 15, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY: Your letter just received; also the Clothing on Tuesday last. Fitted perfectly. FELT BETTER FROM THE FIRST HOUR I HAD THEM ON. Am not joking, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav since Tuesday, will soon be well. Will report again soon. Respectfully yours, E. J. K.



This lady reports herself entirely cured in less than six weeks after putting on the garments, and, although in bed, unable to get out, when applied, she nevertheless was able to ride twenty miles in two days after the application. The lady's name can be had upon application at this office, by any one desiring to communicate with her.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been suffering for two years with an Ovarian Tumor, and who had been told that nothing but the knife would save her life, and the chances were as 9 to 1 against recovery. In four months' time she is perfectly well, and has not taken a dose of medicin since putting on the appliances. Consult us when your physician tells you he can do nothing for you; it will pay you.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., November 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY, Dear Sir: About two years ago my health began to fail me; I became nervous, lost all desire for food, and, in fact, began to fail rapidly, so that I became alarmed and consulted several physicians of St. Louis, at which place I was then stopping, all of whom declared that I had an Ovarian Tumor, and that the only thing that would save my life would be the knife. About six months ago I grew rapidly worse, and had about made up my mind to take the only course that seemed left to me, and submit to an operation, when my attention was called to the Eureka Magnetic Appliances. As a drowning man will catch at a straw, so did I catch at this faint hope of a cure. Four months ago I purchased a suit of your appliances. From the very first I felt invigorated, the tumor, which had extended entirely across my abdomen, began to decrease, my pains became less from day to day, until now I am as well as I ever was in my life. Since putting on the appliances I hav not taken a single dose of medicin. My bowels, which before were constipated, are now regular. I would therefore cheerfully recommend them to anyone suffering as I hav, believing that they will do all and more than you claim for them. I remain,

Gratefully yours, MRS. MARY J. STEWART.

Remember that these appliances are not worn next the skin, but over the under-garment, and, unlike all other appliances in the market, they impart no shocks and leaves no sores.

Gems of Thought.

MORE happiness is secured by maintaining a proper control of the passions, the appetites, and selfish desires than in allowing them to be the controling motiv, and in yielding to their dangerous influences. Immoderate selfishness is man's great fault. It makes him unjust to his fellow-man; it causes him to see his own advantage, his own profit, and his own pleasure, even to the detriment and injury of his fellow-beings.—D. M. Bennett.

THERE can be no doubt at all that in this world honesty is often the very worst policy. There can be no doubt that a certain flexibility and elasticity of soul and conscience may make a man get on, as concerns this world, when rigid integrity would stand in his way. Nothing would be easier than to mention striking instances in which men threw away their chance of the highest places by an act of injudicious honesty, and in which a little toadyism, a little sneakiness, a little sinking of the downright honest man, paved the way to the grandest worldly advancement, A trader who never puffs his wares as better than they really are may not drive such a business as the brazen individual who never spares the trumpet. . . . But let us do right still. Let us speak the truth and liv the truth, no matter what we may lose by it. Worldly success may, perhaps, be gained by unworthy means; but we will not hav it at the price.—Counsel and Comfort by a Country Parson.

MAN'S unhappiness, as I construe it, comes of his greatness; it is because there is an infinit in him which, with all his cunning, he cannot quite bury under the finite. Will the whole finance ministers and upholsterers and confectioners of modern Europe undertake, in joint stock company, to make one hoeblack happy? They cannot accomplish it, above an hour or two; for the shoeblack also has a soul quite other than his stomach, and would require, if you consider it, for his permanent satisfaction and satnration, simply this allotment—no more and no less: God's infinit universe altogether to himself, therein to enjoy infinitly and fill every wish as fast as it rose. Oceans of Hockheimer, a throat like that of Ophiuchus—speak not of them; to the infinit shoeblack they are as nothing. No sooner is your ocean filled than he grumbles that it might hav been of better vintage. Try him with half of a universe, of an omnipotence; he sets to quarreling with the proprietor of the other half, and declares himself the most maltreated of men. Always there is a black spot in our sunshine; it is even, as I said, the shadow of ourselvs.—Carlyle's Sartor Resartus.

> BUT human bodies are sic fools,
> For a' their colleges and schools,
> That when nae real ills perplex them,
> They mak' enow themselvs to vex them;
> And as the less they hav to sturt them,
> In like proportion, less will hurt them.
> —Burns's Twa Dogs.

BE not among wine-bibbers; among riotous eaters of flesh; for the drunkard and the glutton shall come to poverty, and drowsiness shall clothe a man with rags. Hearken unto thy father that begot thee, and despise not thy mother when she is old. Buy the truth, and sell it not; also wisdom and instruction and understanding.—Proverbs xxiii, 20–23.

ALL we need, it is said, in this advanced stage of European civilization, is an amiable ethics and an easy after-life in prospect, with no terrors apprehended. The compromise which is so pleaded for must embrace such things as these: the exclusion of "dogmas" of all sorts; a declared indifference toward "speculativ belief;" a rejection of superstitions—the devil included; yet, most of all, is demanded the rejection of that one doctrin which, more than any other article of the obsolete theology, offends our modern philosophy and outrages its sensibilities—we therefore insist upon the utter removal of the ancient belief concerning the vicarious death of Christ. On these terms a continuance may be granted to Christianity.—Isaac Taylor. [Note. Few men of the last generation exerted a wider influence on the nobler order of minds than the author of the "Natural History of Enthusiasm;" nor is his power expended. During half a century of a busy life he produced works of the highest order—works that are destined to influence the thought of unborn generations. It is curious to notice the varying fates of great men. To one who can look back sixty years or so, it can hardly fail to bring sad thoughts to reflect how many men that swayed the higher order of minds in England (and perhaps not less those of this continent) are now all but forgotten. In my young days Dr. Chalmers in Scotland and Archbishop Whately in Ireland were names of great power, and now who ever thinks of them? Jeffrey, too, of the Edinburgh Review, is no longer a name to conjure with. Even Lord Brougham has vanished out of sight, and Lord Macaulay has lost his charm. He was a brilliant essayist, but he seldom speculated on the higher problems of humanity, and, though sufficiently versatil, he had small claim to the title of "philosophic thinker." In that respect he was every way inferior to J. S. Mill, and even to the Recluse of Stamp Rivers. Isaac Taylor was through life a defender of the Christian faith, but he was no purblind bigot, and in the above description of what he called "the drift of thought," at the close of 1864, he has left us a sketch of coming events that every succeeding year has but confirmed. In his case, "the wish was not father to the thought." But he saw that the tide had turned, and that old thoughts were passing away. Smaller men may see it now, and whether they hope it or fear it, the "drift" is inevitable.—Hylax.]

Odds and Ends.

TWO boys quarreling: "My pa is a preacher an' will go to heaven." "Yes, an' my pa is a doctor an' can kill your ole pa."

A LITTLE six-year-old orphan, upon being asked to name the leading festival in the church, replied. "The strawberry festival."

"OH yes," said the indignant old lady, "he is a man who will do most anything. Why, do you know, I've seen him eat tripe."

> A GIRL is sweet,
> But oh! how bitter
> The same girl is
> When a dress don't fit her!

A GENTLEMAN who had been struck by a young lady's beauty was determined to follow the injunction and "kiss the rod that smote him."

THIS year young men who don't want to get married will wear large placards on their breasts, reading, "I never had any experience in nursing babies and don't want any."

WHAT TO DO WITH OUR GIRLS.

"Good day, gentlemen."

"Good day," said the horse reporter, looking up and discovering a young lady in the apartment.

"I would like to show you a work which I am selling," she began, "and am sure it will prove both interesting and instructiv."

"What's it about?" asked the horse reporter.

"The book," continued the fair canvasser, "is by one of our best-known writers and speakers, and is entitled, 'What Shall We Do With Our Girls?' The question is certainly one of paramount importance, and—"

"Are your girls bothering you much this season?" inquired the friend of Maud S.

"Why, no," said the young lady, blushing violently—"that is—why, of course I havn't any daughters."

"Oh, you're out on the road telling people what to do with your girls before you're even married, let alone the mother of a few visions of loveliness? Well, that's all right. Some of our best cook-books hav been written by people who didn't know a gridiron from the Fifteenth Amendment."

"But this question of what shall be done with the girls is really an important one," continued the young lady. "Hav you ever given it a thought?"

"I can't say that I hav," replied the horse reporter. "I suppose we might tie 'em up in the back yard when a circus comes to town."

"I hardly think you comprehend the question in all its bearings. What is the legitimate sphere of woman; in what field of action can she best display and make use of the God-given talents, attributes of mental force, and physical grace with which she is endowed? These are living, burning issues, and must be fairly met. When we see—"

"All right," said the horse reporter, "you can meet them if you want to. Woman's sphere, so far as I hav been able to discover, is to never hav breakfast on time. It is no doubt a somewhat limited one, but she is gradually reaching out into the great unknown, and will eventually grasp with her lily-white fingers the black demon of injustice that has so long oppressed her, and strangle in the very stronghold of its power the great wrong which for centuries has baffled her efforts at advancement along the great highway of progress."

"Why, that's lovely!" exclaimed the young lady. "You believe in lady suffrage, don't you?"

"Lady who?"

"Lady suffrage—believe that ladies should vote, and hav all the political privileges that are accorded men. That's just what this book says. That chapter is perfectly sweet. It's just lovely."

"I presume so. But how about the chapter that says women should not cramp and distort their bodies with corsets and their feet with tight shoes? The gaunt demon of unrest that lurks in the maternal bunion may, in the child of that mother, become an ever present monster of pain."

"Oh, those chapters are horrid! What the world is interested in are the nobler attributes of woman—her soul and heart."

"Yes, the soul-and-heart business is all right, but you must remember that the humble liver, working away unostentatiously, is also a pretty good scheme, and without health woman can never attain success. The deadly grasp of the steel-ribbed corset and the fatal grip of the gleaming garter are hurrying to early graves the women of our land. The beautiful eyes that should sparkle so brightly are dull and lusterless, the cheek whose whiteness should be relieved by the rosy blush of health is sallow and wan, and the fairest temple ever made is rendered a ghastly ruin by the one who should take the greatest pride in its beauty."

"And will you buy a book?" asked the young lady, "I'm sure you talk beautifully."

"No," replied the horse reporter, "I cannot buy a book, because actions speak louder than words, and I do not wish to disturb the dramatic critic who is in the next room trying to write soul without a large S."

Notes and Clippings.

An Italian correspondent, by no means particularly fond of Roman Catholicism, says that, judging from the money sent him, the pope's spiritual influence was never greater.

"Papa, is Ash Wednesday the day the cart calls for the cinders in the back yard?" asked a Long Island boy. His father smiled, and put the question by until the pastor called.

Women are coming to the fore. A jury of women tried a divorce case at Cheney, Wyoming, recently, and Mrs. Dora Barnett is a bailiff in Lewis county, Washington Territory.

A Rev. Mr. Kirkland, of Texas, is paid so poorly by his congregation that he works in a saw-mill during the week. A few who hav heard him preach wish that he would work in the saw-mill Sunday.

The scholarship of 48 young ladies in the Harvard Annex is higher than the average of the male undergraduates, but the young men's pride is soothed when the contest turns on foot-ball, base-ball, and rowing matches.

In an old church play Noah is made to swear by St. John. This is nearly as bad as a novelist making William Penn whistle a bar of "Home, Sweet Home" before he recollected that the tune had not then been composed.

The proprietor of a barroom was placed on trial in Washington Territory, under indictment for keeping a disorderly resort. Seven women were on the jury, and all were firm for conviction; but the five men stood doggedly for acquittal.

Schenectady rejoices in the possession of a mayor of great piety. His name is Young. He has recently joined the church, and patronizes the Salvation Army. He refused to permit an entertainment called "The Devil's Auction" on the ground that it is immoral. His defalcation is not yet announced.

Some years ago a little daughter of Mr. Coddington, a noted New York auctioneer, ran out of the door and saw a beautiful rainbow for the first time in her life. Standing but a moment in awestruck admiration, she rapturously called out: "Papa! papa! come here, do come here! I des that's the ribbon Dod ties his bonnet with."

Divorce is slightly on the increase in Scotland. During the ten years previous to 1874 the average number of decrees per year was thirty-five; in the subsequent five years the averaged increased to fifty-nine; during 1880 there were eighty-one divorces; in 1881 there were seventy-eight, in 1882 sixty-three, and last year seventy-five.

Rev. A. E. Higgens, formerly pastor of the First Methodist Episcopal church of this city, gave a lecture in Scard's Hall, Sunday evening, wherein he stated that his orthodox views had undergone a material change. He is no longer a man-worshiper, and believes only in one God. His new departure created a sensation. —Leavenworth (Kan.) Times.

A murderer under sentence of death at White Plains, N. Y., is selling copies of the following pious card for a few cents each: "Take comfort in the thought that God knows your sinful nature better than you know it yourself. Yours, T. Hoffman." The sheriff says that Hoffman's piety is unquestionable, but that his veracity is occasionally very much at fault.

In most of the states a belief in the existence of a supreme being is necessary to constitute a person a competent witness in a court of law. How far a witness's religious faith can be inquired into became a question recently decided by the supreme court of New Hampshire. The court said there was no error of law in a referee's refusal to allow a man to be asked on cross-examination whether the spirit of Daniel Webster was present aiding him in the trial, and whether he had been assisted by departed spirits in obtaining information. Nor would it hav been an error of law to allow those interrogatories. It was a question of fact how far the proposed inquiry could usefully go for the purpose of discovering the credit of the witness. "A man is competent to testify who believes in the existence of God," he said, "and that divine punishment either in this life or the life to come will be the consequence of perjury. No judicious tribunal is bound to inquire whether a witness be a Protestant or Romanist, Mormon, Jew, gentile, a Spiritualist or a Materialist."—Sun.

At a druggist's door, in Seville, appeared the sign, "Spirits of all kinds sold here." A joker passing by, thought it funny to go in and ask the druggist for "all you hav on hand of the malignant spirit." The druggist, without an instant's hesitation, turned to an assistant and gave the order in an imperativ tone: "Joaquin, run up to the second floor and bring down my mother-in-law. Here is somebody to buy her."

The question of vivisection came before Oxford Convocation the other day on the vote for giving effect to a grant made last June for a laboratory. The anti-vivisectionists strongly opposed the vote, and an excited debate took place, a large number of non-resident members of the university being present. The dean of Christchurch and Dr. Acland supported the scheme, and Dr. Freeman, the historian, opposed it. Eventually the motion was carried by 188 against 147.

Old Judge Ochiltree, soon after his illustrious son had got his license to practice law, went off on a few days' trip, "and Thomas," said he, "you may as well hav a neat sign of the new firm painted and hung up over the office door." When the old gentleman returned he did, indeed, see a neat sign over the office door. He examined it through his gold-rimmed spectacles, and then took off his binoculars and examined it again. The neat sign read thus: "Thomas P. Ochiltree and Father, Attorneys-at-Law.

The Montreal Witness has this story of some sadly disappointed aborigines. When the Indian lacrosse team was in England last summer a lady wrote asking the names and addresses of each redskin, as she wished to send them a little gift. The Indians expected something very material, but last week the parcel arrived by mail, and contained a number of little volumes printed in English, called, "Weighty Words from the Scriptures," being selections of texts from the New Testament. The Indians are all Roman Catholics.

As for Colonel Ingersoll, remarked Stephen Dorsey the other day during an interview, what can I not say? You hav seen it reported that his fee for defending me in the Star route cases was $100,000. It is false. Col. Ingersoll never made a charge against me for the entire two years of service. Ingersoll is a wonderful man. He is a great lawyer, great orator, and great character. The man who makes his wife happy and his children feel at home is always a great man. A character more complete was never known, and since Shakspere no greater genius.

The Prince of Wales has made a tour of the slums of London and seen squalid poverty and unmitigated misery face to face. The Boston Globe wonders what he thought of it, and whether it occurred to him that perhaps poverty is not a dispensation of divine providence, to be endured cheerfully on an empty stomach, but a symptom of disease in the social system, to be cured by wise treatment and radical change of conditions. Did this inspection of the slums suggest to the Prince of Wales that there must be something wrong in England that he should hav lived in idleness and luxury these years while other Englishmen were working and starving? Probably not. It is not likely that his education has been of the kind that helps men to see clearly and think truly. It is more likely that he was shocked to see such squalor and was really sorry that all these people were so poor and dirty and ignorant and hungry, but regarded it all as an inevitable and incurable evil, the symptoms of which could be softened to some extent by judicious charity and raising of the poor rates. And yet it is well that he should see for himself what poverty is and why men murmur at government which does not govern but grinds.

From a rough draft of Prince Bismarck's bill for insuring men against accidents and death, it appears that all the various employers will be required to establish insurance companies, and to pay the whole of the premiums on the lives and limbs of their workmen, in proportion to the wages earned by the latter, and to the danger tariff. Thus one element in the previous bill, which formed such a bone of contention, has been dropped—namely, part payment by the state of the accident assurance premiums, with which the labor-givers, or capitalists, are now to be exclusivly burdened. Should, however, any of the companies (Genossen-schaften) prove unequal to their liabilities, they may be aided and even taken over by the state.

The death of Wendell Phillips revives the following story, which was always good, and seems to grow better with each repetition: As Mr. Phillips was journeying over the New York Central, a rather pompous clergyman approached him and asked, "What is your aim in life?" To which Mr. Phillips bluntly replied, "To benefit the negro." "Why don't you go South then, and do it?" inquired the reverend gentleman. "Well, that is worth thinking about," answered Mr. Phillips, "but," continued he, "I notice you wear a rather white necktie; I would like to ask what is your aim in life?" "To save souls from hell," was the answer. "Well, then, why don't you go to hell to do it?" asked Mr. Phillips, but he received no answer. His clerical friend had gone into another car.

Moncure D. Conway writes to the San Francisco Chronicle: "The Salvation Army appears to hav found a particularly congenial soil in Australia. Howe, the famous bushranger, used to read the scriptures regularly to his robber gang and swear them in on the prayer-book. One need only refer to the Australian War Cry for evidence of the extent to which the army is recruited from the criminal classes. In this democratic country a notable sign of conversion to the army is a certain sottish egotism displayed in those whose cases most call for humility and penitence. At one of their frantic meetings a 'sister' declared: 'Once I was a vile wretch, not fit for hell; but now my elder brother, the Lord Jesus, has taken me in hand and I feel too good for heaven.' Another 'sister' remarked that she had 'knocked about with Englishmen, Frenchmen, and Chinamen,' but now she 'knocked about with no one but the Lord Jesus Christ.' There is a true larrikin ring about such expressions as these, and they can hardly fail to diffuse among the converts an impression that immorality, or even crime, is a light thing, easily washed away by 'the blood' and quite compatible with swift promotion to sainthood and paradise."

Horace Greeley's personal appearance, says a recent writer, was always a subject of remark from his boyhood. Rollin C. Mallary, a member of Congress from Vermont, who was an able champion of the American System, used to narrate a visit of his to the printing-office of a country newspaper at Poultney, Vt., his place of residence. His attention was attracted to a young compositor, who was rather awkwardly "sticking types," and who, though full grown, was evidently the youngest apprentice in the office. His legs ran a good deal more than "a feet" through his pantaloons, the sleeves of his coat scarcely reached below his elbows, his hair was very white and flaxen, and he was, on the whole, in the aggregate, taken separately and together, the greenest specimen of humanity we ever looked at, and this is saying a good deal, for "we keeps a looking-glass." "That boy," said Mr. Mallory, "will make a remarkable man; I can't hold an argument with him on Masonry or anything else connected with politics." As Mallary was considered one of the ablest men in Congress, his remark caused me some surprise; and we not only "made a note of it," but took another look at the "devil" (printer's we mean), and could not but trace in the expansiv forehead "a mind formed in nature's finest mold and wrought for immortality." It was years afterward that we became aware of the fact that that boy was Horace Greeley.

News of the Week.

Sarah Bernhardt is arranging for a tour in America.

The king of Spain has presented a stone to be inserted in the Washington monument.

Electric lights are being introduced in Norfolk, Va., which is the only city in that state so lighted.

The Democrats are to hold their next national convention for the nomination of a presidential candidate at Chicago on July 8th.

John Degnan, of Brooklyn, died last Sunday while listening to a sermon in St. John's church. The remainder of the congregation escaped uninjured.

Bishop Carr, of Dublin, Ireland, has issued a pastoral letter advising Irishmen not to emigrate, as the condition of many in this country is more deplorable than at home.

A national convention of the National Greenback Labor party, to nominate candidates for president and vice-president, has been called to meet in Indianapolis, Ind., on May 28th.

Jews of Poltava, in south Russia, who are unable to show that they possess landed property, are being expelled by the Christians from that province. Many of them are forced to cross the Austrian frontier.

It is reported that Great Britain will offer Abyssinia part of the territory taken from that country some years ago on condition that the Abyssinians liberate the Egyptian garrison in the southern part of the Soudan.

Ex-Senator Spencer is to commence an action against Attorney General Brewster for defamation of character and injury to business, placing the damages at $50,000. This is another branch of the Star route business.

Seven of the sailors who lost their lives in the Jeannette Arctic expedition were buried at Woodlawn, near this city, last Sunday. Washington's Birthday was devoted to receiving the bodies of the dead mariners with civil and military honors.

A temperance orator of Greenport, N. Y., charges that a church in that town has a drunkard for a pastor, and a rum-seller for a Sunday-school superintendent. A minister who conceived himself to hav been alluded to in the charge sues the orator for $10,000.

A Toledo judge has recently rendered the decision that marriage between negroes contracted while held as slaves is not binding on the contracting parties after emancipation, unless cohabitation continued. This decision was made in the case of a colored man charged with bigamy.

The House of Representativs of the United States recently passed resolutions of regret for the death of Herr Lasker, the German Liberal statesman, and forwarded them to the German government. Prince Bismarck has returned the resolutions, which he characterizes as a piece of impertinence on the part of Congress. His act is regarded as a direct affront to this country.

The body of Salmi Morse was found floating in the North River, this city, on the morning of the 22d ult. Disappointment over the suppression of his Passion Play, to the production of which he had devoted all his means and many years of his life, is supposed to hav led to his suicide. His right name was Solomon Moses, and he was of Hebrew extraction. His age was about 65 years.

The Rev. Mr. Snyder, of St. Louis, recently held a private conversation with the Hon. Roscoe Conkling, and then published a report of what was said. Mr. Conkling denounces the report as stupidly untrue. Snyder acknowledges that the publication of the interview was unauthorized, but claims that it was substantially correct. The dominie's questionable proceeding is creating considerable comment.

Waifs and Wanderings.

BY SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

CHAPTER XIV.

THE ENEMY'S COUNTRY.

"Give your feet a good washing," said the sergeant, "and you'll feel rested. I'll get the breakfast."

Cupples limped to a little brook that crept unwillingly along, and gave his feet a refreshing bath; though he was about half asleep all the time, and his fingers and toes seemed like the phantoms of a dream.

"Here's a jolly steak," said the sergeant, "and potatoes fried to a charm, and plenty of crackers and coffee. Pitch in."

Cupples was used to eating, and did not wait to be urged.

"Now let's take a nap," said the sergeant, after every scrap of food had been devoured. "You may kiss the cook if you want to, but you'll have to follow him into the land of dreams."

They slept until the middle of the afternoon.

"Now for dinner," said the indefatigable cook on awaking.

Soon a smoking dinner, radiant with the splendors of a prodigious appetite that no king's gold could equal gleamed upon the stony table—not of the law, but of the gospel. A good appetite with plenty to eat forms a happy coincidence. Either without the other is apt to make one skeptical of the goodness of things. A pocket without a dollar in it, and a stomach without gastric juice, are profound sources of Infidelity, upon which the most eloquent preaching has no effect.

Cupples started on his second night's journey with renewed spirits, and more faith in providence. He held out quite well. In the early morning they arrived at their destination, the rugged spur of a somewhat lengthy sweep of hills from whence could be seen a valley through which ran a branch of the Ohio. Close at the foot of it stood the residence of Col. Bolton, glistening somewhat prominently in the midst of a grove of oaks.

The castle was before them. But how should they storm it and carry off the prize? The first thing to do, of course, was to communicate with the prisoner, Amy, and put her on her guard, so that she might be ready to help in every possible way. It seemed a prodigious undertaking; but Cupples began to believe in his star, especially after eating his breakfast and taking a nap. Their base of operations was an abandoned woodman's hut. Here they put their little kit with a bit of pork, crackers, and coffee.

"Loaf 'round till evening," said the sergeant. "Here's a bunch of cigars. Make yourself at home. Don't be bashful. All mine is thine. I'll reconnoiter. I'll put on style, and pretend that I'm a deacon of a church in search of a few niggers for my cotton plantation, where they'll have a splendid chance to go to heaven at short notice."

For the first time in his life Cupples was left entirely alone in a mountain solitude. He rather enjoyed the novel experience. It was a delightful June day, and heaven and earth were flooded with variant beauty. Behind him the pine-crested summits rolled off into dark, tremendous gulfs, into which gorgeous masses of sunshine quivered like the banners of a routed army. In front the valley stretched away, dotted with white dwellings, and flecked with scattered gleams of the winding river. The afternoon rolled away with quiet pomp. The cloud-mountains and their far-sweeping purple shadows; the ample verdure flowing into a shining sea of blue, or bursting in shimmering radiance upon dim hills; the near prospect of lofty trees and broad meadows, with little valleys shrinking away from the warm sun—all the interblending sights filled Cupples with joy. Still it must be confessed that he grew lonesome when came "still evening on," and the light of a human face would have been a relief to him. He thought the stars were rather cold companions, and heartily wished for a friendly smoke and chat. The low and awful thunder of the pines vibrating in the vast silence almost frightened him. Fortunately he was sleepy, and rolling himself in his blanket was soon in the full enjoyment of a midsummer night's dream, and, like the lion-hearted Bottom, roared as gently as any nightingale.

CHAPTER XV.

THE DEVIL HIMSELF.

Squire Bolton, as his neighbors called him—Col. Jim Bolton he signed himself—sat on his broad piazza smoking as Jones came up and introduced himself as Deacon Hosea Jones, of Baton Rouge, negro trader. Bolton gave him a welcome and a cigar.

"Is business thriving?" said he.

"Oh, yes," replied the deacon. "They die off pretty rapidly nowadays; heaps of cotton, and it takes a lot of niggers to keep the market supplied."

"Good prices?"

"Fair. The trouble is they are getting into the habit of running off."

"Bad habit," said Bolton. "My niggers never run off. I never lost one. I've got a good pack of hounds, and I watch 'em."

The conversation rolled along in this way for an hour or two, with occasional flashes of silence. No new thought was introduced after the first few sentences, and so there is no need of further record.

After dinner the talk was resumed with a little more sparkle.

"How many niggers have you got?" asked Hosea.

"I don't know as I want to sell any," said Bolton, "unless I can get a spankin' price. They are all good, tough as horses, and well whipped. They won't trouble anybody. They'll work like dogs, and be thankful for the chance. Nothing like floggin', I tell you. Begin early, and keep it up. Lick a nigger all his life, and he'll do as you want him to right along. If you let up there's no knowin' what'll happen. There isn't one of my gang but I can scare with my little finger. That's the way to make 'em valuable. Deacon, I've got a baby I'd like to get rid of. I'll sell it for a fair price."

Hosea started at this proposition, and lost a bit of his churchly dignity. The sergeant stirred somewhat in the tomb of the deacon.

"What'll you take for it?" said he.

"A couple of hundred."

"Pretty high."

"Rather, but it's got the Bolton blood in it," said the squire, with a wicked gleam in his eyes. "It's worth it. It'll make a smart one, I tell you. It's already run away."

"Run away?"

"Yes; the mother and the baby. But I've caught 'em, though it was pretty tough work. They wouldn't have got off if it hadn't been for my boy Harry. He played the deuce with me."

"What, against his own flesh and blood! Dear me! He ought to study his Bible. If he was in my Sunday-school class I'd learn him what is right. Honor thy father and mother is a bootiful text."

"Ahem!" said Bolton with a dry laugh. "But you see the baby's his'n. He swears the gal's his wife. I wouldn't care about it otherwise, you know. He might do as he was a mind to; keep the gal and the baby. But to stick to it, that she—my slave, my property, is his wife—damme, what nonsense! When I swore I'd sell 'em he helped 'em away. But I've sent him packin'. He's gone to college, and he'll stay there until he learns something about the world. Those infernal romantic notions he's got from reading Shelley 'll be knocked out of him. Boys don't know how to read poetry, anyway. They think they must believe every word of it. I like Shelley. He used to be my favorite. He's quite stimulating—better than Byron on the whole. But who'd think of carrying out his silly notions of justice? Only a green boy who don't know what a rough-and-tumble world we liv in, and that love is a mere plaything, and not a rule to go by. But Harry's got the stuff in him. He'll come out right. He'll see that he can't depend upon himself and his own ideas, but must do like the rest of us. We all hav to go through it. I myself thought slavery was wrong. But I've got over it. It's good enough for me, and of course it's good enough for others."

Of course it is. What better standard is there of judging the right and wrong of things than one's own comfort? Of course Squire Bolton had the true measure. What easier way of settling the problem of the universe than to be in favor of what gives one bread and butter? With what satisfying success we can settle religion and politics on this basis. O ye reformers! haven't you learned after so many burnings and crucifyings that people will do what pleases them, and no more, though an angel from heaven should tell them to do differently? Of course Harry was wrong to believe in abstract justice and freedom. The idea of overturning an institution that gives one a comfortable home! What Atheism!

"Harry don't know that I've got the woman and baby back again," continued the philosophic parent. "He thinks they are in Canada. I'll sell the baby so that it won't bother him again. I'll keep the mother and tame her a bit."

"Let's see the baby," said Hosea, starting up and puffing his cigar vigorously in order to conceal his anger and disgust.

"I've got 'em under lock and key in my own house, and I defy the devil to get 'em," said Bolton, with a keen look at Hosea.

Hosea felt that he had the devil himself to deal with, both in ugliness and sagacity.

They went up the heavy oaken stairs to a large bed-room, before the door of which a huge negro stood on guard, with a hard, sullen look.

"That's my best nigger," said Bolton; "he's deaf and dumb and can't tell secrets, and he'll obey me like a dog. He'd throttle the girl and eat the baby if I told him to."

Hosea looked at the negro again. He did appear like an enormous brute in human form; terribly silent; walking like a cat; ready to obey. Master and slave were well fitted to each other—there the keen brain, and here the pitiless strength.

The sergeant could hardly contain himself as he looked upon Amy. She was marvelously beautiful, with a fair complexion, liquid and brilliant eyes. The lines of her crouching form were like the grace of waves. She held the baby to her bosom with convulsive grasp. Her face was the picture of utter helplessness.

"I'll sell the baby for two hundred dollars," said Bolton, "and you can take it right away. See how handsome it is. Just like her mother. She's healthy and round and full of life. Take a look at it. Heft it."

The sergeant availed himself of the offer and took the baby and examined it, and deftly slipped a little note inside of its clothes which read as follows:

"We are on the mountains ready to help you; keep watch.
"CUPPLES."

Would the mother see it?

The sergeant put the baby down and turned to the squire.

"I'll giv you a hundred and fifty for it; that's all its worth to me. Will you sell the mother?"

"Not yet. I'll make her come under first; and then I'll whistle her down the wind!" muttered the master, with a sneer on his handsome face and a wicked flash in his eye.

Alas! there is such a thing as total depravity. There is a personal devil; but he's in human flesh and blood and usually wears fine clothes. Now and then we meet him. But not often, thank God! not often. Bolton was really a "perfect devil." There was no spark of goodness in him from the crown of his head to the sole of his foot. Yet who would have thought it? He was one of the handsomest men of his day, brilliantly gifted, and highly cultivated as the world goes; but coarse and brutal in every fiber of his being.

Despite the horror he felt, the sergeant acted his part well and fairly deceived the astute colonel. A less brave man would have failed; and then Bolton would have flung him to the hounds, put his hands in his pockets, and calmly looked on.

The Bible in the Schools of Michigan.

I take this method of answering the many letters I hav received, asking information concerning the suit the Liberals of Lowell, Mich., hav started, asking for an injunction to restrain the Christian bigots from reading the Bible and practicing religious ceremonies in the public schools. Everything possible has been done to bring the matter to a trial, but we can move no faster than the rules of the courts will allow. The board of trustees called a special school meeting, and appointed a committee to transact the business of the defense. They employed Mr. Butterfield, of Grand Rapids, who has availed himself of every rule admitting of delay, finally putting in a demurrer claiming the want of jurisdiction; that it is not a proper thing to ask, and that we hav not asked for it as we should. This seems to be the regular orthodox method of barring us out from a hearing on the true merits of the case. The rights of the people are nothing whatever in comparison to the demands of the church. Right or wrong, they demand our most sacred rights as human beings and as citizens of this boasted free government, with no more right to a hearing than the African slave before the Rebellion.

The question and suit, as it now stands, will be argued at the March term of the Circuit Court, at Grand Rapids, Mich.

I would suggest to all parties having valuable hints, or information bearing on this question, to send the same to Albert J. Chapman, solicitor for the prosecution, of Detroit, Mich., or to myself, at Lowell, Mich.

I hav just been visited by one of the Almighty's providential dispensations. "Whom he loveth he chasteneth," and I hav been chastened by the avenging fires of his loving wrath. Last Saturday morning, before reaching my place of business (a photograph gallery), the heat from a red-hot stove in a jewelry store underneath set fire to the floor and ceiling, burning up not only the building I occupied, but twenty-two others adjoining.

On arriving, I found my gallery a mass of flames, with nothing saved. My loss is $1,000, with no insurance. This leaves me in a bad shape to fight the Christian bigots, especially from a financial standpoint. I hav yet my family, of wife and two boys, my home, and a small sum saved up. I hav not yet decided what I shall do. Had I the means, I would go to Chicago and start a scientific, Spiritual, and Liberal newspaper, devoted to earth and humanity, entirely free and independent of all religions and unknown gods. As I see it, Spiritualism is not fairly or truly represented or presented by any Spiritual paper now in the field, and I desire, as many others do, to see it switched back again on the main track. A paper I would edit would be a sort of primary school, urging and lifting the masses who are needy out of the old into the new, advocating all phases of reform and progress, and antagonizing all disease and error, physical, mental, and spiritual. There are antidotes for all phases of evil far better than faith and religion. All bitter personalities should be carefully excluded, especially concerning and between Spiritualists and Liberals, who are, and should be, friendly allies. I believe a paper that is more primary in its work is needed, such as I hav outlined, and I would gladly undertake the task, could I command the means. Could a stock company be formed, or some individual of means come forward willing to join in such an enterprise, an important work could be done in the gigantic struggle that is now going on to enlighten and free the race.

Perhaps God Almighty has pulled up one of the stakes that held me down in the little village of Lowell, Mich., and wishes me to engage in work elsewhere. Speaking after the manner of Christians, I hav finished my work in Lowell; hav set a Liberal ball to rolling that cannot be stopped, and am called to some other field. Will some good, wealthy, and enthusiastic, earnest Spiritualists or Liberals come forward.? I can command $2,000 and a pair of willing hands. If I do this, it must be done on a financial basis that will warrant success. Let all speak at once who feel like it, either through THE TRUTH SEEKER or to myself, by letter. I shall wait and work to this end for a reasonable time, and then, if I fail, will reembark in some central flourishing town in the photograph business. In that case I shall conclude I hav not been "called," as the orthodox preachers hav it, but that the fire was purely an expression of His undying love for me (?) and that he sigheth for more of the love that is within my soul. Will people correspond with me at once who will be interested in either of the two prospectiv phases of my future labor? E. A. CHAPMAN.

Lowell, Mich.

Some Political Reminiscences and Speculations,

WHICH INVOLVE FREETHOUGHT'S GREAT CHAMPION.

The newest candidate for the Republican presidential nomination is John M. Harlan, of Kentucky, associate justice of the supreme court of the United States. The sponsor for this latest entry in the race is Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll, the greatest of Republican orators—indeed, the greatest orator who speaks the English language. Colonel Ingersoll says he is not beating bushes for anybody, and he regards the personality of the nominee as a small matter. The president of this country is getting to be a mere figure-head; the country runs itself, and "does not need any special kind of president to pilot it." Colonel Ingersoll's fervent devotion to Mr. Blaine's cause has cooled down. His speech at the Cincinnati Republican convention of 1876, nominating Mr. Blaine for president, was the most effectiv speech of the kind ever made in this country. His change of residence from Illinois to Washington city cost Colonel Ingersoll a seat in the Chicago convention of 1880. Mr. Blaine was anxious to hav Ingersoll in the convention, as his leader, to lock horns with Senator Conkling, who was in charge of General Grant's third-term forces; but the requisit vacancy could not be secured, and the Blaine forces were deprived of their ablest leader and speaker. Many of Mr. Blaine's friends think that if Mr. Ingersoll had been in charge he would hav compassed the nomination of Mr. Blaine. Garfield was about as acceptable to Ingersoll as Blaine would hav been, for they had both been for many years on terms of intimate friendship. The marvelously eloquent and powerful speeches made by Ingersoll in the Garfield-Hancock campaign will long be remembered and admired. He almost persuaded the country that Garfield was a god incarnate, and the enthusiastic admiration which he evoked for the hero of his glowing oratory contributed mightily to Garfield's election. Mr. Blaine did not relish this deification of Garfield, delighted though he was with the latter's election, for it interfered with own ambition and purposes. He was perhaps chiefly instrumental in dissuading Garfield from tendering Ingersoll a seat in the cabinet as attorney-general. Ingersoll would hav promptly declined the honor, as he had a perfect horror of all degrees of office-holding; but until the last moment there was apparently no doubt that he would hav been given the opportunity to decline it. Mr. Blaine may hav desired to alienate him from Garfield by putting the latter in the light of an ingrate; but it is more likely that he dreaded Ingersoll's influence over Garfield as a menace to his own, and that he could "Bear, like the Turk, no brother near the throne."

By the policy which Mr. Blaine pursued at that time and subsequently, he lost in William E. Chandler his ablest manager and organizer, and in Robert G. Ingersoll his ablest advocate and public leader. The loss is irreparable to Mr. Blaine.

In expressing his desire to see General Harlan nominated for the presidency, Colonel Ingersoll says: "He has shown himself to be a fearless man of principle, and one who recognizes the forces of great truths. His attitude in the recent civil rights discussion ought to giv him a claim, unless the Republican party is ready to giv up all it fought for. If it recognizes the necessity of the hour it will promptly take a firm stand on this question of Human Rights, and make it a live issue. Senator Wilson, of Iowa, has introduced a bill on this subject, looking to the restoration of those rights of which the negro has been stripped by the recent decision. I trust the bill will be pushed and passed."

Col. Ingersoll is making a determined war on the decision of the United States supreme court that the Civil Rights act is unconstitutional. Judge Harlan dissented from the remainder of the supreme bench; hence Ingersoll's selection of him for leader of the new crusade in favor of human rights. Judge Harlan was appointed to the supreme bench by President Hayes. He had been a law-partner of Benjamin H. Bristow, secretary of the treasury under General Grant, and he was the leader of the Kentucky delegation (pledged to Bristow) in the Cincinnati convention which nominated Hayes for president. He transferred Kentucky's support from Bristow to Hayes as soon as he saw that Bristow could not be nominated. Hayes himself desired to appoint Bristow to the Supreme Bench, but he was deterred from gratifying this desire by the threat of General Grant that the bestowal of any honor upon Bristow (whom he had, on account of Bristow's course in prosecuting the chief actors in the St. Louis whisky frauds, summarily dismissed from the secretaryship of the treasury) would be construed as a declaration of war upon him (Grant) and his friends, and would be met and resented accordingly. Hayes, unlike Doorkeeper Fitzhugh, did not look upon himself as "a bigger man than old Grant;" so, instead of giving the vacant associate justiceship in the supreme court to Bristow, he gave it to Harlan. The appointment of the latter surprised the country; it was regarded as the weakest ever made to that august tribunal. Hayes, however, builded better than he knew; General Harlan has proved an able judge, in whose perfect integrity the bar and the country now hav implicit confidence. He is, socially, one of the finest and most lovable of men, and physically he is a giant. He is a noble type of Kentucky's splendid manhood. Whatever else may be said of Kentucky, it must be admitted that it produces finer-looking men than any of its sister states. Whether the whisky or the blue grass is to be credited with this physical superiority, the Ledger will not undertake to determin; it may be the combination of these Kentucky staples which givs that commonwealth so grand a crop of tall, straight, broad-shouldered, massiv sons.

It is not probable that the Republican party will draw upon its supreme bench for its presidential standard-bearer, nor that it will fight for a new amendment to the Constitution giving the negro the rights and privileges specified in the Civil Rights act; but if it did, John M. Harlan, the Kentucky Unionist, would be no unworthy leader for it, and Col. Ingersoll would further American oratory in his support by speeches which would fire the old anti-slavery sentiment of the North to a white heat. At the meeting held recently in Washington to protest against the Supreme Court decision, Ingersoll and Frederick Douglass—the greatest white and the greatest colored orator—made strong and eloquent speeches. Douglass spoke first, and then in a moment of inspiration introduced Col. Ingersoll in the following felicitous manner to an audience embracing several ministers:

"Abou Ben Adhem—may his tribe increase!
Awoke one night from a deep dream of peace,
And saw within the moonlight in his room,
Making it rich, like a lily in bloom,
An angel, writing in a book of gold;
Exceeding peace had made Ben Adhem bold;
And to the presence in the room he said,
'What writest thou?' The vision raised its head,
And, with a look made all of sweet accord,
Answered, 'The names of those who love the Lord.'
'And is mine one?' said Abou. 'Nay, not so;'
Replied the angel. Abou spoke more low,
But cheerily still, and said, 'I pray thee, then,
Write me as one who loves his fellow-men.'
The angel wrote and vanished. The next night
It came again with a great wakening light,
And showed the names whom love of God had blest;
And lo! Ben Adhem's name led all the rest."

"I hav the honor to introduce Robert G. Ingersoll."

After a thorough examination of the constitutional power of Congress, under the Thirteenth and Fourteenth Amendments, to secure equal rights everywhere to the negroes, and of other phases of the civil rights problem, Col. Ingersoll closed as follows a magnificent speech:

"It is very easy to see why colored people should hate us, but why we should hate them is beyond my comprehension. They never sold our wives. They never robbed our cradles. They never scarred our backs. They never pursued us with bloodhounds. They never branded our flesh.

"It has been said that it is hard to forgiv a man to whom we hav done a great injury. I can conceive of no other reason why we should hate the colored people. To us they are a standing reproach. Their history is our shame.

"Their virtues seem to enrage some white people—their patience to provoke, and their forgivness to insult. Turn the tables—change places—and with what fierceness, with what ferocity, with what insane and passionate intensity we would hate them!

"The colored people do not ask for revenge—they simply ask for justice. They are willing to forget the past—willing to hide their scars—anxious to bury the broken chains, and to forget the miseries and hardships, the tears and agonies of two hundred years.

"The old issues are again upon us. Is this a nation? Hav all citizens of the United States equal rights, without regard to race or color? Is it the duty of the general government to protect its citizens? Can the federal arm be palsied by the action or non-action of a state?

Another opportunity is given for the people of this country to take sides. According to my belief the supreme thing for every man to do is to be absolutely true to himself. All consequences—whether rewards or punishments, whether honor and power, or disgrace and poverty—are as dreams undreamt. I hav made my choice. I hav taken my stand. Where my brain and heart go, there I will publicly and openly walk. Doing this, is my highest conception of duty. Being allowed to do this, is liberty.

"If this is not now a free government; if citizens cannot now be protected, regardless of race or color; if the three sacred amendments hav been undermined by the supreme court, we must hav another, and if that fails, then another; and we must neither stop nor pause until the Constitution shall become a perfect shield for every right of every human being beneath our flag."—Tacoma Daily Ledger.

The Miracle.

A TALE OF THE ABBE MIRYEX AND THE SCIENTIST BRENIER.

The Abbe Miryex was born three centuries too late. Thin, with a prominent forehead and puffy eyes, he clearly had to make a continual effort to moderate the sound of his voice and restrain his gestures. He would hav done well in a convent; as a country parson he was out of place. He preached against the impiety of this generation; he threatened doubters with the lightnings of heaven, and loved to paint the fires of hell and the worm that never dies.

A nephew of the abbe, Monsieur Charles Brenier, was a product of the Normal school. At thirty-six he was professor of philosophy, and had gained a great reputation by his book, "The Nature of the Soul."

Four or five years ago, Brenier, exhausted by his labors, had a severe illness, and his medical man advised him to pass a month or two in the fresh air, beautiful scenery, and quiet life of the Pyrenees.

He determined to go to Paris, and on his road through he would visit his uncle.

The abbe loved his nephew. He had deeply loved his sister, who was some years older than himself, and who had been his "little mother." She had been pious, and made, as he phrases it, a good end. Her son he loved also; although he regarded him as a backslider, he could not help feeling some pride in the reputation he had gained. He therefore received the young professor with pleasure. In fact, the fanatic priest was, at heart, not sorry to see an enemy of the faith. He resolved to question him and see what he really had in him.

Brenier arrived, and, after recalling some reminiscences of his infancy, and shedding some tears to his sister's memory, the abbe insisted on the nephew's staying to dinner.

The dinner was plain but good. The guests were two neighboring clergymen. Until the dessert appeared the conversation was decidedly commonplace.

Suddenly the abbe rose and opened the window.

"Look at the heaven!" he exclaimed; "contemplate those millions of stars which shine there for the glory of God! The hand of the 'Creator is everywhere; in the trees that rustle in the wind, in the perfume wafted from the lilacs, in the worm that crawls beneath the sod we tread, in the moth that flutters round the lamp, in the spring that murmurs as it flows—in all things great, in all things small.'"

The two country clergymen at this period crossed themselvs.

"My dear uncle," said Brenier, "I respect your faith, but I do not wish to enter into any controversy."

"I am curious, on the other hand," replied the abbe, "to hear the views of a philosopher, a Freethinker. These gentlemen, like myself, would like to know the weapons employed against the faith."

"Science," said Brenier, "pursues her course, and seeks for the truth."

"Well, go on; we are listening."

"Do you want," said the professor, with a smile, "a course of philosophy?"

"We want your ideas on the government of the universe."

"There are two possible interpretations of the government of this world," began Brenier—"the continual intervention of God, and the immutable action of law. The priests incline to the first, because it is their function to act as go-betweens between the man who prays and the providence which acts. In pagan Rome they inspected the entrails of victims; in modern Rome they work miracles. They therefore deny the omnipotence of law; they must hav a God who can be influenced. You accuse us of excluding God from the world he has created. There is no such thing as creation."

The two country priests looked at him with a frightened air. The uncle raised his eyes to the ceiling and nervously crumbled a piece of bread.

"The word creation," continued the philosopher, "implies sudden appearance. To our views there is only a gradual appearance, a transformation, a progression, development, unchanging order. Warm-blooded animals could not exist in the atmosphere charged with carbonic acid, which covered the earth in early days. The absorption of this substance by vegetation under the action of the sun rendered their existence possible. Examin our own life from birth to death; is there any intervention of providence at the passage from infancy to youth? Nations are born and die like individuals, and worlds are born and die like nations. Nothing has been the subject or the object of any miracle."

The abbe could restrain himself no longer.

"Miserable blasphemer!" he cried, "do you not fear that God will crush you?"

"No," replied Brenier, quietly.

"You deny that he has the power to kill you?"

"I deny it absolutely. See here. I am recovering from a sickness. I may die of apoplexy, of rupture, of an aneurism, of any other sudden attack. Well, I take my chances. I defy God to kill me in the next ten minutes!"

The priests crossed themselvs again. The abbe looked at the clock and smiled.

Brenier remained calm. The abbe fixed on him a gaze like that of a magnetizer. He was invoking God to punish the impious one.

Brenier still smiled. What increased the exasperation of the abbe was that he saw in the faces of the other priests that they had not the slightest belief in any miraculous intervention.

The minutes passed slowly.

The clock went tick-tick; the tenth minute was nearly ended.

Just as the hand was on the figure Miryex seized a knife from the table, plunged it into the bosom of his nephew, and cried:

"Here is the miracle! It is not I who kill the son of my sister—it is God, who arms my hand!"

Brenier fell, bathed in his blood; his last words were:

"Miserable age, when men must do their miracles themselvs!"—From the French.

Philosophy on the Half-Shell; or, Ethics of '83.

SUICIDE.

Is suicide ever justifiable or expedient? Let us hear what that intellectual prodigy, the Christian philosopher (?), has to offer in this connection. "Man," he sagely informs us, "has no right (!) to fling back, in the face of 'Almighty God,' that life which, in his mercy and 'loving-kindness,' he has bestowed upon him." Allowing, for the moment, the possibility of "man's free agency," I beg leave to deferentially inquire of this multum in parvo of all excellence, why hav I not this right? Only that is really a gift which is offered one who is permitted to refuse it, should its acceptance appear to him as no desideratum.

I hav not accepted this gift (?) of life, except up to this present moment; hence I possess the most indubitable right to judge now, or at any future time, as to whether it is really a sinecure, and if I decide it is not, to reject it. It was forced upon me at a time when, from my very constitution, I was unable to judge of its value, and absolutely without my consent, asked or granted.

By what extravagant logic will you then, my Christian mentor, insist that my existence is a gift, and yet deny me (when I hav arrived at an age fitting me to judge if it be a blessing or a curse) to accept or reject it as my reason dictates? The injustice of your views does not require further comment, since their falsity must be as apparent to the intellectualist as is the truth of other self-evident propositions, such as "a part can never be greater than the whole." You would make of me an unquestioning, abject slave by convincing me that I am the recipient of a gift which I am obliged perforce, willy-nilly, to accept and thank your God for, even if, in my estimation, this pretended blessing be none but a curse. So much do I write for the benefit of those intellects not as yet sufficiently fledged to ride the blast of pure reason, and still clinging to the phantasma of "man's free will."

I will now address my remarks to a more expansiv order of minds, to the intellectualist and the "truth seeker," and consider the subject from the lofty vantage-ground of philosophy and reason. The only question which confronts us here is the expediency of suicide under the various conditions to which man is subjected. Let us examin them. Life is not always a blessing; for instance, to the friendless pauper, slowly wasting to the grave with some painful and hopelessly incurable malady. Few will deny this. Now, I submit to your reason as to whether this pauper shall justly be pronounced insane upon this subject of suicide, if, after a thoroughly calm and unimpassioned survey of the entire situation, he decides that true wisdom dictates a speedy and painless death at his own hands (we will say by a properly administered dose of laudanum), to the lingering horrors of a death by the slow tortures of disease. I say, unhesitatingly, that the judgment of such a man is correct; and it is a position that no juggling mountebanks, called priests, can disprove!

Unquestionably, suicide is frequently both cruel and cowardly (for instance, in the case of the father of a large and destitute family, solely dependent upon his labor for support), the act being committed for other reasons than excruciating physical agony, almost absolute certainty of approaching insanity, and, perhaps, a very few other causes. There are many causes in which a man's life is a curse to himself and friends, and a burden upon the working members of the community in which he resides. (I need not specialize cases, they will readily present themselvs from the experience of every reader). With all such unfortunate persons, suicide is the course of true wisdom, provided, always, that the evils of life be great enough to over-balance both the possibility of suicide proving ill-advised in any particular case, and the risk one runs of jumping from the "frying-pan" of this world into the possible "fire" of a next! (I do not refer, in the paragraph above, to a real fire in hell, but of the dangers attending the entering upon a possible sphere of existence of which we know nothing).

Each man and woman must calculate the above facts and possibilities to the best of their abilities, and act in accordance with the result thus reached, recollecting always that any undue haste in the deciding of so weighty a matter would be the extreme of folly.

Let us particularly reflect upon what will be the probable grief of those we leave behind (if any), for few exist, no matter how degraded, but that at least one loving heart beats the lighter for their welfare, or sinks despondent, broken perhaps, for their defeat.

Love is the one lump of unselfish leaven in the great selfish mass of humanity! Would that it were enough to sweeten the whole!

LOVE.

Love is unquestionably at once the most delightful and the most exalted emotion of which the mind of susceptible. Of the various loves, that between the sexes is indubitably the most powerful, pleasurable, and exalting. Next to this in intensity probably ranks the mother's love for her offspring. The possible degree of pleasurable exaltation to which this emotion can be developed between any two persons of opposit sex depends primarily upon the amount of affinity naturally existing, or capable of production, between the particles composing their ego's, or essences—that, in short, which religionists term the soul. (The reader is referred to my paper upon Affinity, appearing elsewhere in these essays.) I hav myself often questioned as to whether the extremely refined spiritual exaltation which accompanies sexual love in its highest form did in reality proceed entirely from the one beloved, and not from spiritual realities with which we were placed en rapport by the loved object. (By "spiritual realities" I of course mean sublimated matter.) Certain it is, although its explanation may be lack of affinity, that others commonly fail to discern in our idols those divine attributes which we unhesitatingly ascribe to them, and which, did they really exist, might satisfactorily account for our sensations. I feel reasonably certain that man cannot in this existence experience more than one "grand passion," as it is called. I also feel certain, in the same degree, that the deepest, truest love must slowly fade with the lapse of time, although instances to the contrary are claimed to exist. This is not the romantic ground to take, I am aware, but a truth seeker seeks only truth, no matter how many cherished delusions may be destroyed in the effort for its attainment.

It would seem necessary, in order to maintain a love in all its original force, that the lovers or parties to the feeling should not be separated for a very lengthy period, as by death. There would appear, however, to be some instances where the love is so intense that a lifetime of separation cannot, at most, more than dull it, and, for the credit of humanity—so corrupt and vicious in most of its attributes—let us hope that occasionally there may be found a faithful soul which, as Moore has it,

"As truly loves on to the close."

It is unquestionable that persons hav frequently died of grief for the beloved dead, as well as of separation from or impossibility of obtaining possession of their living idols.

Were existence eternal, I presume that "grand passions" would succeed one another in our hearts, as summer flirtations now do during this our comparativly brief earthly pilgrimage.

MARRIAGE.

I concur with the views of Herbert Spencer in this matter. Marriage may be fitly characterized as an honest attempt, and an honest failure, to solve the social problem.

What sight more beautiful than is a happy home? Yet for one fireside where true love reigns ten others may be found where love reigns not. Each marriage is a crime that is not born of love. That man who, for the world's base motivs, forms this bond, pollutes his soul, and that of her he weds. No priest, no rittual, can make it pure. It drags down woman to the very dust, and brands her compeer of the child of shame Yon painted thing is scarce more vile. There is a loathsome horror in the loveless kiss that makes the grave seem sweet. What floods of scalding tears are shed each night throughout the world by women who hav bartered purity for gold! Tennyson's powerful poem of "Locksley Hall" depicts, in all its hideous guise, the marriage that is void of holy love. Yet millions tread this path with breaking hearts, nor dare to rend the chains that bear them down. Let me not be misunderstood. The happy family fireside is the fairest sight on earth. But this I mean to say: you cannot buy nor sell the loftiest, holiest passion of the soul. Whene'er the married learn to loathe and hate, then is it right to part, and each new hour the unrighteous bond exists is one of added wrong. There is no power of earth or heaven that should compel continued union of unloving hearts. When love givs place to hate (or what we deemed was love in untaught youth) then does divorce become necessity and right.

'Tis a false virtue that would make divorce a crime, an ignominy, and an act of shame. They are the shameless ones who pass through life in loveless union or intriguing shame. Stripped of her purity, there is, in woman's breast, a blacker depth than aught to which the soul of man can ever sink. I know not why, but, as she is the fairest in her bloom, so, lost to virtue, she becomes a thing from which corruption's self would shrink away. It will be understood that I use the word virtue in its loftiest sense above.

VIRTUE, OR CHASTITY.

Chastity has two expressions, physical and mental. No error is more universal than to esteem the physical the only sign of virtue. The mind is ever superior to that lower manifestation of matter, the body. Millions of women to-day—Christian women too—while physically chaste, are in mind more vicious and degraded than the unfortunate creatures they let die by the wayside, lifting their furbelowed skirts in passing, lest, by a touch, they imbibe the foul contagion.

In few aspects does humanity appear more hollow and contemptible than in this. Within the velvet-cushioned pews—ay, in the very pulpit's self, flaunts cunning impudence and brazen vice. What would be crime in rags may smile in silks. Society has ordained a fallen woman an outcast, and bars her from the gilded salon as she would the wintry blast.

Hence for that wretch who, in his selfish lust, blasts purity and truth, well knowing the result to her of what he does, I feel a loathing words cannot express—at least no words of mine; let Shakspere speak:

"And put in every honest hand a whip,
To lash the rascal naked through the world."

ELLIOT PRESTON.

The Liberal Club.

At the club last Friday evening Mr. Courtlandt Palmer lectured on the father of his country, and the lessons that by Liberals might be learned from his example. All the general information, said the speaker, that we gather from the various floating legends, as to who or what this man was, is that he was first in battle, first in peace, and likewise foremost in the hearts of all his people. Was he Liberal in religion?—this the question to be answered. Not as now we understand it; still he was at most a Deist; held belief in God the father, prayed to him at Valley Forge, and on Sunday, having leisure, he sometimes attended service. Yet communion he avoided—tasted not the blood and body of the dead and risen savior. And again he signed a treaty giving Tripoli assurance this was not a Christian country. Thus far Washington was Liberal and upheld the cause of Freethought. And the lesson we may gather from his noble life and life-work; from his bearing in the battle; from his patriotic fealty, during all the Revolution; hoping most when hope seemed blasted, never knowing when defeated; standing by the flag he fought for, pushing back the crown and scepter when a great and grateful people would hav made him monarch o'er them, is that we should gather courage, meet obstructions always bravely; and though dangers cluster round us thick as leaves at Vallombrosa, we should hold high hope forever—our motto still, Nil desperandum. These the lessons we may gather from the life of George the Truthful.

Ex-Judge Schermerhorn came after, with a quaint and curious poem, which he read 'mid much excitement wakened both by its great merit as a specimen of doggerel, and the way the ex-judge read it.

Mr. Andrews, next succeeding, said, referring to the poem, with a smile upon his features, that George Washington had evils of a warlike nature round him. Mr. Palmer also had them, though in his case the affliction took the form and guise of rhythm, yet was not the less annoying. Here the audience applauded, for they too had been afflicted, and could hav a fellow feeling. Mr. Andrews's further discourse was devoted to defining the distinction that existed 'twixt the friends of retrogression, who would turn the nations backward; conservativs, who'd keep them always as we find them at the present, and progressionists who ponder on the outcome of the future, urging progress ever onward. Probably, said Mr. Andrews, Washington, to state it finely, was conservativ by nature, with a leaning toward progression.

Next the chairman, intervening, said he saw a clear resemblance, which he traced, between the speaker of the evening and the subject that was given him to talk on. Both had wealth and high position, which they sacrificed most bravely to espouse the cause of freedom—one to fight the British lion, one to war with superstition.

Lawyer Searing made an essay, rather dreary and discursiv, yet withal containing merit, and from out its wealth of meaning, and its plenitude of import, this idea is extricated: That so far as Liberalism means destruction of religion, war on Bible myths and legends, and the death of superstition, Washington was not a Liberal; he was rather Positivistic, and his doctrins were in substance those of Comte and his disciples.

Dr. Lambert, the reformer in the way of food and clothing, said though he had often listened to the speaker of the evening with a feeling of great pleasure, yet to-night he had experienced more of ecstasy than ever. He himself was not a warrior, not a Washington in that sense, but by his untiring labor, his herculean exertions, tripe had had a boom in value from four cents up to a quarter (this the price it sold per pound at); and the virtues of good oatmeal now were known throughout the cosmos. Thus a likeness was detected 'twixt the doctor and the general.

Mr. Palmer, in reviewing what was said by his reviewers, held that in his fondest dreaming he had thought not to be likened to G. Washington, the patriot, as was done by Mr. Wakeman. He was not that sort of hero, was not worthy the distinction. Now, for instance, Mr. Andrews, and the chairman, Mr. Wakeman, they had suffered for conviction. They had seen the wolf of hunger hanging round their open doorway. But with him the case was different, as his means were always ample, and the struggle for existence to his life had been a stranger. If a Washington existed, they were more like him than he was. These the lessons we may gather from the life of George the Truthful.

Catholicism vs. Education in New Mexico.

From the Manzano Gringo and Greaser.

Of all the humbug impositions that afflict our territory, none is so glaring nor so fraught with danger to the welfare and prosperity of our people as our miserable excuse for a school system. It is a disgrace to the territory, and a stigma upon the officials charged with the sacred trust. As weak and ill-digested as are the school laws, there is no pretense of carrying them into effect, and the result, in part, will be that the reproach recorded against us in the census of 1880, of having a greater percentage of illiteracy than any other state or territory in the union, will be repeated in the census of 1890.

The school law of Feburary 28, 1882, says: "That any qualified voter, who is the head of a family and the owner of real estate in this territory, shall be eligible to the office of supervisor and director of public schools," and yet the fact is notorious that most of these offices are held by Catholic priests, who, of course, hav no families, and who, for the most part, hav never even been naturalized! and what is the result? It simply and effectually defeats the intent of the law, for the very reason that the priests, having nothing to make but all to lose by educating the people, misdirect the school funds so that they are spirited away and become a source of corruption, rather than a means of educating the ignorant youth of the country. In our few so-called public schools, which are in no sense public, they waste most of the time teaching the children superstitious myths and legends, commonly called religion, burdening and weakening their young minds with "sacred" nonsense, to the neglect of that kind of education which alone lifts the people above the effects of religious ignorance, and fits them for citizens of a great republic. Moral training is right at all times, but the children need no religious education, and least of all in that religion whose handmaidens from time almost immemorial hav always been ignorance and superstition. If the church can be trusted as an educator, why is it that in those countries governed by a hierarchy, where the church is all powerful, the ignorance of the people has been the greatest, often exciting the commiseration even of so-called pagan nations? Beyond all doubt, the question of education is paramount in this territory, and neither the press nor any good citizen can neglect it without failing in the performance of an important duty. Let us enforce the school law, such as it is, and compel those charged with its execution to giv us good schools and plenty of them; to giv a strict account of all school funds the disposal of which is entrusted to them, that they may not be directed from their legitimate purpose and used to defeat the very object for which they are set apart; to giv the children a good common school education, and leave the embellishments of religion to the more mature judgment of their after years, when they can better understand the subtle pretenses of such nonsense.

We are fully conscious that, in handling the school question without gloves, and in exposing the religious dead-weights that hav hung like an incubus upon the entire system, we shall bring upon ourselves the maledictions of the church and its henchmen; but if the fearless discharge of our duty shall aid ever so little in arresting this blow at our prosperity as a people, and elevate our standing before the civilized world, we shall be well compensated for whatever odium it may bring upon us from all the enemies of our public schools.

Bruno's Work and Worth.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: As today is the anniversary (284th) of the martyrdom of this leader of our present scientific Liberal movement, I desire to say a few words upon the work for and worth to our race of that grand Freethinker and noble apostle of science, Giordano Bruno.

The Bible idea of astronomy teaches that the earth is flat, and that the sun revolves round the earth; but the gallant Bruno—following the Copernican theory—taught, in substance, that inspiration from on high was mighty poor authority in the matter, its teaching being the exact opposit of the truth.

It was a bitter dose for the Christians when science showed their Bible "truths" on astronomy to be nothing but superstitious humbugs, and the meek and godly believers in the divine word were so filled with "the spirit of the Lord" that they burnt at the stake the heroic man who was trying, even at the sacrifice of his life, to teach them the truth in this matter.

What a sublime spectacle the magnificent "Infidel" presented, as he calmly yielded his life amid the dreadful flame to save mankind from the bondage of their superstitious fears, and to lead them into the pleasant paths of science and Freethought!

Do not all Liberals owe this grand free soul a debt, which can only be paid by doing our utmost to further his noble work, and also our best endeavor to keep his memory fresh and bright?

No other proof is needed to show the dangerous and damnable character of having "a love of God in your hearts," than the Christians furnished when they burnt the intrepid Bruno, for it was because of this very love of God that they committed the horrible deed.

I shall do my best to rid the world of such revolting and crime-producing love, and earnestly hope every Liberal will do the same. Geo. N. Hill.

An Appreciativ Review.

The Problem of the Universe, and Its Scientific Solution; with Some Criticisms of Universology. By Samuel P. Putnam. Price, 20 cents.

The above essay consists mainly of criticisms on Stephen Pearl Andrews's Universology. Mr. Putnam argues in most positiv language for the unquestionable existence of the outside world; for the priority of matter to mind—mind being a result of matter—and for the knowledge of the objectivity of things as coming to us directly through perception, not at all involving reasoning. Science, says the writer, "must start with the affirmation of a strict knowledge of the objectivity of things and relations, or else it can never affirm a single thing beyond the individual ego." He, moreover, discusses the relativ merit and use of induction and deduction, and denounces all philosophy not based on science and induction. Not till science has established general truth through induction does the work of deduction begin, and achieve the greatest triumphs of the human mind in philosophy, poetry, and art. Speaking of Kant's necessary forms of thought he admits that the mind must indeed of necessity think as it does, but denies that this necessity of thought is subjectiv, and that the human mind exists independent of nature. "Man is compelled to think as he does, not simply because the mind is as it is, but because the universe is as it is." Finally, the scientific solution of the universe robs it of none of its grandeur; beauty is still beauty, and commands admiration; ethical obligations still exist. Science bases morality on usefulness, and utilitarian morals are the highest conceivable. Neither does science destroy idealism, but is itself eminently ideal, forward looking, and progressiv. We must for the present content ourselvs with this brief and incomplete outline of Mr. Putnam's admirable essay. The points made by him conform in the main with our own views, and are well worth deeper consideration and discussion; we may recur to them another time. A certain boldness and directness of style, as well as the very positiv manner of his assertions, which even his opponents must confess to be made not without sufficient reason, characterize Mr. Putnam as a man of clear convictions, the fruits of conscientious thought and study.—Radical Review.

The following letter from Lincoln's old law partner was written in regard to the "Crimes of Preachers," and sent by Mr. Herndon to the author:

"Col. M. E. Billings, My dear sir: On Thursday last I received your pamphlet entitled, 'Crimes of Preachers.' With it came another, 'Prevention of Crime, Insanity, Pauperism, Idiocy, and Disease,' and for both of which I am under obligations to you. I thank you most sincerely for them. I hav carefully studied them and am thoroughly surprised, nay, astonished, at the villainous and libelous conduct of the men of God—lecherous imps! There are some good and noble priests and preachers, but they are few and far between, like 'angels' visits.'

"The work shows conclusivly, however, that relativly in proportion to the number of the individuals of the classes, callings, or professions of our people, the priests and preachers are the most dangerous men on earth, the most ruinous and destructiv to the domestic peace and happiness of men, and the utter ruin of women!

"Not long since I was reading The Thinker, and a lady friend asked me what I was so interested in. I told her it was a copy of your list of preachers and their crimes. She said to me after looking over the list, this: 'The touch of a preacher is wittingly lacivious.'

"The pamphlet should be in every girl's, boy's, man's, and woman's hand, all over the land, in order that all people might know the certain dangers of God's teachers in and around the family circle.

"There is danger in the 'pastoral visits!' Danger, imminent danger, in giving the preacher and the priest the freedom of the hearth, home, and family circle. Beware! the touch of such is the touch of vice! This pamphlet of yours is a stinger and a scorcher! Let her who reads it run, and run quickly!

"I hope that you will continue the publication till no more preacher's crimes shall be committed in this broad land. [That will not be until either there are no more preachers, and the Christian teaching of a vicarious atonement is banished from the world.—Editor.]

"The pamphlet is eloquent in facts and logical in conclusions. The world will bless you sometime for what you hav done in this matter. I admire your grit. Use this letter just as you please, in private or in public.

"Your friend, W. H. Herndon."

Lectures and Meetings.

Master Kuzdo Gyozo, the young man whose violin playing so pleased the audience at the Paine Anniversary meeting in this city, is to hav a benefit concert at Steck Hall, 11 East 14th street, on March 1st. He will be assisted by Miss Leona Leonard and others. Admission, $1.00.

Although this week's Truth Seeker is dated March 1st, we go to press early enough to announce in advance the second of this winter's series of Parlor Heredity Meetings, to be held at Dr. Foote's residence, 120 Lexington ave., on Thursday evening, Feb. 28th. All interested in the subject are cordially invited to attend.

J. L. Andrews is doing valiant work in the West, and winning flattering estimates of his ability. Of his lecture at Fort Scott, Kan., on the 17th ult., the Evening Herald says: "The speaker is one who is well informed for his years, and we predict that when Ingersoll passes away, in years to come, the name of Andrews will be second to none in the field of Freethought."

J. E. Remsburg continues to put in full time on the rostrum. Saturday, Feb. 16th, at 8 P.M., he spoke in Leesville, O., and again the next day at 10 A.M. A carriage was in readiness, and at the close of his discourse he was taken to Bowerston, where he took a train for Scio. Here he spoke at 3 P.M. and again at 7 P.M., thus delivering four lectures within twenty-four hours. Mr. Remsburg's prices are low, but the quality of his work is high, and that is the secret of his great success.

After having largely contributed to the success of the New England Convention by his executiv ability and genial talents as a gentleman, W. S. Bell has re-entered the lecture field, and will proceed to "ring out the old, ring in the new; ring out the false, ring in the true," in his well-known sledge-hammer style. He will speak in Philadelphia to-morrow, the 2d; in New Holland, Pa., on the 4th, 5th, and 6th; at Altoona, the 7th, and Cleveland, Ohio, the 9th. Mr. Bell is a ripe scholar, a logical reasoner and interesting speaker. Let his clanging be heard the breadth and length of the land. His address is Chicago, Ill.

Of Miss Helen Gardner's lecture at Wahle's Opera House in Buffalo, N. Y., on the 10th, J. A. Cheney, of that place, writes us: "The brave and talented little heroin spoke to a large and appreciativ audience on the subject of 'Men, Women, and Gods.' Miss Gardner argues that every religion must be tested by the morality it teaches. Being unable to find any moral teachings in the Bible, but, on the contrary, finding that God's chosen prophets were thieves, libertins, murderers, and liars, she thinks women would be wiser not to soil their fingers by handling the foul thing. Miss Gardner is a brown-haired, brown-eyed little fairy, with a sweet smile and soft, pleasant voice. I think Helen a misnomer. She should hav been called Minerva. But I opine that, like her namesake of mythological fame, she will draw many an Agamemnon, Achilles, and Hector into the army ere she leaves the field. I think the outlook favorable for a successful campaign for the little lady. She has a very able manager in Mr. Edward Bloom. And there are thousands of people who hav cast the scales of superstition from their eyes and are willing to see the light if they only know where to look for it. Colonel Ingersoll should be proud of his disciple. If she is chief sinner among ten thousand, she is certainly one altogether lovely. Success attend her banner.'

It is said the devil laughs when one thief steals from another, and if that be true the eminent personage who presides over the final destinies of nine-tenths of the Christians must hav burst his suspender buttons over the thievery of the Rev. Mr. Whalen, who is thus exposed by the Christian Advocate: "At Cummington, Mass., he preached, June 17th, a sermon by Dr. Deems published in the Pulpit Treasury for May. June 10th he preached one by Dr. Armitage from the same monthly. He denied both these. A few weeks afterward a deacon selected a sermon to read in Plainfield—the church being without a pastor—but Mr. Whalen was secured, and the deacon, to his intense surprise, heard him preach the very one he had selected! Soon the Hon. James White, of Boston, heard him preach a sermon stolen from a book published in 1797. Giv him no further chance in the Christian ministry. Paul said, 'As deceivers, and yet true.' He is as true, yet a deceiver."

It is not easy to get at the meat of Matthew Arnold's teachings. That he believes in "Sweetness and Light" the world knows well, but in his works and lectures he has clothed his ideas in such richness and generosity of verbiage; he is so often accused of being in reality an Infidel, while he consorts exclusivly with Christians, that it is difficult to properly classify him. But the Rev. Joseph Pullman has put a pin through our butterfly, and under the microscope of a hair-splitting theology we are enabled to behold his beauties. "To put it in plain phrase," ruthlessly remarks the naturalist, "the chief lesson which Mr. Arnold is teaching our times is that religion is the beautiful dream of the fond heart of man; that man's hope is not in the fetich 'personal God,' but in himself; that the supposed 'revelation' called the Bible was a timely delusion, already well-nigh dissipated in our day; and that the only paradise to which man can wisely aspire is the 'sweetness and light' of cultured contentment in this life. . . . It is best that we should, to use Bacon's phrase, 'ingenuously and without fig-leaves confess' that he is the apostle of Infidelity to our times. And when we consider the charm of his style, the straightforwardness of his logic, and the elevation of his character, it is not too much to say that he is the most dangerous enemy that Christian faith has met in this generation. Mr. Arnold is thought of generally, perhaps, as a critic in literature, but it is the religious question that moves him most deeply. Few hav felt as vividly as he the vigor and beneficence and indestructibility of the religious sentiment—only, for the future, to use his own phrase, 'it must be transformed.' And Voltaire himself was not more ardent to uproot popery from France than Mr. Arnold is to revolutionize the traditional faith of all Christendom. For this work he has heard the Macedonian call, and through many volumes he prosecutes it with marvelous freshness and versatility and power. . . . Mr. Arnold is intensely ethical. His 'sweetness and light' includes the most rigorous morality. 'Religion is morality touched with emotion.' 'The Puritan middle-class, with all its faults, is still the best stuff in the nation. Some hav hated and persecuted it; many hav derided and flattered it; flattered it that, while they deride it, they might use it. I hav believed in it. It is the best stuff in the nation, and in its success is our best hope for the future. But to succeed it must be transformed.' But there is another side. A single sentence will let in the light. Good Bishop Wilson, whom he esteemed greatly, was a 'hierophant of a decayed superstition.' Mr. Arnold has a magnificent way of explaining away the scriptures. This, indeed, is common enough among the commentators, under various pretexts of figurativ language, poetry, orientalism, and what not; but Mr. Arnold is facil princeps in this style of hermeneutics, so that at the touch of his Ithuriel spear every thing objectiv and dear to the believing heart dissolves—heaven, immortality, an inspired Bible, the divine Christ, Calvary, God. . . . There is no God in Mr. Arnold's religion. It is true that he insists, against Mr. Spencer, in keeping the term. It is concrete, historic, and stands for a great truth. But his god is 'a stream of tendency by which all things fulfil the law of their being'—'an enduring power not ourselvs which makes for righteousness.' 'God is at bottom a deeply moved way of saying conduct or righteousness. Delight in the Lord is the happiness we all feel to spring from conduct.'" There may be a good deal more to Mr. Matthew Arnold than many hav thought.

More Biblical Criticism.

If any one will read the Old Testament just as he would any other book, using his common sense, there will be little mystery or confusion for him in its pages. He may not understand everything in each verse, but he will get a very clear general idea of the origin and history of the Bible. But if he goes at it with the idea that the book is a revelation by God, and that Moses, Joshua, Judges, Samuel, Isaiah, Ezra, etc., wrote the books ascribed to them, his confusion may reach to insanity.

What do history and our every-day observation teach us as to all human affairs? They prove to us that the same law of evolution prevails that does in the natural world. Thus in religion we hav, first, the God of the savage, who walks about like a human being, leading his people, fighting for or with them, a magnified man. Later, among the semi-savages, this God changes his character; he is not so often visible, he dwells afar off, he appears in dreams or visions, or is wrapped in a cloud or hidden in a sanctuary. "No man can see him and liv." "No man hath seen God at any time." He is worshiped by sacrifices of dearest objects, first of human beings, and finally of animals and treasures, which in a later stage are commuted for tithes, images are raised, and idolatry appears. As civilization advances, these altars are abolished, the God retires still farther from personal communion with his people; he claims merely obedience, love, manifested in good conduct and support of his priests. If images exist, they are no longer sacred, but symbolical. And now, later still, we hav the culmination. This God, that once walked about with his people and led them, and then withdrew and had images, altars, sacrifices of most beloved and precious things to appease his wrath, and then merely asked for love and obedience—now this God is all love, and instead of demanding sacrifices, he offers the grand atonement in his own or his son's person. This is the last point of anthropomorphism or man-god worship. So in this jumble called the Old Testament we hav a complete history of this progress. First we hav the God who appears visibly to the patriarchs—eats, sleeps, and wrestles with them. Then he becomes less familiar, converses only with Moses, is a real being, however, and very jealous lest he may be forsaken for images. "For thy God is he that goeth before thee to fight," etc. But he demands altars and sacrifices, first of human beings, then of animals. "None devoted of men shall be redeemed; but shall surely be put to death" (Lev. xxvii, 29). "Then the spirit of the Lord came upon Jephthah, and he passed over Gilead. And Jephthah vowed a vow unto the Lord and said, If thou shalt without fail deliver the children of Ammon into mine hands, then it shall be that whatsoever cometh forth of the doors of my house to meet me when I return in peace shall surely be the Lord's, and I will offer it up for a burnt offering. And Jephthah came to Mizpeh unto his house, and behold, his daughter came out to meet him, and she was his only child. And when he saw her he rent his clothes and said, Alas, my daughter! Thou hast brought me very low," etc. (Judges ix, 29). Also the sacrifice of Saul's sons in David's day, wherein David inquired of the Lord, and the Lord was entreated and stayed the sore famin (2 Sam. xxi). The offer of Isaac need not be mentioned. Later the sacrifices of their children was expressly forbidden, but we hav in all the books of the Pentateuch almost incessant references to burnt offerings. But we see in Isaiah and Jeremiah the dawn of another system. The God no longer asks for offerings, oblations, etc. "Ho! every one that thirsteth! Come ye to the waters, and he that hath no money, come ye; buy and eat" (Isaiah, lv). This is a noble chapter, a glorious poem, brimful and running over with the highest sentiment of the later time. "For I spake not to your fathers, nor commanded them on the day that I brought them out of Egypt concerning burnt offerings or sacrifices: but this thing I commanded, saying, Obey my voice" (Jeremiah vii, 22). What God is this? Surely not the God of Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, Deuteronomy. The next step is for the God to sacrifice himself out of his great compassion. How he pleads with his people! He is no longer the angry God who must be surrounded by strong bulwarks, lest he break through them and come down (see Ex. xix) upon the people and destroy them even like a wild beast. No! He becomes all love. "God is Love." Instead of the Abrahams and Jephthahs offering their children, their only children as burnt offerings to this God, the case is totally reversed and he, the God, offers his "only begotten," "his beloved, in whom he is well pleased," as a sacrifice to the Abrahams and Jephthahs and others. Just see the wonderful but natural order of development here. And, moreover, you see it in all the religions that hav ever existed long enough to permit this order to take its course. Religions of races world-wide apart hav followed the same inevitable law. Buddhism emanates from Brahmanism, just as Christianity evolves from Jewry.

How then account for these wonderful contradictions found in the books? In just this way: All the thousand and one traditions or written laws and statutes and judgments and records of customs among a people during many centuries hav been compiled by different writers, corrected, amended and added to, or taken from, by others at various times. Bear in mind that books were very scarce and costly, all written on parchment or leather, even the whole nation, at times, having but one copy of the so-called books of Moses as public property. Moreover, during long ages, whatever was written was done in a language utterly lost as vernacular, and so imperfect that it had never one letter for the vowels and one or two other letters. For example, "deber" means plague; "dabar" means word; "hammateh" means staff; "hammiteh" is bed. In the record the words would stand d b r; h m t t; who knew what it meant? None but those whose business it was to know or who had learned it. As a spoken language it was utterly lost; as a written language it never had existence, fully. Any writing was a puzzle or mystery, which only he who had the key could interpret. Strange as this statement may sound now to most, yet it is literally and exactly true. Obscure and rare as these holy writings were, yet there were long periods of time when there were none in existence, so far as known. 2 Kings, xxii, informs us that the book of the law of the Lord was found in the temple during Josiah's day, 624 B.C., or 800 years after Moses's time. 2 Chron., xxxiv, tells the same story. Josiah was perfectly astounded when the book was read. For ages no one seems to hav heard or known anything of the contents of this book of Moses. The favorit names of the patriarchs seem to hav been unknown to the Jews from Joshua's time to Josiah's. Many customs and ordinances prescribed by the Pentateuch were never known or practiced by Jews till Ezra's time. Nehemiah, viii, 14–17: "They found written in the law of Moses that the Jews should dwell in booths in the feast of the seventh month—and they made booths and sat under them, for since the days of Joshua, son of Nun, unto that day had not the children of Israel done so."

When this book was found in Josiah's time it is extremely improbable that any person could hav read it. Yet there seems from the account to hav been no difficulty in that respect. It was read right off. The probabilities are that if anything at all was in the roll more than the short chapter of cursings and ten commandments, it was gotten up for the occasion. A great reform was begun by Josiah before this, and no doubt there was collusion in the affair. There is a singular little episode, confirmatory of this, in 1 Kings xiii, which reminds one of chapter xlv of Isaiah, about Cyrus (also Isaiah, last verse of chapter xliv), a prediction that is very flattering to the earthly monarch. This in 1 Kings is clearly the prototype of the other, and we see all through the Bible how later writers or emendationists copy after earlier ones. It says that "a man of God out of Judah came by word of the Lord unto Bethel, and as Jeroboam stood by the altar to burn incense he cried out against the altar and in the word of the Lord said, O altar! altar! Thus saith the Lord: Behold, a child shall be born unto the house of David, Josiah by name; and upon thee shall he offer the priests that burn incense upon thee; and men's bones shall be burnt upon thee. And he gave a sign the same day——" etc. Three hundred and some years later "the child was born, Josiah by name." During his reign, when all was idolatry, and no living man knew the law of the Lord, or had ever seen it, lo and behold, and it came to pass that a priest, Hilkiah, hands a little roll to a scribe, one Shaphan by name, and said, "I hav found the book of the law in the house of the Lord;" and Shaphan read it and carried it to the king, Josiah by name, who was perfectly astounded and alarmed. Josiah thereupon began the great reformation we hav referred to. Now comes the literal fulfilment of the man of God's prophecy. Not only was "the child born and his name Josiah," but in his reformatory progress, while hewing down groves, "God's first temples," now so odious, and destroying altars, he comes upon this very altar (2 Kings, xxiii, 20). "And he sacrificed all the priests of the high places that were there, upon the altars, and burned the men's bones upon them," etc.; and in verse 16 the prophecy and fulfilment are mentioned—only our Bible-fingerers who divided the book into books and chapters and wrote their own headings to the chapters and put there references to things far from the minds of the writers. As to Christ, his kingdom, church, Holy Ghost, etc., these same cunning rogues hav followed the examamples and customs of Jew priests of old, and made their own little glosses and changes to suit. Instead of the word "sacrificed" in verse 20 they use "slew," and retired the true word to the margin, and for "their bones" they wrote "men's bones." Why? Because it is too shocking nowadays to think that "good King Josiah," who walked in the ways of the Lord, at such a late day offered burnt offerings to his God. Moreover, it might cause even a dullard to wonder and lose faith when he learned that the only people ever "divinely governed by a God" actually offered horrid human sacrifices by his direct command. None of them has the honesty of good old commentator Poole, who comes right out and says, "What of it? God had a right to use his own as he pleased"—or words to that effect. The Bible is a simple, honest, artless work so far as its own pretensions or claims go. Nowhere does it say it is the word of God. Read critically, without prejudice, it is perhaps the most interesting and useful relic any people hav left us of days two thousand years ago, and of traditions more ancient. Our English King James's version is a noble literary monument. Its wisdom is the gathered lore of ages, and its poetry above all praise. It is, upon the whole, an immense work, and he who denounces it takes upon himself a very big contract. With the original composition of its finest passages the greatest of intellects hav had to do. The thirty-eighth chapter of Job no living mind can excel.

Moreover this, "Behold, a child shall be born and his name called Josiah," lets a little light again on, "Behold, a child shall be born, and his name called Emmanuel" of Isaiah, said to hav been uttered later, to comfort Ahaz and assure him of safety against the attacks of two kings, so that, seeing the prophecy fulfilled, he might turn to the Lord—a matter that has been by the very same policy of priestcraft that originated these prophecies perverted to apply to Jesus Christ, born many hundred years later. The same spirit that pretended to find an old prophecy applicable to Josiah and presented it to that king, and pretended that a like old screed existed as to Cyrus, and brought it before him and concocted the story about the sudden miraculous conception of Emanuel by the prophetess from the "going in unto her" of Isaiah; that same cunning has in late days applied the forecast to Christ and has deceived some of the best educated minds of our age. No wonder men like Josiah and Cyrus were deceived. We may be sure that the very same disposition to apply and misapply, to alter, amend, gloss over, withdraw, and add to passages of scripture that we see to-day was at work thousands of years on traditions, little rolls of manuscript, and various portions of the books collected and presented to us as the Bible. We know positivly that a very great amount of such work has been done in comparativly modern times. W. Robertson Smith, of Aberdeen, Scotland, whose lectures entitled, "The Old Testament in the Jewish Church," were such a triumph "over the enemies of biblical science in Scotland," and attracted such attention, and show him to be one of the profoundest students of the Old Testament that ever wrote, besides being one of the fairest of critics, makes statements that will open the sleepy eyes of Bible idolaters and those who talk of the original Hebrew of the New Testament, which is, he says, "as unlike the Old Testament Hebrew as German is to English. The Jews called it Hebrew, just as the Constantinople Jews today call their Spanish jargon Hebrew." He also shows that this Old Testament puzzle was never written out, and that the marks for vowels, etc., were invented very late, for they did not exist in Jerome's day, A.D. 400. The old books he describes, the old bits of parchment, tracts, oral traditions, etc., as the original Bible are no more like our Bible than anything we can conceive of. "But the care of these writings and traditions was the exclusiv business of a large class of the people called scribes," you will say. True—and who was the first scribe? "Ezra," says Professor Smith. "He was the father of the scribes." If this be true, any mention of scribes earlier than his day is proof that the writing that mentions it was made after Ezra, just as the saying in chapters xvii, xviii, and xix, and in the very last verse of Judges, about there being no king in those days over Israel, proves the book was written after kings were established, and just as the genealogy of the sons of Zerubbabel in Ezra proves Ezra was written long after the said Ezra lived (his mention of Darius the Persian—D. Codomanus proves it was written at least as late as Alexander the Great's day).

Professor Smith, though a churchman and teacher in one of Scotland's greatest institutes, expresses the only view such a deep Bible student as himself must hav. Freethinkers ought to read those lectures, which I see are published by Munro, No. 1012. Heretofore some critics hav gone through the Bible as though with a lamp-light, scanning and picking here and there. This man blazes upon it like a sun, illuminating the whole at one view. His few lectures are the result of enormous study by one who went to the work supplied by nature and art with all appliances and means.

An article in THE TRUTH SEEKER last winter—"An Old Controversy Revived"—stated that the Old Testament as originally written was a mystery known to but few, because of the lack of vowels, etc.; and that the old controversy was whether God gave the secret of the vowel signs to Moses at Mt. Sinai, or inspired them into Ezra, or they were invented by wicked, godless Jews of Tiberias. Professor Smith shows that not only was the Pentateuch not written by Moses, but that none of the books were written by those to whom they are ascribed; even Ezra and Nehemiah were written long after the age of these persons. This will surprise most, if not all, of those who hav not made the holy scriptures of the Jews a subject of profound study. Small portions of what we now find in the book existed in the condition of oral traditions, psalms, hymns, poetry. He asks, "How, then, did this revelation, which is essentially living speech, pass into the form of a written word such as we hav in the Old Testament?" We answer (as the prophets themselvs would do), "Books are not the foundation of sound knowledge." The ideal of instruction is oral teaching—the true shrine of truths that are eternal is the heart of the faithful disciple.

"The written roll supplies the place of the faithful disciple. This (theory of the case) comes out clearly in the books of prophecy. The prophets write what the contemporaries refuse to hear." Elisha was a prophet; so was Elijah and others. Yet they did not write. Why? Because their words bore immediate fruit. But when the people forbade the prophets to speak, they began perforce to write. [See Is. xxx, 8–11; Jer. xxxvi, and many other places.] So much for prophecy. Very little of that which comes under the title of Isaiah was ever written by him. The same of the others." As to the Pentateuch, Professor Smith says that before the exile Israel did not know it. As to its ceremonial, ritual, etc., it was unknown to even Samuel, David, Solomon, and others. The book found in Josiah's day did not contain the Levitical system (as in the days of Solomon, "There was nothing in the ark save the covenant made at Horeb"). It was not the Pentateuch. From Joshua to Ezra is just one thousand years. Where was this Pentateuch all this time, if it was unknown to all those whose duty it was to be familiar with it?

"No thinking man can be asked to accept this Pentateuch as the literal work of Moses without some evidence," says Professor Smith, whom I quote literally on this. "But evidence a thousand years after date is none at all, when the intervening space bears unanimous witness in a different sense." "It is useless to appeal to inspiration for help, for all sound apologetics admit that the proof that a book is credible must precede belief that it is inspired."

How, then, came all this mass of ceremonial and ritual, with narrativ, etc., to be called "Law of Moses?" We may suppose that the Ten Commandments were given by the first law-giver of the nation, engraved on tables possibly, and that statutes, ordinances, and judgments developed as they must under any system and would naturally bear the name of the original promulgator and founder of the nation. This, among primitiv people, would be the case with any teaching or instruction delivered orally and thus kept.

"Is it possible," asks the professor, "that Jehovah laid down in the wilderness, with sanctions the most solemn and a precision that admits of no exception, an order and ritual which had no part in Israel's history for well nigh a thousand years?" He shows that there are several codes of law delivered in the books belonging to different times and conditions.

But this article is now very long. To quote further would be improper. Coming from the source it does, the work of Professor Smith is doubly interesting.

HOLT.

Open Letter to an Ex-Catholic.

FRIEND JAMES: I hav received Rev. L. A. Lambert's "Notes on Ingersoll;" and the said reverend may be "good, genial, intellectual, and bright." I think he has utterly failed to meet the arguments of the "bold blasphemer," or to "prick the bubble of Infidelity until there is nothing more to argue," though it is claimed for him by his indorsers that he has done these things.

Now, I am no scholar or critic, but I think I hav common sense, and the ability to understand the difference between sophistry and truth, and argument and assertion, and I pronounce this volume of "Notes" to be mostly made up of false sayings, and sophistical attempts at making white black and blue green. Even in the introduction I find the false statement that "man's life is a tragedy—his first utterance is a cry of pain, his last the groan of death." Now, take man as a whole, his life is happy and prosperous. There is ten times more of joy than sorrow, of hope than fear, of peace than war, and of good than evil; tragedies and comedies are mixed in, of course, and most of us hav a few of each, and some here and there find more of shadow than sunshine. But, as a whole, man's life is far from a tragedy. And now, as to his "first utterance," who shall say if it be a cry of pain, or a more involuntary exclamation, caused by the good change it is undergoing in becoming a breathing, sensitiv, thinking being? Now, you can remember the experience of the first cry, but since it is only natural to be born, in all reason it should be pleasurable rather than painful, even as all natural experiences are apt to be. But we do know, from thousands of testimonies, that man's last utterance is not a groan of death. I mean this of man as a whole. Now and then, one out of the millions who die do die with a groan, but it is a very rare occurrence.

The universal testimony of physicians, as well as of the dying themselvs, is that death is comparativly painless, and perhaps the majority fall asleep in peace, if not pleasurably.

When weary and exhausted we all enjoy "tired nature's sweet restorer," and when enfeebled and worn out by long weeks, months, or years of physical suffering, it is only reasonable to believe death comes as a welcome guest and a real friend. All physical feeling is gone some time before the last breath leaves the body. The facial contractions and muscular movements of the body are involuntary and painless, though they seem to the onlooker to be symptoms of a terrible rending of life's silver cord; but the dying one no more feels them than does the dead skinned eel feel the salt that causes it to twist and squirm in the pan. Death is as natural as life. To one well born, well reared, and well lived, death is but a simple ending of all, painless and senseless, and not to be dreaded or feared more than being born; nor, could we wake up and attempt to tell of the last moments, should we, as a general thing, be able to recall more of our feelings than we can those attending our birth.

The Ideal Life.

A POEM, BY SAMUEL P. PUTNAM. DELIVERED AT THE ANNIVERSARY OF THE NEWARK LIBERAL LEAGUE, FEB. 1, 1884.

The intellectual being must first play
And light the path of man with vivid ray;
Reason must see and know all varied life,
That glows and darkens in the ceaseless strife;
Thought must go forth with keen, relentless fire;
Vain fancies spurn and for the truth aspire.
Truth is beneath as well as in the sky;
Each fact is sacred, whether low or high;
The subtil link of glory runs through all,
Binding the whole into one glorious thrall
Of majesty, and beauty, and delight.
The mind is still our manhood's noblest hight;
To know is still the greatest and the best;
The brightest life is in life's endless quest;
One truth attained, another shines before—
Nothing so great but it unfolds to more;
Nothing so small but it makes vast our gain;
Nothing so rude but links the mighty chain
Whereby the golden stars pursue their way,
And night is turned into the lustrous day.
Oh, wonderful is truth, and wonderful is mind,
In whose strict process nature is combined
To order, harmony, and law and use,
By which huge forces their bright wealth unloose,
And make for man the empire of this world
Whose royal banners science has unfurled.
Science, indeed, is king, and what we know
Is greater far than fancy's richest glow.
Most slow and patient, step by step we pass
By the linked glory of each fact we glass
In the clear radiance of the mental sky.
We must be true nor seek to charm the eye,
Or thrill the heart with other than the real;
We cannot shape aloft the bright ideal
Forth from the fleeting wishes of our breast,
Only from nature's law shines nature's best.

Still beauty fades not with our fancy's dream,
But rides more glorious upon truth's fair stream;
For still the heart must find its fullest sway,
The impulse and the glory of man's way.
The heart of man, who can define its power,
Thrilled with the gleam of star and flash of flower?
It is an ocean limitless and far,
Filling with sparkling light the things that are;
Its moving tides, beyond the flow of sense,
Seem touched with something of omnipotence,
Which makes men heroes, saints, and martyrs grand.
Out of this heart of fire the poet planned,
The artist carved and chiseled, music rolled
With flaming wonders that are yet untold.
O mystery of man, this heaving soul,
This passion kindled by an unseen goal,
This spirit leaping to life's farthest race,
Transcending still the utmost that we trace—
'Tis this that paints the future with delight,
Givs hope and aspiration, drowns the night
With rushing splendors of tumultuous faith.
It nobly triumphs over ghastly death,
And weaves a wreath of flowers for its brow,
And makes it beautiful; o'er the dreary now
Awakes the glad to-morrow like a star,
And wins a heaven in spite of prison's bar.

This heart of man in reason's happy light
Will not be quenched, but flow in gracious might.
Through knowing still the feeling will aspire,
And o'er our pathway flash its wings of fire.
While marvelous thought shall penetrate the earth,
The inward sense shall claim our godlike birth,
That we are mingled of the shining sky—
Sprung from the dust, man's soul is the Most High.

But truth and beauty unto duty urge,
Knowing and feeling to bright action surge.
Man is a power within the breast of fate,
To choose and do beyond his present state.
He fronts the universe with mighty hand,
To pour his thought into creation grand.
'Tis he can mold the future with wide plan,
Backward and forward all the ages scan;
Learn from the past and onward wiser go,
More patient, but with heart and mind aglow
With a great purpose ever to advance,
Himself a providence and not a chance;
Sublime intelligence and impulse vast,
Forth from himself a cosmic light is cast.

Such is the grand ideal of the race,
The threefold ardor of its crowning grace—
The true, the beautiful, the good, in one,
Science and poetry in great duties done;
Man bending to eternal nature's law,
Submissiv, reverent with childlike awe,
Yet flooded with its impulse vast and sweet,
With heart of fire above his toiling feet,
While all the joys that kindle in his breast,
And all the grandeurs of his ceaseless quest,
Blend with his will to make him recreate,
And shape the world to love's ideal state.

The Light of Asia.

Colleges of learning are institutions where young men are sent to acquire useless knowledge. If all colleges in Christendom were wiped out, literature and science would suffer no loss. A collegiate education sets a young man back from four to fourteen years. He comes out nominally an alumnus, but in reality a sophomore, i. e., a wise fool. Ten to one that after two decades he can't solve an equation in algebra, demonstrate a problem in geometry, or translate a sentence out of a dead language. The writer speaks from personal knowledge, having graduated forty-five years ago and been a Master of Arts more than forty years.

He would therefore say to "D. W. T.," beware how you trust the opinion of an Oxford or a Harvard professor on a question involving the maintenance of Christianity. Their opinion, when given, is pretty sure to be in the interest of their clients and themselvs.

But, aside from this bias, which is inevitable, we venture to assert, from what we know of Mons. Jacolliot and Madame Blavatsky, that they are not inferior in learning and ability to Max Muller and John Fiske. And as monsieur and madame hav lived in India, is it not to be expected that they should know more of Indian antiquities than an Oxford or a Harvard professor, who perhaps has never seen that country at all?

Bayard Taylor satisfied himself that the highest civilization in Egypt was ten thousand years old. Jacolliot discovered astronomical monumental records in India which carried Brahmanical civilization back fifteen thousand years. Buddhism, Judaism, and Christianity are the natural offspring of Brahmanism. One of the earliest Christian documents is the "Acts of Thomas," which "was held in great estimation," says the Christian translator, "by the heretics of the first and second centuries." The apostle Thomas, according to this book, was sent to India to propagate Christianity, and suffered martyrdom there. Another early document, entitled "The Passing of Mary," describes Thomas as appearing at the tomb of the virgin clothed in his "sacerdotal robes," having been suddenly summoned while "singing mass in India" (See "Apocryphal Gospels," etc., Antenicene Christian library).

The "Light of Asia" is but dimly seen through the opera glasses of Muller, Fiske, and Arnold; it is better to take a look through the telescopes of Sir William Jones, Jacolliot, and Blavatsky.

ANTICHRIST, A.M.

P. S.—Mr. Graves made a blunder about Polycarp's saying that Jesus died peacefully at the age of fifty. What Irenæus says about Jesus being an old man will be found in full in our "Revelations," pp. 352–355.

Musings by the Way.

III.

Was there a God, all nature's first great cause,
Who made the universe, and gave it laws;
The power that still maintains these laws in force,
Directs the heavenly bodies in their course,
Whose great design all nature but fulfils—
All things that are exist because he wills—
Who rules the universe as he sees fit,
Objectivly, himself no part of it;
Great monarch, sovereign over nature's realm,
Whose mighty hand is ever on the helm;
Great fount, from whom all streams of life do flow,
Who causes every blade of grass to grow,
Who notes the lily's bloom, the sparrow's fall—
The great eternal father of us all?
And nations rise and fall at his command,
And all events take place as he has planned;
Who guides the universe in every part,
Yet knows the secrets of each human heart;
A God in whom we children of the dust
In humble confidence may place our trust;
To him can pray, and he will answer prayer,
Whene'er oppressed by sorrow, toil, or care.
Is this a true and just idea of God,
Or fond conceit of dwellers on earth's sod?
All nature moves on its unceasing course
By force internal, not external force.
The mind of man may dwell on nature's laws—
It nothing learns about a great first cause.
In vain the astronomer, with skill and care,
Inspects the starry heavens to find him there;
And though we view with microscopic eye
The smallest atom, we no God espy.
Inherent nature seems alone the power
Displayed in mineral, or plant, or flower,
Or animal; nor yet in human life
See we a God that governs human strife.
The strongest armies are most sure to win,
Though they may fight upon the side of sin.
A Bonaparte may waste two million lives,
Him of that baleful power no God deprives;
In vain the orphan's wail, the widow's woe,
This monster wills, and human blood must flow.
The pirate bark may triumph o'er the wave;
A peaceful ship may find a watery grave.
A thousand million prayers can never cause
The slightest change in one of nature's laws.
Though prayers from every Christian may arise,
Supreme are nature's laws, and Garfield dies.
Misfortunes, want, and woe afflict the best;
The worst of men may be by fortune blest.
The brigand may be bountifully fed,
While little children cry in vain for bread.
Though we to him may raise our prayer and songs,
No personal God appears to right our wrongs.
Immutable are all of nature's laws,
Whether or not there be a first great cause.

Renewals.

We hope that every reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER whose tab says '83 will at once sit down and send us $3 for renewal. If it is desired, also, to p actice a little economy, just step over to your neighbor's, get him to subscribe, and send us $5 for the two subscriptions. There are enough Liberals in the country to handsomely support all the papers devoted to their cause, and we think THE TRUTH SEEKER is not the least deserving. It is the largest, and we are often told it is the best journal of Liberalism in the country. To those who take advantage of our club rates it is also the cheapest.

There are also a few whose subscriptions expired in 82. They hav been carried along because some hav written that, for one cause or another, they were unable to pay as they would like to hav done, but would square up soon. Not knowing but that the others might be similarly situated, and being unwilling to unnecessarily deprive any of the paper, we hav continued to send until the present. We cannot do this longer. We need the money to pay expenses, and unless our negligent friends take immediate action, they must miss their TRUTH SEEKER. We hav long missed the money.

A Catholic Bill Passes the Senate.

Mr. Daggett has introduced, and the Senate of this state has passed, a bill making Good Friday a legal holiday.

This is execrable. Saying nothing of the bad taste of making a day of festivity of what should be a day of mourning, if the people really believe that a divine person was crucified, the passage of the bill is an abuse of governmental powers. The observance of Good Friday is a religious whim. Those who wish to suspend labor and attend church are at liberty to do so. They are protected in that right. That is all, according to our Constitution, they can reasonably ask.

For the legislature to do more is to practically unite church and state.

Iowa Christianity.

The Protestant conception of civil and religious liberty is well defined by the Iowa judge of whom was asked an injunction restraining a teacher from holding religious exercises in a public school. It will be seen to be very similar to the conception of our Puritan ancestors, which was that they had an inalienable right to believe as they pleased, and to force others to believe with them.

The decision was rendered by Judge Burton. The case is briefly this: The complainant said that the teachers of his two little girls turned the school from its lawful design into a place of worship and religious instruction, and made of themselvs "ministers of religion therein, in the presence and hearing of all their pupils." The Bible was daily read, the teachers and pupils repeated the Lord's Prayer, and religious hymns were sung.

The complainant—whose name and locality we regret are not given in the dispatches which recount the iniquity—gave notice to the principal of the school of his objections, but that authority paid no attention. He then applied for an injunction, which was refused. To say that a school where the Bible is read as a part of the morning exercises, or where the Lord's Prayer is repeated, or a hymn sung, is a place of worship, or that such teachers are ministers of religion, seemed, said the follower of precedents, "more specious than sound." He held, morever, that Iowa's constitutional provision granting religious toleration, and prohibiting the legislature from providing any religious establishment, is not contravened by laws which recognize the scriptures, or the supreme being, or Sunday as a religious day of rest, but that such laws are legal and valid.

This is nothing more than might be expected. The constitutional provision granting religious toleration is only to be construed as meaning toleration for Christianity—no other religions need apply.

How would the good Christian people of Iowa like to hav Mohammedanism taught in their public schools? It would be a no more monstrous wrong to them than it is to hav Christianity taught to the children of Freethinkers.

Strange Doctrins for a Catholic.

The Sun finds in the contribution of Cardinal Newman to a late number of the Nineteenth Century some curious teachings in relation to the Bible. The broad principle laid down by the cardinal, it is asserted, is that the scriptures are inspired not as to every word and thing in them, but only as to the revelation of divine truth which they contain, and that "God" is their author only in the sense of being their inspirer and originator. Furthermore that only their teaching on matters of faith and morals are in any sense binding until the church shall hav spoken authoritativly on any particular point.

This lets God out through a very small hole.

Christians, when confronted with the crimes of their numbers, are wont to say that the perpetrators were not true Christians, for true Christians perpetrated no crimes. The truth of this depends on what is a Christian.

So with the cardinal's statement. "Only the revelation of divine truth" is inspired. Very well; but when we ask which is the divine truth we are told that it is the inspired part! We are, therefore, just as wise as before the cardinal illumined the world with his explanation.

We believe that no one ever claimed that God sat down and with pen in hand wrote the Bible, but if he was the inspirer of that work he inspired a stupendous falsehood. Would Cardinal Newman like to put it that way? Probably not. But allowing God to hav originated, say the Ten Commandments. They are not original with the Bible. Then he must hav inspired other writers, who must hav written equally divine instructions, and consequently Christianity is only one of several God-given religions. Does the cardinal mean this construction to be put upon his words? Undoubtedly not.

Cardinal Newman's church has already passed upon the Bible as a whole, and declared it all inspired. So hav the various Protestant sects. Is Dr. Newman strictly honest in saying, in this year of grace 1884, that people hav a latitude in construing biblical statements of facts until the church has passed upon them?

On the whole the eminent Roman Catholic is not a success in his role of hermeneutist. People with no reputation hav written words inestimably wiser.

The English Inquisition Yields Up the Last Victim.

On Monday, the 25th of February, at 8 o'clock in the morning, George William Foote, the editor of the London Freethinker, was released from Holloway prison, having served his twelve months' sentence for blasphemy. He is the last of the three men connected with that paper to come out. The others were W. J. Ramsey, who was sentenced to nine months' imprisonment, and H. A. Kemp, who stayed three months in the modern inquisition.

On his emergence from the literal dungeon in which he has for a year been compelled to spend twenty-two and twenty-three hours out of the twenty-four, Mr. Foote was met by two thousand friends and escorted to the Hall of Science, where a public breakfast was provided. On March 12th he will be given a banquet and presented with a testimonial raised by the English Freethinkers of several hundred pounds, in which Mr. Ramsey will share.

When Arthur J. Kemp was released nine months ago he stood higher in the estimation of his countrymen than ever; when, three months ago, W. J. Ramsey came again into the sunlight hundreds of people surrounded him and renewed their allegiance to the cause for which he suffered. Last Monday the acclamations of two thousand sturdy English Freethinkers made the air vocal in front of Holloway jail, and G. W. Foote will hav hundreds of hearers and readers where he had dozens previous to the pronouncing of sentence upon him. In this country, when the heroic D. M. Bennett returned to his home from Albany, Chickering Hall was crowded by over three thousand Americans to do him honor. He was feted and sent to Europe and around the world. His writings were more eagerly sought, and THE TRUTH SEEKER increased in circulation.

As an act of policy, of that worldliness for which she has ever been distinguished, does it pay the church to do these deeds of infamy? Is the return in loaves and fishes commensurate with the outlay? There are brave men yet in the van and ranks of Freethought. Our cause and martyrs can endure as long as the church and the law.

We send hearty greeting to Mr. Foote and his fellow-martyrs. He and they may with reason congratulate themselvs that although Christianity can imprison, it cannot kill. Few men ever came from the torture chamber in possession of full bodily strength and vigor, and our English heroes are lucky also in that respect. That they will make their experience dear to every Christian heart is not to be doubted. And should they ever visit America, the Freethinkers in this country will show them that their deed of heroism is not unknown, and that Americans know how to appreciate pluck.

Mr. Bradlaugh's Prospects.

The British Parliament, into which Mr. Bradlaugh has again and for the fourth time ventured, seems to be composed of orthodox bourbons who never forget and never advance. Although Northampton expressed herself in favor of the Atheist elector by a largely increased majority, the House has been true to its reactionary and revolutionary policy of depriving that borough of its legal and rightful representation.

At the opening of Parliament on the 21st a stormy and uproarious discussion of Mr. Bradlaugh's claims took place. As before stated, Mr. Bradlaugh's three votes on his own case on the 11th inst. had rendered him subject to an aggregate penalty of fifteen hundred pounds. Pending the settlement of this legal phase of the affair, the announcement had been made that Mr. Bradlaugh would make no attempt to take the seat to which he was elected on the 19th. The speaker of the House read letters from Mr. Bradlaugh confirming this announcement. In spise of this, however, the cablegram reports that the irrepressible bigot, Mr. Stafford Northcote, who has interested himself so long in Mr. Bradlaugh's affairs that his interference has grown by degrees into personal enmity, moved that Parliament reaffirm its previous resolution excluding Mr. Bradlaugh from the House. Mr. Gladstone, the old man eloquent, but in this case powerless, came tardily to the rescue, asking that the vote be deferred. The aspect of the case, he said, had changed since the 11th inst., when the member for Northampton last came before the House. An action at law had been begun against him for thrice voting upon that day. The utmost would be done to obtain a speedy judgment, which decision would aid the House in arriving at some conclusion. Mr. R. Churchill, a conservativ malcontent, opposed Mr. Gladstone's motion for postponement of action in the case, insulting Mr. Bradlaugh's constituency by styling them a mob. Mr. Labouchere, Mr. Bradlaugh's colleague, called the speaker's attention to this language, but that worthy ruled it to be parliamentary, and declined to interfere to protect the voters of Northampton. At the conclusion of Mr. Churchill's remarks, the home secretary, who has covered himself with disgrace by refusing to pardon the imprisoned Freethinkers, made some sarcastic reference to the new aspect of the case, saying it was, it appeared, no longer against Mr. Bradlaugh, but against Northampton. Mr. Labouchere followed, advising Messrs. Northcote, Churchill, and their followers to admit the error of their ways and apologize for their past conduct.

A vote was then taken upon the motion to reaffirm the resolution preventing Mr. Bradlaugh from taking the oath and excluding him from the precincts of the House, and it was carried by 226 to 173. The speaker then ordered Mr. Bradlaugh to withdraw, which order was complied with under protest. At a caucus of the conservativ members of Parliament, it was resolved to continue the opposition to Mr. Bradlaugh in every possible way.

Mr. Bradlaugh expects to win the legal suits against him, but states that in case he does not he will resign and not again seek a re-election.

It may be possible, it is probable, he will win the suit, for aside from the justice of his cause he is one of the ablest lawyers in England; he understands every turn in the complicated list of legal twistings, and is fully capable of turning them to his own advantage. But he fights as one shackled. He is defeated beforehand, and will be defeated while Christian bigotry rules. The Established church fears him, for the day of its disestablishment cannot be far off, and his remaining in Parliament would undoubtedly hasten its coming. Therefore Mr. Bradlaugh has against him all the power of that body.

Mr. Bradlaugh is also a believer in a republican form of government, and his sentiments are well known. He hopes the reign of Victoria will be the last of hereditary ruling of England. And it is also shrewdly surmised that he would like to see Charles Bradlaugh the first president of the English republic. The knowledge of this arrays the whole aristocracy against him, notwithstanding that many of them sympathize with his religious opinions. There are several Freethinkers already in the House, but they sit as politicians, not as reformers. They are probably all honorable men, but we cannot honor them as we would were they more activ in helping forward the cause of mental and political liberty.

So it is not probable that the present House of Parliament will ever permit Mr. Bradlaugh to take his seat. But these members will not hold office forever, and when their successors shall be chosen, we may not unreasonably hope that public opinion will be strong enough for liberty to compel the seating of all duly elected members without regard to their religious predilections.

This, however, is in the future. The outlook for the present is discouraging. Christian bigotry and intolerance are in England triumphant, albeit the victory is more dishonorable than defeat. It is better to lose a thousand battles fought for the right than to win one through iniquity, and our English friends and allies can in that thought find a balm of healing. Giv the church and the conservativs sufficient length of twisted hemp, and they can be relied upon to strangle themselvs, as they hav heretofore strangled liberty.

Editorial Notes.

Dr. Bartol, Colonel T. W. Higginson, F. M. Holland, and others hav been before the Massachusetts legislativ committee the past week asking for the removal of the disabilities of Atheists as witnesses in courts of law. Colonel Higginson showed that the disability was imposed so lately as 1850. The committee appeared favorable for repeal.

Prof. Felix Adler lectured in Rochester on the 18th. The Opera House was crowded to hear what he had to say on the Ten Commandments. He proved that law did not emanate from Jehovah, nor was it ever uttered from Sinai, but has evolved from the maxims of all nations, which maxims were the result of experience, not the ipse dixit of divinity.

Gen. Booth of the Salvation Army has been held guilty of deception and untruthfulness in one of his recent real estate transactions. He took a theater on a promis to properly maintain the liquor selling part of the business, and then did his best to destroy it by substituting some teetotal bibulous abomination for genuin whisky or beer. He has been fined heavily, and compelled to restore the premises. Another religious teacher, of a different turn, has been suspended for three years for drunkenness.

This paragraph is from the Christian Advocate:

"News of great revivals come in from all quarters. Some remarkable conversions of Infidels of unusual intelligence are reported. And, what is equally important, formalists are being transformed into living Christians. Let this best of all works go on. How much need there is of it!"

Unless the Advocate can giv names and dates we shall conclude that Dr. Buckley has been lately re-reading Paul, and has dwelt too long upon that verse which reads something like this:

"For if the truth of God hath more abounded through my lie unto his glory, why yet am I also judged as a sinner?"

One of the pleasantest features of the Linesville, Pa., celebration of Paine's birthday was inadvertently ommitted from our report. Mr. and Mrs. Jerry Brockway, of Jamestown, presented the Linesville League with a large crayon portrait of O. P. Kellogg, of Lynne, Ohio, the work of their daughter, Miss Martha Brockway. Mr. Kellogg, the lecturer, is what one of his friends calls a "this world Spiritualist," a man of courage, genius, and generosity. Mr. and Mrs. Brockway are stanch Liberals, and were for many years the only Freethinkers in Jamestown. C. B. Reynolds was selected to make the presentation of the portrait, which was accepted on behalf of the League by G. W. Baldwin, the secretary. The picture will, henceforth, adorn the walls of the League hall. Mr. Kellogg is well known in western Pennsylvania and eastern Ohio as an eloquent speaker. He has often addressed the Linesville League and his portrait is highly valued.

It pleases us to note that the Congregational denomination has not closed a very prosperous year. Of about 400,000 members, nearly two-thirds of whom are females, some 57,000 are classed as "absentees," and the additions are 28,377, over 14,000 being "on probation," while the losses aggregate nearly 20,000. The apparent net gain, therefore, is only some nine thousand, which must be offset by the 57,000 absentees. Nearly one thousand of the denomination's churches are vacant. About four million dollars were wasted on those that are occupied. The members behaved better last year than usual, only 1,724 having been disciplined, and their ministers will, we presume, make a better, because smaller, showing in the next edition of historian Billings's little book. By the way, we do not see in the church statistics now being published by the religious papers any mention of that remarkable brochure. It certainly ought to hav a prominent place among the Year books. Why this studied silence, brethren?

Damon Y. Kilgore, of Philadelphia, has filed in Court of Common Pleas, No. 2, a petition in behalf of his wife, Carrie B. Kilgore, asking that she be allowed to show cause why she should not longer be debarred from practicing law in the courts of Pennsylvania. The petition recites that Mrs. Kilgore is a citizen of the United States and of the state of Pennsylvania; that she has been a regularly registered student of law; that on the 28th day of December, 1874, she appeared before the Board of Examiners to be examined as to her qualifications to practice law; that this request was refused because she is a woman; that she then applied to the court to instruct the Board to perform its duties, which application was refused; that she then applied to the legistature for an act supplemental to the general law regulating the appointment of lawyers, which was refused by the Senate on the ground that the general law was sufficient, and that under it she could not be excluded on account of her sex; that she then returned to the courts, which still refused to grant her request, denying her admission to the Law Department of the University of Pennsylvania; after which she again applied to the legislature to pass a bill which provided that no person shall be refused admission as an attorney in any court of law or equity in Pennsylvania on account of sex. This bill passing the Senate but failing to pass the House because of the press of business of investigating charges of bribery against many representativs, and the petitioner having obtained a diploma and been admitted to practice in the Orphans' Court of Philadelphia county, Mrs. Kilgore asks that she be allowed to show that she is entitled to practice in all the courts of the commonwealth. The case is exciting much comment from the press, as the Pennsylvania courts are puritanically fossilized, visiting graveyards more than ordinarily often for precedents, and regarding the application of a lady to practice as revolutionary. Both Mr. and Mrs. Kilgore are prominent Freethinkers of Philadelphia.

Just previous to Miss Helen Gardner's lecture in Syracuse a clergyman, too cowardly to sign his name, allowed his insanity to take this form. It was published in the Sunday Courier:

"The right to express her sentiments, in public or private, cannot be questioned, nor would we interfere with it. The right to hear her, or any one else, belongs to every person who chooses to do so. But has any one the right to violate law?—to ignore or trample under foot the moral sense of a Christian community? Yet this is what the proposed transaction will do if it is allowed. It is evidently a speculation—a business undertaking for somebody's pecuniary benefit, not for the public good. There are graded prices for tickets of admission of from thirty-five to seventy-five cents, the latter for reserved seats, under the management of Edward L. Bloom. There is a law in our state which protects the sanctity of the Lord's day, by forbidding the transaction of ordinary business thereon. It does not allow the merchants to carry on their business. Not because there is any more harm in the mere act of labor on that day than on any other; but Christian sentiment and practice hav regarded, and still regard, the claims of the moral law which requires that the Sabbath, or seventh day, shall be religiously observed. And civil law recognizes and protects that sentiment and the various forms of worship through which it is expressed. Now, the question is, Shall the law be respected and maintained, or shall we allow the open and flagrant violation of it, for purposes of personal speculation and gain—not in the interests of peace and order, but evidently to break down all the safeguards of society? If the drayman cannot ply his calling on the Sabbath, though it be a very harmless and useful one; if the saloon and the bar are required to be closed on that day, because the law says so, and the interests of the community demand it, surely foreign speculators should not be allowed to come into our midst and violate it. And there is a way to prevent it. Our civil officers hav a grand opportunity to do something creditable for themselvs and the city."

The hall on the evening of the lecture was crowded. The civil officers did do "something creditable for themselvs and the city," but not in the way the clergyman meant.

The Sociologic Society is the name of an organization that has been formed for the purpose of studying the laws relating to social organization, and for the propagation of the principles of co-operation or mutual helpfulness among the people of this country. The society holds that the present industrial system is unjust; that the workman does not receive an equitable share of the wealth he creates, and that the assumption that labor is merely a commodity is incompatible with a high civilization. It believes also that the measure of reward should be based upon the productiveness of labor; that the condition of society will be largely improved by the substitution in social and industrial life of the principle of co-operation for that of competition; that the community is responsible for the condition of its members, and that all men should, as far as possible, hav equal social opportunities. It knows that while all endeavors at reform are tentativ the power which works through nature ultimately brings forth the good; that the efforts of the humblest will accelerate this process, and that by organization the desired change will be the more rapidly attained. The society submits to the world the following expression of its principles:

1. That justice demands that the workman should participate, beyond his mere wages, in the profits of the business in which he is engaged.

2. That the operativ class should be encouraged to combine their efforts and savings in the establishment of business, both of a productiv and distributiv nature.

3. That all legislation militating against the organization of labor should be repealed, and that the combinations of the operativ class should receive the same legal encouragement as that now enjoyed by capitalist corporations.

4. That bureaus of labor should be established by the government, whereby the members of the various trades would be able to obtain exact information respecting the condition of their several industries throughout the entire country.

5. That steps should be taken for the formation of a labor congress, whose object should be the efficient organization of all wholesome industries.

Any communications touching the principles or organization of the society may be addressed to Mrs. I. C. Fales, Seventh avenue, Brooklyn, N. Y., president of the New York organization.

Historian Lossing having said that the "scholars" of Spain in the time of Columbus regarded it as unphilosophical and absurd to assert the sphericity of the earth, Dr. Simon Newcomb challenges his statement. Says Dr. Newcomb:

"That learning was very far backward at that time in Spain may, I suppose, be true; but is it possible that professed scholars could hav been so grossly ignorant of a fact known in all other countries and in all other ages; a fact which, indeed, must hav been known to all of the Spanish navigators?"

We know not what kind of a doctor Mr. Newcomb is, but his correction of Lossing is not to his credit as a reader of history. Columbus discovered America in 1492. It was not till 1522 that Magellan's ships, having left their gallant commander's bones in the Ladrones islands, returned from their circumnavigation of the globe. While it is true that the spherical form of the earth was known to surrounding countries—the Khalif Al-Mamum having ascertained its circumference as early as 830 if not a few years previously—the "scholars" of Spain were in ignorance of or denied the fact. The writings of Mohammedan scholars and astronomers had given currency to the belief throughout Western Europe, but, "as might be expected," says Draper, "it was received with disfavor by theologians," who were, at that time, the "scholars" of Spain. Columbus was a firm believer in the doctrin, but he spent many unsuccessful years in endeavoring to convince Spanish "scholars" of its truth. He was "confuted from the Pentateuch, the Psalms, the prophecies, the gospels, the epistles, and the writings of the fathers—St. Chrysostom, St. Augustine, St. Jerome, St. Gregory, St. Basil, St. Ambrose." The Catholic church in Columbus's day was irrevocably committed to the dogma of a flat earth, and the scholarship of Spain was in the church. And such scholarship! From the Pyrennees to the Mediterranean there was scarcely one Spaniard deserving the title of scholar.

Writing of the Mormons in a recent Independent, the Rev. Geo. H. Hepworth talks very sensibly for a Christian. He does not believe, he says, "in Congress as an engin of extermination, because Congress is at the beck and call of political expediency, if not of political trickery. Politics and truth telling, politics and justice, politics and the simple right of anything, without the gross adulteration of personal emolument, are seldom found in conjunction. The less we allow any great moral question to be mixed up with politics the better it will be for us all. And yet that is precisely what the new Edmunds bill does. Mr. Edmunds may not be aware of the fact—he has a right to that concession—but one clause of his bill opens wide the door of the meanest kind of jobbery, and is enough to render the whole bill ineffectual. It provides that the management of the Mormon church corporation shall be taken out of the hands of the Mormons and placed in the hands of fourteen trustees to be appointed by the president. This is the most delicious bit of patronage to which we hav been treated for a long while. In my opinion, it is simply infamous. Fourteen gentlemen are to be rewarded for distinguished party services by the appointment to handle Mormon money. This is a new kind of party plum. And yet it is the best thought of a politician who is wise and incorruptible. There is not the first scintilla of justice in it. It shows only too plainly that Congress knows how to tinker a question, but does not know how to be radical and right." To the proposed armed interference with the ten or fifteen thousand polygamists among the Saints Mr. Hepworth says: "Suppression by force of bayonet is the very last resort, and we hav not yet reached that point. The less gunpowder we can get on with the better. Our old wounds are not yet healed, and we are not hankering for a fresh fray. I tremble when I hear gentlemen talk lightly about an invasion and a siege. Before we come to cartridges we should sit down and meditate on one fact, viz., that if we can't master fifteen thousand fools, whose hundred thousand wives are praying for our success, then we ought to make a new list of fools, and head the list ourselvs." The clerical gentleman also recognizes what The Truth Seeker was forced some time ago to point out to Mr. Wakeman, that fanaticism is no crime until manifested in overt acts, and when it came to ecclesiastical despotism the danger to our country and institutions from the Roman Catholic church was the force to be feared. Upon this last point Mr. Hepworth forcibly remarks that "it is not many years since it was conclusivly shown that Romanism requires the same kind of allegiance to its papal head; and it was asserted, not without authority, that in a pinch the true Romanist would consider the demand of the state as second to the demand of the church. Can you pass a law that this state of things shall cease?" The remedy Mr. Hepworth concludes to be the school-teacher. With an eye to the main chance, and to giv some of his own profession a chance to butter their bread a little thicker, he also adds the preacher. But he seems to forget that ecclesiasticism is the danger to be rooted up, and to supplant one form of superstition with another is only jumping from the frying-pan into the fire. The school-teacher, well supported, will be found amply sufficient to eradicate Mormonism, as he has already removed from Christianity its ranker growths of superstition.

Pasqua Austin.

OBSEQUIES OF THE VETERAN FREETHINKER OF WAYNE CO., NEW YORK.—ORATION BY EX-REV. C. B. REYNOLDS, AT WILLIAMSON, NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEB. 13, 1884.

It is not often that a Freethought lecturer is permitted to conduct the services of an outspoken Infidel in an orthodox church. But Brother Pasqua Austin was one of the pioneers of the county and oldest residents of the town. He died at the age of 82. Although for forty-three years an activ, energetic advocate of Liberalism, his known and tried integrity, activ benevolence, pure and useful life, had gained the esteem and kind regard, not alone of the village, but of the whole town and vicinity.

Long before the hour announced, the church was packed—aisles, gallery, every available place where a human being could stand, was utilized. It was with difficulty seats could be cleared for the mourners. Over three hundred people found it impossible to gain admission to the church. We giv extracts from Mr. Reynolds's oration:

When the grim messengor lays his remorseless hands upon loved ones, our hearts are saddened, numbed with grief; the tendrils of affection are ruthlessly torn asunder, and in our weak humanity we moan and sob—tears blind our eyes. It seems to us the sun of our lives is darkened forever—the sky of memory enshrouded in the dark pall of night—the stars of peace blotted from the firmament of our future.

Yet we know the whitest foam dances upon the darkest billows, and the stars shine brightest when surrounded by the blackest thunder clouds.

Joy and sorrow are the beautiful forms of sympathy in which hope appears as a gracious angel, hovering over the sorrowful of earth.

The darkest cell of despairing grief has always at least one tiny pin-hole to let the glory of hope shine in. It is wonderful to the mourner how the soul at first sullenly repelling the light of gladness, admits the one little ray of hope unconsciously, and is beguiled into a blessed state of calm resignation to the inevitable.

We know life and death are essential conditions. But for errors of education we should not dread or fear it. We weep and mourn at the death of our dear loved ones. We do so pity them. Is not much of our sorrow selfish? Not for those at peace, calmly sleeping, sweetly resting, their labor o'er, their work accomplished, need we weep. We cannot restrain our tears for ourselvs, for we are bereaved. The dear companionship, the sympathy, help, loving ministrations seem lost to us forever. But for our dead, in any case, all is well with them. If death ends all, as Materialists believe, the dead still liv in the good they hav done; their memories ever green in the hearts of dear loved ones. In the language of the poetess, Eliza Cook:

"'Tis a long, 'tis a last, 'tis a beautiful rest,
When all sorrow is passed from the brow and the breast;
And the lone spirit truly and wisely may crave
The sleep that is dreamless, the sleep of the grave."

If, on the other hand, the brighter, happier philosophy is true, death is but the entrance to a new, better, brighter, more beautiful existence.

"Let our fainting hearts take courage,
When with grief and sorrow bowed,
Remember ever, there is always Glorious light beyond the cloud."

Since we so well know life and death are essential conditions, why should we then hav such horror and fear of death? When the remorseless hand of death robs us of one of our most valued treasures let us remember

"Bright things never die, e'en though they fade; Beauty and minstrelsy deathless were made."

No noble act, no generous impulse of the heart, has ever perished.

Superstition has taught us to dread death; the thought of the grave to most people is horrible. Yet, in company with a fair young, timid girl, we walk, in the bright sunshiny morning through the cemetery; tired, we sit down, and are soon absorbed in the pages of some book. Our young companion leaves us, rambles on alone, reads the inscriptions, admiring the flowers. In meditation and castle-building the hours fly happily by. The church clock booms out the hour of mid-day; still she lingers, and when we go to her she tells us how much she enjoyed her solitary ramble.

Ask her to take that same walk at night; leave her alone beside the same grave at which she stood at noon, when the same clock booms twelve, midnight, and she shrieks in terror, is dumb with fright, or faints in agony of fear. Why? Does not reason assure her there is nothing more there at midnight than at midday, that the sleeping and the dead are but as pictures?

Night is but the withdrawal of the sun's light. But early education has instilled the fear of darkness, and taught that ghosts and spooks haunt the graves at dead of night Many strong men, who would never flinch in the dread battle, would quake with fear if compelled to pass a night alone in a cemetery. They would declare they knew there was no reason for fearing the dead would harm them, yet would tremble and quake with fear when the still small hours crept on.

We hav known children fear to sit up alone with a dead mother—the dear, gentle, loving mother, that living would ever shield from, not do, harm. But it had been so impressed on the child mind that there is something horrible, fearful about death that many fear it even in their own dear loved ones.

Why do we dread death, even if there is no beyond? Oh, some say, the thought of lying unconscious in the grave is terrible! Better the orthodox hell than to lie dead, deprived of all thought, feeling, motion, unconscious of what is going on around you.

You are sick and suffering—oh, how you long for sleep! But it comes not. The aching head tosses on the pillow; opiates fail to giv relief. Oh, if you could but sleep! At last there is hope, and you find the needed rest—you sleep. Well, shall we wake you in a few minutes? No, for mercy's sake! to wake one after such suffering for need of sleep would be cruel, unnatural. Why awake you? Why? Because if you sleep soundly you are unconscious, deprived of all thought, feeling, motion. Better the orthodox hell than lie deprived of motion. unconscious of what is going on around you!

We are assembled to do honor to the memory of a true, brave heart and thoughtful brain—a man possessing more sense than book learning, more courage than affability, more mental strength than polish. Born at a time when intellectual freedom was regarded as the worst of crimes, he dared think for himself and giv utterance to his convictions of truth. His god was nature; his church, all humanity; his creed, common sense.

Pasqua Austin was born in Washington county, N. Y., 1802. was married there in 1822, moved into the town of Williamson in 1824. When twenty-two years old, on first arriving at Williamson, N. Y., he united with the Baptist church,

He left the church forty-three years ago in disgust, on account of the gross misdemeanors of the pastor. After a little he allowed himself to be persuaded and cajoled into returning. But the glamour was riven, thought awakened, and his true, brave, noble soul could no longer be trammeled by the shackles of superstition. His awe and veneration of priestcraft had been destroyed forever. He read, studied, thought for himself, and soon rejoiced in the glorious freedom and beautiful truths of the gospel of humanity, and scorned the empty profession of faith—the bigotry, hypocrisy, and fanaticism of Christianity.

He became an Infidel—and had the glorious courage to avow it—and that at a time when to be the champion of universal mental liberty "tried men's souls."

He lived out his convictions, and regardless of misrepresentations and persecution, for forty-three years did justly, loved mercy, and used his best endeavor to make all around him happy. An honest truth seeker, he fairly and dispassionately weighed the evidence, rejected the error and evil, and gladly accepted and cherished all that was true and good.

Mr. Austin worshiped nature, and she rewarded him with a long, happy, and useful life—a calm, peaceful death. He died with the happiness of others first in his thoughts. His last words were, 'He hoped his death would count more than his life for the cause of universal mental liberty.'

In his later years, as all honest and true hearts do, he believed and echoed the words of that brave, honest-hearted martyr to the cause of Liberalism, D. M. Bennett, founder of that best of Freethought papers, THE TRUTH SEEKER—"Those lead the happiest, most peaceful lives who seek most to benefit those around them; our highest duty lies, not above the clouds over our heads, nor in depth of earth beneath our feet. Neither can we do aught to benefit or effect any being supposed to exist in either locality—our duty and field of action is here, among the sons and daughters of men. In no case can we so well prepare for another life, as by doing all in our power to make those around us happy. The practice of love, mercy, and benevolence here and now will best qualify us for ministrations of love in another sphere. We must combat ignorance and superstition, not with dungeon, torture, and the stake, not by ostracism, misrepresentation, and abuse, but by imparting knowledge and instruction. We must endeavor to lead the erring from vice to the practice of virtue by loving admonition and good example."

Mourners needed no words of consolation. This noble old hero died as he had lived—an honest, truthful, kind-hearted man; he had lived out the full measure of his days. But his Christian friends doubtless mourned, thinking he will never go to heaven because, despite his benevolent, good, and useful life, he did not believe as they do. He simply lived a life of love.

If the Bible is true, if Christ's own declarations are reliable, then, dear Christian friends, you may change your lamentations to rejoicings, for all honest truth seekers, all Liberals and Infidels, who lived as Brother Austin lived, Christ himself positivly declares he will welcome into heaven. Lest you may think we are mistaken, with the permission of the friends of the deceased, we will open the Bible and read the words ascribed to Christ—which fully sustain and indorse our declaration. [The speaker then read Matthew xxv, 31-40.]

Mark the text. Not, What did you believe? not, Did you believe the Bible, the doctrin of the trinity, the atonement, in immersion, apostolic succession, the literal six days of creation, purgatory and ever-burning hell for everyone that did not believe exactly as yourself, no matter how good, true, pure, and loving lives they led? No; Christ says no word of what did you believe, but "What did you do? Did you feed the hungry, giv drink to the thirsty, help the needy, clothe the naked, minister to the sick?" Yes. Then "Come, ye blessed of my father; inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world."

Remember that while Christ so very emphatically declares all Liberals who liv as did Brother Austin shall be welcomed to heaven, despite what the church calls Infidelity, church-members are not all safe from the "everlasting fire prepared for the devil and his angels." Speaking of professed Christians, who even claim to hav done great things for the church, Christ declares: "Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he that doeth the will of my father which is in heaven. Many will say to me in that day, Lord, Lord, hav we not prophesied in thy name? and in thy name hav cast out devils? and in thy name hav done many wonderful works? And then will I profess unto them, I never knew you. Depart from me, ye that work iniquity" (Matt. vii, 21-23).

Liv lives of love, instead of making professions of faith. Practice justice and mercy, in lieu of forms and ceremonies. Ourselvs constantly endeavor to promote the happiness and welfare of those around us, in preference to constantly praying to a God to do it for us. And so shall we remove error, fear, and superstition, and attain to a better and nobler code of ethics—doing justly, loving mercy, and endeavoring to make all around us happy.

A very large number followed to the grave, despite the severe inclemency of the weather. After the coffin was lowered, Brother Reynolds said:

Amidst the ice and snow, and chilling wintry blasts that numb our senses, even as the chill of death, with its cruel separation, hath brought the dumb ague of pain to our hearts, we giv back to his Mother Earth the form of him so brave, loyal, and true—earth to earth. Yet we know that the chill, dark, leaden sky of winter will be dispelled by the warm, bright hope and joy of spring and summer, clothing again the earth with verdure, and calling into existence the bright, beautiful, and fragrant flowers; so hope and happiness shall again spring up in our hearts, and the seeds of love and truth sown in our hearts by him for whom we now perform the last offices of respect and love, shall bring forth flowers of charity and love in our lives, by our remembrance and emulation of his virtues.

We leave our brother by the side of his life's companion who, seven years ago, preceded him—a true woman, a faithful, loving wife and helpmate, a gentle and affectionate mother.

With thanks for all the kindness and sympathy of friends in these last solemn rites, we now bid them farewell, farewell.

In the evening, at Stark's Hall, a crowded house greeted Ex-Rev. Reynolds, who spoke on "What Liberalism Teaches." The closest attention was given throughout. After the lecture he made an earnest appeal to the Liberals present for the sake of the children, as well as their own, to organize and secure a substitute for the church and Sunday-school; a means of real practical education in scientific truth, to fit all for development, mental and physical, that should secure happiness here and now, as the best possible preparation for any and all future.

Several made encouraging remarks. A committee was appointed to take names of Liberals who desired to organize, and a meeting appointed at that hall for two weeks from that night, when Dr. A. G. Austin (son of the deceased Pasqua Austin) would address them, and an earnest effort be made to complete the organization.

Bradlaugh's New Move.

Mr. Bradlaugh's application for the "Chiltern Hundreds" is only equivalent to a resignation, which in no way prevents a re-election. One thing is certain, if he is elected again he must be admitted.

An esteemed contemporary, in noticing the latest attempt of "the dull and monotonous Bradlaugh" to gain the seat in the House of Commons to which he was chosen again and again by the voters whose representativ he is, that he be turned over to a professional bouncer. The House itself was the bouncer. Coming from an American newspaper this suggestion is a remarkable one, but it shows how difficult it is to fight the battle of parliamentary reform. Every student of political history knows that the bouncer has at all times stood between the people and their genuin representation in the English Parliament. At no time has the House of Commons been really representativ. At no time has public opinion had much control over it. From the revolution of 1688 until the revolution in America, the Whigs managed it by bribery and borough-jobbing. George III. made these the basis of the power of the crown. The royal revenue was used to buy seats in the elections, and to buy votes in the house itself, and so shameless was the corruption that, under the ministry of Lord Bute, an office was opened in the treasury for the purchase of members. The first Englishman who was bold enough and honest enough to protest against this condition of things was John Wilkes.

At that time most of the parliamentary representativs represented constituencies which did not exist. At that time both Lords and Commons sat in secret, and their proceedings were not known to the mass of the people. At that time the press was not allowed to discuss public affairs. Wilkes, who was a member of Parliament, had the courage, in a journal of which he was the editor, to criticise the speech from the throne of his majesty, George III., and in consequence he was sent to the Tower as the author of a "false, scandalous, and seditious libel," and expelled from his seat in the House of Commons. This blow embittered the opinion it was intended to destroy. "Wilkes and Liberty," became the cry of the people. In 1768 Wilkes was again chosen a member of the House of Commons by the electors of Middlesex. The house shrank from a contest, but the king demanded his expulsion, and he was expelled. As Northampton elects Bradlaugh over and over again, so Middlesex returned Wilkes time after time, and in the end he obtained his seat, while out of the agitation, the riots, and bloodshed which ensued, hav come something like genuin parliamentary representation, open Parliaments, and free discussion. But as Bradlaugh is traduced now, so was Wikles denounced in his day. It is amusing to think of John Wilkes despised as a worthless profligate by an age which looked upon the then Prince of Wales, the most profligate man of a profligate epoch, as the first gentleman of Europe. It is amusing to see the movement which Wilkes headed characterized by those who opposed it, because they were opposed to popular rights, as ignorant and brutal. What Wilkes was in his day, Bradlaugh is to this. He is the champion of parliamentary reform, and of the rights of the people, and the people stand by him as they stood by Wilkes. And this is why the slanderers are after Bradlaugh now, as they were after Wilkes when he undertook to overturn the despotism of a corrupt House of Commons.

Franklin said that if John Wilkes had had a good private character, and George III. a bad one, the demagog might hav dethroned the king. Wilkes's private character was as good as the king's. Wilkes's private character was as good as Franklin's, which was weak in the same spot where Wilkes was voted profligate. All this talk about "character" in Wilkes, and in Bradlaugh, is a subterfuge. Wilkes was expelled from Parliament because his presence meant the triumph of the people. Bradlaugh's expulsion meant the same thing. The despot is apt to cry, Demagog! and the leper to look for sore spots in every other man's warts.—Truth.

IT was a fireman's parade headed by a brass band. As they turned the corner, Gus Cæsar, who was holding up a hitching post, spelled out the letters, "E. P-l-u-r-i-b-u-s U-n-um," painted on the head of the big drum. "Now, Jake, now, wha—what's that?" he asked of a lank negro standing under the awning with his mouth open. "Don't yer know nuffin?" was the reply; "can't yer read? Dat's de name ob de man wot made de drum."

HATBORO, PA., Jan. 25, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL received. It is worth four times its price. Every Freethinker should hav one.

A. J. READING.

CASSETA, GA., Jan. 30, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $2, which you will place to the account of D. P. Hoggs, of Pineville, Ga.

I also mail you one of Joe Brown's speeches on the Mormon question. I thought you would like to see his opinion on the question, as he is a missionary Baptist, but a safe man.

I hope to see your valuable paper flourish. I was for years a reader of the Religio-Philosophical Journal, and believe in its doctrins. But its unjust course toward Brother Bennett made me drop it.

W. F. MOLDER.

UVALDE, TEXAS, Jan. 21, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Yesterday two of my old friends called to see me, and got to arguing about their church, which was the Methodist, and spoke of the different distinct creeds they knew of. I asked them if they had ever seen the Infidels' creed, and they both said they had not. I then showed them the "Infidels' Creed," by R. G. Ingersoll. One read, and the other said, "That is good. Let me hear that again." He read again, and called it all good.

There are but four Infidels here who are bold enough to acknowledge it, though I think many church-members here are only church-members through policy.

Some one has taken my paper out of the post-office and read it several times, but they won't let me know who it is, or I would lend them more to read.

Your Uvalde Infidel, E. L. DOWNS.

ONEKAMA, MICH., Jan. 9, 284.

MR. EDITOR: As there seems to be so much feeling among Prohibitionists and Antiprohibitionists, I thought I would suggest a new idea to discuss upon the liquor question. About everything that law could do has been tried to break up the liquor traffic, but the more law the more trouble. Now, if the legislature has a right to license and regulate the selling and disposing of liquor, it has a right to set the price. If a law could be made doing away with license and fixing the price at three cents a drink, that law would take away all the profits and would lessen the temptation to sell. All our liquor-sellers sell for the profits. Lessen the profits, and fewer will sell. Another effect this law would hav—it will bring the temperance people and liquor people together to fight a liquor law. It would take all the wind-work out of the temperance people and take all the profits out of the liquor business.

Yours truly, I. S. WEEKS.

MT. VERNON, IND., Jan. 13, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I send you a clipping from the Western Star of Jan. 10th, which might interest our friend Billings and others. Two boy murderers are to be jerked to Jesus on the 25th, at this place. They murdered another boy for fifteen dollars. They knocked him down, but first only stunned him. Then one of them held his hands while the other jumped on the victim's breast and cut his throat. The knife was a dull barlow—so very dull that the wretch had to use it as a saw, with both hands. This they both confessed. Young Vanwie, the victim, had no time or opportunity to ask forgivness and repent. It seems God failed to warn him in time. But the assassins hav made the customary peace with God, and are solid.

They'll journey safely to the Holy Ghost,
While Vanwie squirms in the eternal roast.

And this in spite of the fact that the mercury has just been 28 degrees below zero here.

C. O. ROWE.

LAFAYETTE, MICH., Jan. 10, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: At Forest Hill, in this county, on Dec. 30, 1883, a discourse was delivered at the church, and the subject was "The Undue Familiarity of Divine Things." The subject was called out by an article in our county paper entitled "The Water Question in Lafayette," in which the writer made some unpleasant remarks that made the clergy and some of the dear flock squirm. I thought I would write you a few lines, and if you think best you can insert them in your paper. The subject is a good one, for all, or nearly all, of us doctors of divinity to consider, and I am exceeding glad that the ministry is waking up to the awful danger we are in, standing, as it were, on the high pinnacle of life and looking down in the dark valley of sin and death, and I am glad to hear the dear brother is waking up to his danger, and will flee while it may not yet be too late. Undue familiarity with divine things has caused many of us divines to mourn. I was once pure as the beautiful snow, but in an unguarded moment I fell, and it shook me up pretty considerable, and, in the language of Bill Nye, "it nearly knocked the the supreme duplex from its intellectual throne." So, dear brother, warn your little flock—that is, the dear part of the flock—against undue familiarity with divine things. I had to do it before I was safe, and if many others of us divines would hav done as you did December 30th, there would be more room in the prisons of the different states, as you can find out by sending 25 cents to 33 Clinton Place, New York city, and getting M. E. Billings's "Crimes of Preachers," many of which were caused by the undue familiarity of some of the dear flock with divine things.

ST. JACOB, D.D.

HOYTSVILLE, MICH., Dec. 26, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: I hav thought for a long time to write you and stop the good old TRUTH SEEKER, because I did not get time to read and did not feel able to pay for it; but when our immortal Bennett died, I thought that that old Comstock clan would try the harder to break up THE TRUTH SEEKER, and that it would not look well for a man of my opinion to forsake a paper that so fearlessly advocated my right and opinion. I hav waited, thinking that soon I would be able to remit. No doubt you hav heard how the crops turned out in Michigan this year. Well, I finally told my wife that we would pay up and stop THE TRUTH SEEKER. To-day I came in from the woods tired and hungry, and while my wife was getting dinner on the table she said, "You just ought to read the last TRUTH SEEKER; it has got such splendid reading in it. J. Hacker has got such a good piece in it on the land question." She said it seemed as though the paper grew better every week, and that she would rather hav it than all the rest of our papers, and that I might throw in the old Bible to boot.

Well, I stopped after dinner, read and rested, and we hav made up our minds to send you $5, for which please giv me credit, and we will curtail that amount from some other luxury. No doubt you hav read what Christ said about those fellows that came on the eleventh hour. Well, I don't believe that to be a good practice, but you see I hav drifted in that wake.

The Methodist church hav built a new gospel box here at Hoytsville; perhaps that has something to do with it, though I didn't giv a cent to build it.

Yours truly,

CALEB WOLLFERT.

SEATTLE, WASH. TER., Jan. 7, 284.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find five dollars, which please place to my credit, and send me—by return mail, so they may reach me in time for the Paine celebration—six copies of the "Truth Seeker Collection."

You will no doubt be surprised to find me writing from here. The explanation is most briefly made by stating that my Mormon friends—or enemies, just as you hav a mind to put it—wore me out. For an outspoken Liberal, no matter how honest he may be, to liv in any of the outside settlements—as we term all but Salt Lake City or Ogden—he must, to use a familiar expression, hav the means of living within himself. That is, he must be a farmer pretty well situated, or hav a pretty good income from other sources than public patronage, or the Mormons will make it hard pulling for him. I doubt if there are any other religionists practicing the principles of Know-nothingism as the Mormons do to-day; and even in the aforementioned cities, Salt Lake City and Ogden, the Liberal mechanic who depends on his daily earnings finds it close work to make a living, for the above reason.

Well, this has been the experience in my case, and had I staid there much longer I would hav been unable to accomplish what I hav done, which was to save enough out of the wreck of my effects and business to bring myself and family out to Seattle, where we are now living. As it was, I had to make great sacrifice to enable me to realize ready capital enough to accomplish it. Well, I am glad to see that you begin to get a better insight into the monster fraud called Mormonism. There are lots of good men and women among them, and it is a shame that the government does not step in by the enacting of proper and unmistakable laws, and "save them from themselvs." They are so thoroughly committed to their present policy that they cannot consistently do it themselvs. I tell you—and let my words be remembered—that if the government does not do anything to stem the present policy pursued there in Utah—I mean the Mormon political policy—it will in but a few more years go down in blood. I can giv my reasons why if they are wanted, but I think it must be self-evident to all thinking minds that such is the truth.

So here I am in Seattle, the queen city of Puget Sound, the inland sea of America. I am pleased with the change, though so reduced in circumstances that I hav to work at my trade as a journeyman shoemaker, the business our dearly remembered champion and martyr for Freethought's sake, D. M. Bennett, worked at, but under much more favorable circumstances than he. But here there is, I believe, a much better chance for me than in the place I left behind me, and I hope yet to get in better shape. In the mean time I shall, as in the past, keep plodding along, and do all I can to advance the Liberal cause. I find there is hereabout quite a large Liberal element, men and women too, who assume to do their own thinking. There is an association here called the Liberal League of Seattle. It is not yet an auxiliary of the National Liberal League, but proposes to become such. They hold their regular Sunday evening meetings in a hall about forty by one hundred feet in size, and hav a very good regular attendance. Last Sunday evening there must hav been all of three hundred persons in their audience.

We hav organized a choir since I hav been here, and to show you the interest manifest in our gatherings, without any notice, private or public, having been given of the same, there was, a suggestion being made by a person present to that effect, a subscription list passed around among the audience, which resulted in about sixty dollars being subscribed toward the purchase of an organ for the choir. This was at the above-mentioned meeting. How is that for good prospects? Another thing I must tell you: we are going to celebrate Paine's birthday, and intend to do it in good style, and in a way that will attract attention. Dr. York, of California, is engaged for the occasion to giv us a rousing speech; and we are not going to let it rest there. He is going to stay and lecture for us during February.

Fraternally yours, WALTER WALKER.

PRIMITIV CHRISTIANITY IN THE WEST.

BRIDGEPORT, IOWAY, Januery ateenth, ateen aty-fore.

MISTUR EDITUR: Sam Jones, the blacksmith heer, giv me a copy of yure paper the uther da and told me it wuz a religus paper, and es i write fur the religus papers sumtimes, i thot i wood send you a leter to let yure reedurs no uv a outrage which was cummitted heer last weak.

ime a preechur in the Hoppleite church. mebby you don't no what that meens. ile tel you. You se Bruther Hopple had a revelashun from Jeses Crist last sumur. it wuz this wa: Bruthur Hopple wuz out a-grubbin' wun da, and it wuz turribel hot, and he lade down under a ellum-tree, and he went to slepe, and he had a dreem, and when he woke up he seed the Lord a-standin' rite clost bi; and he ast the lord what he wanted; and the lord told him he wanted him to organize a church uv the Hoppleite faith, and that he wanted him to set the wimmen to preechin' uv the gospil, and that he wuz the chozen wun to hoom the kees uv heven wood be given. So Bruthur Hopple thot precchin' wuz easier than grubbin', and he told the lord he'd do it. So the lord reveeled to him the tru plan uv salvashun, and Bruthur Hopple he reveeles it to the fokes heer. the churches hev bin mistaken all the time. they haint been a-doin' uv the wil uv god a tal; but they didn't no no better, and so they aint ez much to blaim ez tho thade a-node more about it; but sence Bruthur Hopple has lernt the truth, we've had a good time, and we've brung a power uv soles tu god. the yung men are offally tickled with the preechin' uv the wimmen, and the wimmen are ez tickled ez the men iz.

well, the uther nite we wuz a-havin' a good time. It wuz jist twelve o'clock, and tha wuz a whole passel uv soles jist about reddy to come tu Crist, when ole Bet Kestler—a grate big ole made, weighing sum twu hundred pounds, and a cammelite uv forty years' standin'—undertook tu disturb the meetin' by leavin' the house durin' divine servus. the reverunt Sister Hopple hed the floor, and she sez to Bet, sez she: "Ef you don't like our plan uv salvashun, jist git out uv hur; and ef there is any more nasty Cammelites thet wants tu go tu hell, they can git up and go rite now." Bet stopped, and the rev erunt sister Slocum razed up and told her not tu stand upon the order uv her goin', but tu go at wonce—or twice; I don' remember wich. Jist then, Sister Tabitha Smith riz up and told her she wuz a disgrace tu the coz uv Crist, and that if she didn't leve sheed scrach her ize out. at that, Bet shucked her shawl, and them three feemail lambs uv god lit intu her, and the way the hair and finger-nales and collars and brestpins and ribbons and calico and bonnets and things flu fur about a min nit wuz a caushin tu sinners. at the first dash Bet nocked reverunt sister Hopple cleer under the bench and in between Elder Jones's legs. She then maid a dash at Rev. sister Slocum, and butted her rite in the stummick, and she puked all over elder pendergrass ez she lade in his lap. rev. Sister Smith hed retreeted intu the chimbly corner, where she wuz a-hollerin' fur Jeeses tu cum and cast out the devil thet hed got luce in the meetin'-house. and don't you think he never done a thing for us!

Well, Betsy seed her a-standin' there, and she tuck her by the scuff of the neck and farely wiped the floor with her. she yelled like a painter and kicked like a mule; but Betsy hed her foul, and ef it hadn't a-been fur Bruthur Hopple there's no noin' what she would a-done tu her; but, you see, he's inspired, so he allers noes what tu du. he jist got up on a bench and shouted to parson Sype tu git thar—"Git thar, Bruthur Sype; for the love of god, git thar, and hold Betsy, fur she's mad, and she'll tare everything tu pieces ef you don't hold her." the parson weighs twu hundred pounds, and he had all he cood du tu hang on tu Betsy, while we carried Sister Smith out and put snow in her face so thet sheed cum tu her senses. we got down on our nees in the snow and praed for god tu bring the rev. sister Smith back tu life; and we wuz rewarded, for in about twu minnits she commenced a-wigglen like, and hollered, "Enuff, enuff! take her off!" So, you see, the prairs uv the richous availeth much, and miricles kin be purformed yit. it tuck four uv the stoutest members uv our church tu carry Betsy out and hold her in the sno til she cood cool off; but when she did cool off she jist rose up and commenced singen, "Oh, wen shall I see Jeeses and rome with him above?" but they woodent let her back intu the church, but brot out her things, and she lit out for home ez happy ez a clam.

it duz bete all how hardened these Cammelites can git!

Well, uv corse, after the devil hed bin cast out, peece raned in Warsaw, and i preeched seeh a powerful discorse that several uv the wurst carracters in the naborhude cum forard fur prares; and seeh annuther outporin' uv the spirut i never witnest afore or sence. we cood smell the licker in there breth when we wuz prayin' over 'em, but we never let up; we stuck rite tu 'em till dalite, and at sunrise we cut a hole in the ice on south river and baptized the hole lot, and we felo tu thank the lord that these pore sinful creeturs air safe in the paster uv Jeeses. i haint red yure paper that Sam Jones giv me, but i hope yure a-prosperin' and that yure family is—— wel, mistur edditur, mebby ime a-treddin' on dangerous ground; mebby yure not marrid, and ez ime a singel womin of marrageable aige, I gess ile cloze by askin' you tu call ef you ever cum this way.

Yure sister in Crist, REV. ABIGEL SPARKS.

EARLVILLE, ILL., Jan. 29, 284.

MR. EDITOR: I now seat myself to pen you a few lines in memory of that dead hero and emancipator from slavery and superstition, Thomas Paine. When I think of the memorial meetings that are being held to-day, it gives me a spring of joy to think that the day is near at hand when his name will be vindicated from all his maligners. How glad I would be to meet in such a gathering and shake the friendly hand with those that are seeking after the truth and do not propose to accept blind faith! I never hav been in such a gathering yet, but would like to get out of my old church ruts to where I could breathe the pure air of liberty of thought, for I hav spent the best of my days in trying to support the priesthood, and thought I was doing God a great service. But oh, what a dupe I was to blind faith. I am glad I hav got my eyes open to see the working of priestcraft, even at this late hour in life. If I were only at the end of some wire, I would telegraph to you that I and my daughter and little granddaughter, aged eleven, are all celebrating Thomas Paine's birthday by eating a little candy and thinking and talking about your Bennett League meeting to-night.

I hav received my FREETHINKERS' ALMANAC, and hav read it almost through—all but the story—and don't see how so much information could be crowded into one book for twenty-five cents. If I were only rich everybody should hav a FREETHINKERS' ALMANAC from me. I think it would be the best missionary work that could be sent out here in America. And I would not exchange my almanac for all of your quit-claim deeds in heaven, with warranty besides, thrown in for Christian measure.

There are in my ANNUAL but two things with which I cannot very well agree, and those are the 8th and 9th planks of the Milwaukee congress: prohibition against prohibition, and elections on Sunday before the Sunday laws are repealed. I think it is a little ahead of the times. I think the Freethinkers can hold the balance of power, as they hav in Ohio, better than they can to hav a new party, by defeating the party that is the most corrupt, if the Freethinkers think they hav wisdom enough to tell which is the most corrupt. We all should try for good morals and do away with everything that tends to corrupt good morals and bring about a reform whenever possible to do so.

I am somewhat surprised to know that there hav been such internal commotions in the Freethought ranks as I read of in my ANNUAL. All should see the importance of working against priestcraft and for secularism, and not against each other, for there is work enough for all to do in the world of Freethought, without throwing one stone at each other, or even at a tramp.

I hav spun out a yarn to you, and shall hav to take another sheet to finish on. SARAH C. HILTON.

SPANGLE, WYO. TER., Jan. 26, 1884,

MR. EDITOR: We are trying to organize a Liberal League here, and hav got fifteen names to our paper so far. Our aim is to get a small library to convert some of those Christians who hav too much holiness. They will hav to throw it up after a while. We are trying to do all we can for Liberalism.

I remain, as ever, a true Liberal friend,

HARRISON HAYS.

SHERIDAN, MICH., Feb. 6, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose $5.00, which please use as directed. I hav been away down in Delaware, where I missed your paper very much. The people are very pious there, but their piety doesn't prevent their committing wrongs. Bright boys and girls living in the shadow of the school-house, whose complexion does not happen to be popular, are not allowed to attend school. Is it a curse that mother nature pronounced upon those people when she gave them dark complexions? No, indeed! she gave them warm true hearts filled with goodness and mercy; hearts that will forgiv us for all our crimes against their race, and minds as capable of progression as our own. And yet the pious praying whites will, in the name and by the authority of their God, treat them as outcasts, and offer them every possible insult and injustice. It is only as people rise in the scale of intelligence that they can be just and generous, only as they renounce a belief in all the gods that they can be charitable. As long as a belief in God remains, evil-minded people will claim his aid in wronging and oppressing their fellow-beings. We shall never know whether our acts are wrong or right until we consider them as affecting humanity instead of God.

The orthodox here are holding revival meetings. They hav regular seasons of getting religion, and every winter they must needs get it all over again. They will shout, "I double dare you to come to Jesus," call those who do not come fools, and though their ravings are said to be terrible I hear no talk of sending them to the asylum. It seems to be a sort of periodical insanity that will subside as spring opens.

Oh, why will not people be guided by reason instead of blindly following fear and faith? They talk about our reason proving us immortal, but if reason places us above the brutes, and we refuse to use it, what better are we than they. If reason will render our existence endless, why not use it in solving the problem of present existence, instead of leaving the question to impostors, pretended middle men between us and "the powers that be?" With all its imperfections, what a heaven this world might be if each would contribute his share to make it such! We hav not the time and happiness to waste in quarreling over a difference of opinion concerning that which none of us can know.

"Then let us to the present turn,
Life's present lessons here to learn,
What faith, what errors to forsake,
What paths to shun, what paths to take.
We wish to gain a heaven below,
And shun a hell of vice and woe;
And what is heaven to you and me,
But peace, and love, and harmony?"

Yours very truly, MISS E. A. GLEASON.

INGALLS, KAN., Feb. 5, 284.

MR. EDITOR: Glad to inform you that there is weeping, and wailing, and gnashing of teeth among God's elect about this time in our township. We celebrated our hero's birthday at my house, and it resulted in an organization which is to be known as the "Orange Liberal Association." The object of the association, our constitution says, shall be to labor for the advancement of the young, and to excite in them a thirst for knowledge, a love for the good, the true, the beautiful. And further, to labor by word and action to purify the moral atmosphere, and to keep good sentiments uppermost, that society may hav a protection beyond the law and above the law in the prevalence of enlightened and well-principled sentiment. There hav been camp-meetings, Sunday-schools, and revivals conducted by God's commissioned sky-pilots, and yet there is need of Liberal writings to purify the moral atmosphere which has been made foul by the believers in ghosts, begotten gods, and cloven-footed devils.

We got up a Liberal sociable on the 29th, and sent out and bid our orthodox friends to come and eat with us, and they would not come. And again we sent out and bid them come, for we had pies, cakes, oysters, and canned fruit in abundance, and that we wished them to come and enjoy themselvs with us. But they made light of it, and went their way as usual—one to abusing us, another to destroy our influence. and another did sit down and tear his gray hairs, while another smote his breast and cried, "Imps of hell! Children of the devil!" While another did come even unto thy servant's house as your coworkers in the vinyard of truth were about to partake of the good things prepared for them, and to chat pleasantly about our champions of right, to speak lies unto us, believing that the word of God would more fully abound. But when thy servant did see his sanctimonious face, and did hear him speak lies for the glory of God, thy servant was not deceived; neither did thy servant, who has learned at the feet of the great Gamaliel, D. M. Bennett, treat the spy scornfully. But all thy brothers and sisters whose religion is to do good treated him kindly, and bid him eat, but the spy said he had just eaten very hearty, and could not eat more; that he had come in haste for a lance to bleed his horse, which was about to die. Wherefore thy servant did grant his wish immediately, but the spy did not go until night had drawn her sable curtains about, and then the spy did leave with a full stomach, to work us mischief. Whereupon the inclosed list of persons did band together, not to beat the spy, but to purify the moral atmosphere. Our committee consists of three noble women. Some of the members are Spiritualists, and some are Infidels; but we propose to work together for good. A. BUTTERFIELD.

FORT MADISON, IOWA, Jan. 6, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I hav concluded that on this "Lord's day" it would be eminently proper for me to send you a few lines by way of remembrance.

Now for a few words of admonition, etc. I like the way you conduct your paper very much, but there is a something lacking for me, both in its correspondence and editorial departments. I don't write to find fault or dictate, but I hav stopped several Liberal papers because there was too little soul in them. I can't express myself so as to be understood, perhaps, but I wish I could. If I had the language of an Ingersoll or Bennett, I might. Let me giv my experience, which will let in a little light on the subject. I talk with my Liberal friends on the subject of organization in our town, and I find nearly everyone too careless and indifferent to things of a reformatory nature. They seem to care nothing for the advancement of humanity—think it not worth while to try and hav a public standard of morals and giv character to our position on Freethought questions before the public. Of course I don't expect every one to think as I do, but it does seem to me as if we, as Liberal-minded men and women, must do something besides the taking and paying for one or two Liberal papers; that we hav duties to perform—duties we owe to the world to pay for having lived in it. Here we pass the infant stage of life, and prepare ourselvs for a higher state of existence, and when we can see so plainly the ignorance, superstition, and bigotry of the masses, we should be willing to do something to dispel it. That is, that we, as Liberal-minded men and women, should be willing to organize for the improvement of ourselvs and society, and let our organization be founded on pure morals, and be a sort of beacon-light to every struggling son and daughter of humanity, assisting to a higher life and nobler aspirations.

I hail with pleasure your introduction of a youth's department, and now let us hav more from correspondents' and editorial pens on subjects pertaining to a higher life here and in the future. Of course it is not expected that we are to make THE TRUTH SEEKER a Spiritualists' paper, but there is nothing surer than that the doctrin that "death ends all" will keep people's minds on so low a plane of thought that nothing can be accomplished that could be done on a higher plane of thought and aspiration.

What is being done is all right (even by Brothers Winter and Trevitt) as far as it goes, but the horizon of such a mental world is too limited and contracted for me, the mental food and sustenance too thin. No person is to be blamed for what he cannot comprehend. The subject of immortality must be studied to be realized and understood, notwithstanding our "conscious individuality."

I hav not written as I intended, but will close intending to make my views plainer in a future communication.

J. R. TEWKSBURY.

SPRING FORGE, Jan. 23, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: The gradual retreat of the great Brooklyn preacher, and the surrender of one orthodox fort after the other, to the advancing phalanx of the Liberal army, reminds me of a little story which I read fifteen years ago in our first German reader, and which I will try to quote and translate from memory as good as possible: Little Frank meets his uncle in the woods, and as the latest news tells him that papa had bought a dog as large as an ox. "Yes, uncle," he added, "you ought to come with me and see it, it's the biggest dog you ever saw." "I shouldn't doubt," said the uncle coolly, "if it is really as large as an ox; but I think you are mistaken." "No, sir, I ain't mistaken; don't you think I know what an ox is?" "You ought to know it at least," replied his uncle; "still, I guess you probably meant to say as big as a calf, for such dogs are quite numerous." After some more of Frank's distinct and obstinate nays, his uncle ceased to object, and—entirely against Frank's expectation—agreed to Frank's invitation. After they had left the woods, Frank grew somewhat uneasy. "Well," said he, "you know, uncle, I did not exactly mean as large as an ox, still it is a good-sized dog—about as big as a young cow." "Never mind," replied his uncle, walking now at considerable speed, "we'll soon see what sort of a thing it is." Franky followed reluctantly the long paces of that cruel uncle, who always wants to find out everything himself. "You needn't go so fast," he said, interrupting the silence. "I guess you were right; that dog, you know, is not much bigger than a calf neither, you know, like one of those little calves, and it's of no use to go there." "Never mind, we are over half way now," said his uncle, "and we'll soon see how big he is." But when the roof of the barn came in sight, the little story-teller was almost crying, and when they approached the house he confessed, sobbing, "Why uncle, I was mistaken, you see. I know it is just a common-sized dog like yours. I was only making fun."

The moral application is easy.

Next Tuesday will be undoubtedly a holiday in all Liberal circles of America. I, and probably a good many other Freethinkers, will hav neither time nor chance to attend any one of the Liberal services held to celebrate the birthday of one of our saviors; but may they join with me in the glorious hope that the nearest future will see the time when Christmas, Easter, Pentecost, and all the mediæval festival days of the Christian church will cease to be celebrated, when the Bible will be replaced by the gems of our literature, when the pulpits are transformed into rostrums, and the church bells ring no more unto weak-minded mortals who gather about an ignorant puppet, like the moths about the light; but when a gay, industrious, and inquisitiv assembly shall listen to the apostles of true wisdom; shall enjoy with equal rights the achievements of the fine arts, and worship the ideal of the pure, good, and beautiful in the temple of reason; in this temple we shall no more hear the infamous blasphemies against the most sacred; but the names of the martyrs of truth and right, their life and deeds, will be made known unto us that we may follow their noble example, and no more suffer mankind to disgrace this beautiful earth with civil and religious wars, with flaming pyres, and monstrous towers and cathedrals! Watch and work, for the foe is yet powerful. Never look back, but behold the golden shore on the dark horizon.

Few are the fearless pilots who strive to guide the floating host of mankind's noblest sons safely over the mortiferous Charybdis of priestcraft and monopoly. Alas! methinks I can behold the manes of Washington and Paine hovering over the proud capitol, and the words of the Roman patriot and orator resound within me as an echo from Paine's grave, carried over the land by the winter storm, "Ego ejeci reget, vos introducitis tyrannos." (I hav banished kings, you introduce tyrants.) Tyranny listens not, priestcraft hides behind the ramparts of palaces and churches; but we—we must hearken to the voices of suppressed mankind crying to a void heaven for vengeance.

Please send "Sepher Toldoth Jeshu," and oblige me with stating the price of an English translation of the "Talmud."

Yours truly, F. W. OPP.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., Feb. 2, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I was exceedingly pleased to come across one of your papers, and think it deserves the most energetic and hearty support of the Freethinking people all over the world. It is the best agency for mental intercourse which we Liberals can hav, and I hope your most deserving enterprise will be upheld by every free hand and soul in the country.

Please put me down as a subscriber for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and you will find inclosed a draft for three dollars for one year's subscription. Yours very sincerely,

MR. EDITOR: If convenient you can say in THE TRUTH SEEKER there is plenty of good vacant land unsurveyed, and almost unexplored, along the Pacific coast, west of the Olympic range of mountains, between Gray's Harbor and the mouth of the Straits of San Juan De Fuca, that is an inviting settlement. MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5.75 for two years' subcription to THE TRUTH SEEKER, from Feb. 7, 1884, to Feb. 7, 1886; and 75 cents for "The Truth Seeker Collection." I hav been reading your paper since the publication of "An Open Letter to Jesus Christ," and "An Hour with the Devil," and I shall continue to read it as long as I liv. I hav watched with pleasure the progress your paper has made.

The death of Mr. Bennett was a great loss to our cause, and was felt by me as well as by every Freethinker, but there is consolation in knowing that men like yourself, Messrs. Andrews and Putnam, etc., are filling his place. It givs pleasure to read letters from friends and get their ideas if they agree with mine or not. There is many a man amongst them I would gladly giv my hand in token of brotherhood. But as I cannot do that personally, I shall hav to introduce myself to your readers (especially to those of the same sentiment as mine) through your worthy columns. I was born in Bavaria, Germany, Feb. 20, 1820, and am, therefore, sixty-four years old; was brought up as a Catholic, am a painter and musician by trade. My politics, Democrat up to the beginning of the late war, from thereon a Republican; but I hav lost a good deal of faith in the "glorious party" since men like Anthony Comstock and other temperance and church frauds try to run it. I would like to see a new party with men like Robert Ingersoll, Elizur Wright, and others, at the head of it. I am a Materialist like Thos. Winter, Elmina Slenker, and others, whom I got acquainted with through your worthy paper. I became a Materialist forty years ago. In 1844 I was at work in a Catholic church at Detroit, Mich., for Mr. Dekler, a painter. One day the Rev. Kop came in church to baptize a child. After getting through he came to Mr. Dekler and said, "What scandal did you commit before our bishop's house? If you had stayed five minutes longer you would hav been arrested." Mr. Dekler replied, "Rev. Kop, I told Bishop Lefevere nothing but the truth when I said he was imposing on the people by telling them he could make the body of God out of a piece of bread. I tell you, Rev. Kop, God can make man, but man cannot make God. The baker can make a loaf of bread, but the loaf of bread cannot make the baker." I expected the reverend would contradict, but he laughingly said (it was not meant for me to hear), "You are right, Mr. Dekler, but please keep it to yourself." I then thought over the Rev. Kop's words and what he said turned me from a good Catholic to a Freethinker. I then subscribed for the Fackle, a German monthly organ, edited by the great Freethinker, Samuel Ludwig; also for the theological works by Thos. Paine. These men hav done much for humanity and they are the right kind of saviors. Their works, with many others, I hav read. The first time I read your paper I found I was a real Freethinker. Proof of my esteem for THE TRUTH SEEKER, I hav kept every copy since I first subscribed. Counting me as a life subscriber,

I remain very respectfully, ANDREW MULLER.

The Bear and the Monkey.

A bear, with whom a Piedmontese
Joined company to earn their bread,
Essayed on half his legs to please
The public where his master led.

With looks that boldly claimed applause,
He asked the ape, "Sir, what think you?"
The ape was skilled in dancing laws,
And answered, "It will never do."

"You judge the matter wrong, my friend," Bruin rejoined; "you are not civil.
Were these legs given for you to mend
The ease and grace with which they swivel?

It chanced a pig was standing by;
"Bravo! astonishing! encore!"
Exclaimed the critic of the sty;
"Such dancing we shall see no more!"

Poor Bruin, when he heard the sentence,
Began an inward calculation;
Then, with a face that spoke repentance,
Expressed aloud his meditation:

"When the sly monkey called me dunce,
I entertained some slight misgiving;
But, pig, thy praise has proved at once
That dancing will not earn my living."

Let every candidate for fame
Rely upon this wholesome rule:
Your work is bad if wise men blame,
But worse if lauded by a fool.

[Tomas de Yriarte, the author of the above lines, was born on the island of Teneriffe, Sept. 18, 1750. He was a great student and prolific writer. In 1786 he fell under the censures of the Inquisition, on a charge of inculcating Infidel principles, and was obliged to perform a secret penance to obtain absolution and save his life. This, with his laborious and studious habits, affected his health, and he died Sept. 17, 1791.]

Tommy Tuckapod's Mishap.

BY UNCLE WILL.

"Oh dear! I don't see why pa don't buy wood already sawed; its awful hard work with this dull old saw. All the boys are going skating down on Benson's pond, and here I hav to stay at home and saw, and saw, and saw! It's just too bad—that's what it is!"

It was a beautiful Saturday morning in January; the sun shone brightly, the air was keen and crisp, and Tommy knew that the ice on the pond was in splendid condition for skating; and, besides, most of the boys of his acquaintance, taking advantage of the Saturday holiday, had made up a party to go down to Benson's pond, about one mile from the village.

Mr. Tuckapod, Tommy's father, was a hard-working man, who had as much as he could do to maintain his family in moderate comfort; and Tommy, who was about twelve years of age, and the eldest of several children, was required to do the family chores. He attended school all the week, and, consequently, had to work pretty hard on Saturday, so we find him this bright morning hard at work at the wood-pile, but in a very discontented mood.

"Hello, Tom! Ain't yer goin' skatin' wid the boys?"

Tommy looked up and saw Tim Sullivan leaning on the fence, with hands thrust into the pockets of his ragged coat, and a pair of bright skates hanging by their straps from his shoulder.

Tim was the bad boy of the village—the dread of every good mother, and the admiration of most of the boys. He had never been to school, and probably did not know one letter from another; but he possessed certain accomplishments that rendered him the envy of nearly every respectable boy in the village; he could smoke and chew tobacco, and was very proficient as a boxer. This latter accomplishment, especially, made him a leader, as it was fully believed he could whip any boy who was near his size in the village. Tim was sure to hav a hand in every bit of mischief that was perpetrated in the neighborhood. Yet he was so shrewd and cunning that he invariably escaped, leaving some other boy as a scapegoat, to be caught and punished.

"No, Tim, I can't go; I hav got to saw wood," replied Tommy.

"It's awful good skatin' down on the pond. Jim Long's just come from there, an' he says the ice is as clear and smooth as glass," said Tim.

"Yes, I know, but mother says I must get all my work done before I can go, and by that time all the boys will hav left the pond."

"You can saw yer wood when you come back; there'll be lots of time."

"No there won't. Anyhow, I would get a whipping if I went. Let's see your skates. My! but they're beauties! Where did you get 'em, Tim?"

"Bought 'em."

"What did you giv for 'em?"

"Two dollars."

"Whew! Where did you get the money?"

"Earned it last summer on the canal."

The summer preceding, Tim had made a trip from Canalport to Shelton, and return, driving horses on the tow-path. The trip occupied two weeks, and was the only labor he was ever known to perform, and for which he must hav received fabulous wages, as he accounted for everything that came into his possession as being the proceeds of that one freak of industry.

"Well, they are nice ones sure," said Tommy.

"Say, Tom! If you'll come along I'll help you cut your Sunday's wood when we come back."

"O Tim, I daren't. My father would punish me."

"Sho! What'll he care if you get your work done before night? Come along an' I'll lend you my skates."

Here was a temptation, indeed. Tommy owned a pair of skates, but they were old and worn, the straps were broken and mended—for this was before the time of club skates, with heel and toe clamps, and all modern improvements—and the prospect of being allowed to try a new and perfect pair was a powerful inducement. He hesitated.

"We won't be gone over two hours, an' I'll let you hav my skates half the time, then we'll get back and get your wood in before they miss you," said Tim.

Tommy yielded, and stealing up to the house entered the shed, or summer kitchen, dove head-first into an old barrel and fished out his skates, then pausing to see if he was observed, hurried eagerly, but with a guilty feeling at his heart, out of the back gate, where Tim was waiting for him. The boys ran down the alley and were soon at the big oak on the common, where about a dozen other boys were congregated.

Immediately they all set off in a body for the pond, all talking at the same time, whooping, shouting, singing, dancing, turning handsprings, and in a thousand ways peculiar to boys, venting their overflowing spirits.

Tommy tried to join in the fun, but there was a heavy load at his heart, an overwhelming consciousness of wrong doing. He thought of his mother's sorrow, and father's anger when his disobedience should be discovered. The thought came to him to go back at once; perhaps his absence had not been noticed; it was not too late to retrieve his error. Had he but obeyed the impulse, he would hav saved himself much suffering; but he thought of the ridicule that would be heaped upon him by his companions, and he could not endure that; he would rather take a whipping than become the target for his playmates' jokes, and so he allowed himself to be carried along with the crowd.

The pond was soon reached, and immediately every boy fell to work strapping on his skates. The ice was in excellent condition, and the fun and frolic waxed fast and furious. Forward circles, backward circles, figure 8's, all kinds of fancy skating were indulged in, with many a tumble, and much merry laughter.

Tommy found it difficult to hold his own with the other boys because of his badly-worn skates. He was compelled to stop, every few minutes, to tighten them on his feet, which he did by thrusting small sticks between the straps and his shoes, giving the rest of the boys a great deal of sport at his expense, several of them inquiring how he sold cord-wood! But, with all these drawbacks, he would hav been a happy boy if he could hav banished his disobedience from his mind; but the dull pain at his heart clung to him as the Old Man of the Sea did to Sindbad the sailor. He could not shake it off.

An hour passed. Tim said nothing about lending his skates, so Tommy ventured to remind him of of his promis.

"Wait a little while; there's plenty of time," said Tim.

After some time Tommy spoke again:

"O Tim, if you don't let me hav them now, I sha'n't hav time to try them at all."

"Wait till I skate round the pond once more, then you may hav 'em."

But Tim did not seem in a hurry to make the round; he stopped on the opposit side of the pond and began cutting figures and "showing off."

So the time passed until several hours had elapsed, and Tommy, giving up all hope of getting the skates, now tried to get Tim to keep the rest of his promis, and go home and help him with his wood. But still Tim put him off, until, completely discouraged, Tommy commenced to take off his skates to return home alone.

"Catch me, Tom, an' I'll go."

Accepting the challenge, Tommy was soon in hot pursuit; but Tim was a good skater, and several times, when his pursuer thought he had him, he would dart quickly aside and go flying in another direction.

Tim led the chase in the direction of a large air-hole at one end of the pond. Eager in the race, Tommy did not observe it until on the very edge; Tim darted to one side, just escaping the hand outstretched to grasp him.

Tommy attempted to turn, but unfortunately a strap broke, the skate turned over on one side, and the next moment he was plunged beneath the icy water,

Tim threw himself on the ice and screamed with laughter. The other boys came rushing to the scene, with shouts of alarm. Fortunately the water was only about three feet deep, and Tommy soon got on his feet, screaming and catching his breath, with fright and cold. With the aid of some of the boys he got on the ice, and what a plight he was in, soaked to the skin, a mile from home, a freezing wind blowing; he was, indeed, an object of compassion. Yet, now that he was safe from drowning, most of the boys could not refrain from laughing, even as loudly as Tim.

Oh, how miserable he felt! What would he not hav given to be back at the wood-pile, with saw in hand doing his honest work, with dry clothes on, and an approving conscience in his heart. But no, he must walk the long distance home, with every garment frozen stiff, and meet the tearful eye of his dear mother, and the punishment of his stern father. Escorted by several of the boys, he reached home at last; his mother, fearful for his health, at once divested him of his icy clothes and put him to bed, with a warm brick at his feet. At night, when his tired father came home, instead of taking his needed rest, he was compelled to saw the wood and do the neglected chores.

Fortunately, Tommy escaped a fit of sickness; but for a whole month, his father would not permit him to go outside the yard, except to go to school or on an errand. So you see his disobedience was followed with a very severe punishment; but, best of all, he learned a lesson that he never forgot, from that day to this.

Poetry.

Wendell Phillips.

What shall we mourn? For the prostrate tree that sheltered the young green wood?
For the fallen cliff that fronted the sea, and guarded the fields from the flood?
For the eagle that died in the tempest, afar from its eyrie's brood?

Nay, not for these shall we weep; for the silver cord must be worn,
And the golden fillet shrink back at last, and the dust to its earth return;
And tears are never for those who die with their face to the duty done;
But we mourn for the fledglings left on the waste, and the fields where the wild waves run.

From the midst of the flock he defended the brave one has gone to his rest;
And the tears of the poor he befriended their wealth of affliction attest,
From the midst of the people is stricken a symbol they daily saw,
Set over against the law-books, of a higher than human law;
For his life was a ceaseless protest, and his voice was a prophet's cry
To be true to the truth and faithful, though the world were arrayed for the lie.

From the hearing of those who hated, a threatening voice has past;
But the lives of those who believe and die are not blown like a leaf on the blast.
A sower of infinit seed was he, a woodman that hewed to the light,
Who dared to be traitor to Union when Union was traitor to Right!

"Fanatic!" the insects hissed, till he taught them to understand
That the highest crime may be written in the highest law of the land.
"Disturber" and "Dreamer" the Philistines cried, when he preached an ideal creed,
Till they learned that the men who hav changed the world with the world hav disagreed;
That the remnant is right, when the masses are led like sheep to the pen;
For the instinct of equity slumbers till roused by instinctiv men.

It is not enough to win rights from a king and write them down in a book;
New men, new lights; and the fathers' code the sons may never brook.
What is liberty now were license then, their freedom our yoke would be,
And each new decade must hav new men to determin its liberty.
Mankind is a marching army, with a broadening front the while;
Shall it crowd its bulk on the farm-paths, or clear to the outward file?
Its pioneers are dreamers who heed neither tongue nor pen
Of the human spiders whose silk is wove from the lives of toiling men.

Come, brothers, here to the burial! But weep not, rather rejoice,
For his fearless life and his fearless death; for his true, unequaled voice,
Like a silver trumpet, sounding the note of human right;
For his brave heart always ready to enter the weak ones' fight;
For his soul unmoved by the mob's wild shout, or the social sneer's disgrace;
For his freeborn spirit that drew no line between class or creed or race.

Come, workers; here was a teacher, and the lesson he taught was good;
There are no classes or races, but one human brotherhood;
There are no creeds to be outlawed, no colors of skin debarred;
Mankind is one in its rights and wrongs—one right, one hope, one guard.
By his life he taught, by his death we learn, the great reformer's creed;
The right to be free, and the hope to be just, and the guard against selfish greed.
And richest of all are the unseen wreaths on his coffin-lid laid down
By the toil-stained hands of workmen—their sob, their kiss, and their crown.

Mormon Branch of Christianity.

This branch, a cross between Moses and Christ's biographies, is justly receiving attention, because its members obey this revelation of its divine head on earth: "Thou shalt elevate thyself and woman by taking to thyself more wives than one, for, by so doing, thou shalt raise up seed to thy God, and insure to thy wives and thy children the joys of heaven."

Many will say, Is not Mormonism a branch of Christianity? In answer, its creed teaches that Jesus Christ is the son of their God, the eternal father, and a belief in a Holy Ghost. Their entities, as believed in, are the equals of those believed in and taught by Paul and the apostles, the popes of Rome, or seceders from his errors. It holds as ordinances, faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, repentance, and baptism by immersion, imputing the Holy Ghost to their called of God, by the laying on of hands. Being a branch of the Church of Christ, they are as much entitled to protection in worshiping God in their own way as are the Roman Catholics, Episcopalians, Presbyterians, Methodists, Baptists, or Agnostics.

Its Christ's atonement saves those who obey God's laws—no death-bed savior, no predestined angel. Its Christ is possessed of more reason than theirs, and will evidently out-last theirs, not having so much to do.

Its book of Mormon is a more recent issue of God's word, and its authenticity is better evidenced than is that of Douay or King James's version. It is not a greater corrupter of purity than other bibles.

The Mormons, with teachings of the Old and New Testaments refined, as their authority, are undoubtedly a branch of Christ's church on earth, as much so as are the popes of Rome, or the English, Greek, Moravian, or Methodist churches.

Why, then, are the Mormons more dangerous to our body politic, or morals and integrity, than are other Christian sects? All answer because their teaching and practice of polygamy demoralize man, and degrade woman to a gratifier of lusts and a beast of burden.

Acknowledging this charge to be true, and regretted, we claim that moral teachings and acts in this are improvements on the teachings and practices of God's peculiar people as recorded by Moses: Deut. xxiii, 18; Num. xxxi, 35-41; 1 Kings xiv, 23, 24; xv, 12; xxii, 46; 2 Kings, xxviii, 27; Hosea, iv, 10-19; v, 4, and others. What use were Kadish, Sodomites, Kadesha, put to? Were not their earnings a part of the revenue of the temple? We read that Tamar, in order to seduce Judah, arrayed herself in the garb of a "consecrated one," and accomplished her divine purpose. Such "sacred ones," then and since, were let to men outside, as also inside, the temples, and their hire went into its treasury. Such things as "sacred ones," or such acts, are not permitted in the Mormon temple, and the Endowment House is only used for the marriage of woman to man, after anointing. Nor, so far as known, hav the Mormons ever been guilty of sawing and hacking their enemies to pieces in cold blood, and sending their virgin daughters into prostitution for the benefit of their church's treasury. But, are the Mormons any worse for establishing an Endowment House than hav been, or are, other branches of the Christian church in establishing nunneries, monasteries, abbeys, societies of sacred hearts, sisterhoods, big and little, arraying girls and women in saintly garbs, who go wandering through our streets begging support for colonies of the grossest of men, claiming to be God's keepers? What can be more debasing and degrading to the purity and independence of woman than infant damnation, predestination, or confession of sins to a man? Does she not become a slave to fear of that man? Is she not thereafter a debased slave to him? Would she dare resist his carnal desires? Would she not fear him as one of God's vicegerents? How much superior the Mormon Endowment House practice is to the practices of the lecherous Moravians in the name of the Lord, or even the practice of our Germans the past and present centuries in Pennsylvania, New York, and other states, in bundling! God's word to orthodox Christians is the authority with the Mormons for plural marriages. Its plane of morality has actually been improved by the Mormons. They hav not, as yet, furnished the world with men as lecherous or bloodthirsty as Solomon and David are recorded by inspired historians to hav been.

We learn from the Bible that debasement of woman to use of God is of older origin than the book of Mormon. Orthodox Bibles made Eve the scapegoat for man, but unwittingly proves what the world once acknowledged, and will again acknowledge, that discernment of the truth of God and love was then, and has continued to be, in the possession of woman rather than man. She did not believe that to "become as gods" would debase her nor put "snakes in her boots." Woman is used by religious sects to enslave the people to their support. We are questioned by Capel, by Canon Knowles—who proclaimed woman's place was "at home rearing children for the church"—and leaders of other Christian bodies with "What are you going to do about it?" And the people ask, "How can we escape them?" No unification of Christian churches against this leprosy, because they are all trying to inoculate their people with the same poison.

The framers of our Constitution, although surrounded by gods created by the passions of men, were inspired to know that God was unknown, could not be described, that they knew no more about him than the most ignorant, and instead of putting a God in it they made it protect man in his right to worship God—an idol or a stone—in his own way. At this time, and up to Kosman, 1861, the priests of God, those most in favor, were those who deified slavery of the negro, and preached and taught that "slavery is divine," because it was the only "way whereby the blacks could get to heaven;" that slave breeding was divine because the souls of the bodies born for sale and whip would hav a chance, if obedient to the masters on earth, of looking into heaven.

To house and support the gods of this people requires immense wealth. The gods, individually, are very inexpensiv, neither eating nor drinking, marrying nor giving in marriage, but their supporters are. They must be clothed in fine raiment, faring sumptuously every day; and, although tithing is unconstitutional, still the whole people, either believers in a God or not, are tithed by paying taxes to an immense amount. Not having any state God, the followers, ministers, or keepers of the gods should be compelled to pay a tax on every dollar's worth of property used, owned, or rented in their god's service. The tax collected should be greater in rate than that of individuals or of manufacturers; being properties of their divinities, this payment would only require a will. Let supporters worship their gods in their own way, paying for the privilege of non-interference with others.

Followers of gods, violating earth's natural or civil laws through plural wives, Kadesha or "sacred ones," should be rooted out by enactments, which, not interfering with rites and ceremonies in worship, would, by exposure of all beastliness, destroy its practicers. "Plural wives," and their offspring that are, should be protected in the present and future at the expense of their husbands, but no more should be permitted. It being a civil act, the welfare of the people depending on their offspring, nothing, no custom, no act is lawful to do or encourage a liability to deteriorate the future citizen. Our laws can know no difference in gods; a wooden god can be seen and felt, but Jehovah, our creator, cannot be seen or heard by mortals. We feel God in our soul, but we know him not.—Miller and Manufacturer.

D. M. BENNETT'S LAST WORK.

A TRUTH SEEKER

Around the World.

FOUR LARGE VOLUMES.

With a steel plate engraving of the author in Vol. I. and each volume illustrated with forty-seven cuts.

BY D. M. BENNETT,

Late editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, author of "A Truth Seeker in Europe," "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," "Champions of the Church," etc., etc.

Handsomely bound in red cloth, $6.50; in leather, red edges, $9.50; in morocco, gilt edges, $10.50.

Readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER know the circumstances under which this work was written. The last words penned by the great author were for the fourth volume which was nearly completed at his death, and which will now contain an account of his world-lamented death and burial. Mr. Bennett was a very patient and faithful chronicler of the habits and customs of the different peoples of the many places he visited. The every-day life of all nations is laid before the reader by one who has visited them and beheld them with his own eyes. Particular attention is paid to the progress of Freethought in the various countries he visited, and the morality of so-called pagan nations is contrasted with the morality of Christian countries, much to the detriment of the latter The work is a

Freethinker's History of the World.

This work and "A TRUTH SEEKER IN EUROPE" should be in every Liberal's library Besides its intrinsic worth it is a memento of one of the greatest Freethinkers the world has known—of one who ranks with Voltaire and Paine in the force and clearness of his writings.

A NEW BOOK.

HORSES:

THEIR FEED AND THEIR FEET.

A manual of Horse Hygiene, invaluable for the veteran or the novice, pointing out the causes of "malaria," "glanders," "pink eye," "distemper," etc., and how to prevent and counteract them, by C. E. Page, M.D., with a treatise and notes on shoeing by Sir George Cox and Col. M. C. Weld. 150 pages 12mo, paper, 50 cents, extra cloth, 75 cents.

The value of the most of horses to their owners is measured by the amount and length of service that can be secured, and therefore all information relative to his care is very important. We have here in a condensed form much that is valuable on the care of horses, that has not before been published. The subject is considered from a new and original stand-point, and stated in a plain, practical, common-sense manner, showing how by proper care we may add many valuable years of life and usefulness to our horses. It discusses very fully the best means of putting horses in "condition" and keeping them so, the relation of feed to work, the best kinds of feed, and when and how to feed for the best results, including the care of work horses and of road horses. Tells how Mr. Bonner and others care for their valuable stock and keep them always in condition, and at less cost for feed than is usual with farmers and others. The causes of the various diseases to which he is subject, with methods of treatment, are given. The question of shoeing is fully considered, different ways are considered, and it is shown how under many conditions horses will do better service without shoes than with them, and Col. M. C. Weld, who is well-known authority, adds a valuable chapter giving his experience with barefoot horses. There is also an illustrated chapter on the "Signs of Character" and training of horses. It is safe to say that to every owner of a horse this book would prove invaluable. The price is only 50 cents in paper covers, or handsomely bound in extra cloth, 75 cents. By mail, postpaid. Remarkable Cure of Paralysis in One Week.

CINCINNATI, Dec. 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: As I feel greatly indebted to you for the benefit I hav received from your treatment, and the use of your Magnetic appliances, I can say without hesitation to those afflicted as I hav been that the effect was simply marvelous. Two weeks ago I was stricken with paralysis in my right arm and could not use it at all, but after wearing a suit of your MAGNETIC CLOTHING for one week, can use it quite as well as ever. I hav also been troubled with Dyspepsia and Kidney Complaint for a number of years, from which I hav suffered intensely, and, although doctoring all the time, never found but temporary relief. Since putting on your appliances I hav experienced great benefit, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav in the past two weeks, will soon be well. I would, therefore, recommend to those suffering as I hav your Magnetic appliances as the only means of effecting a sure cure. Yours respectfully,

WM. H. CLEMMER,
No. 80 Eastern avenue.

Remember that the same appliances which will effect a cure in a case of Paralysis will at the same time eradicate CATARRH or DYSPEPSIA in the same patient. We do not, like the Old School Physician, change medicins every day until, after dosing the patient almost to death, he may possibly strike something (if he is very skilful) that brings relief for the time being.

Neuralgia of the Heart of Six Years Standing Cured in Three Weeks.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., Dec. 11, 1882.

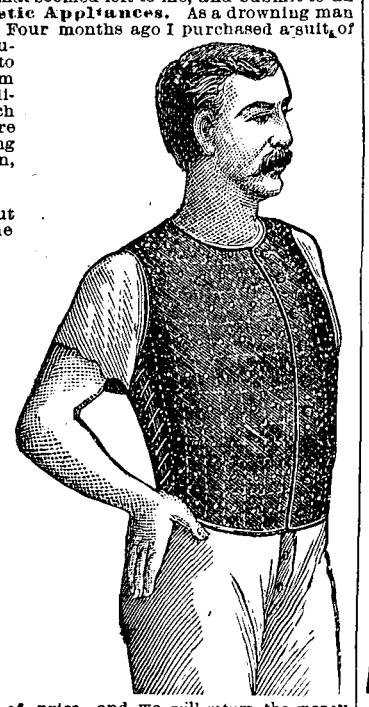
DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: After wearing one of your MAGNETIC VESTS for about three weeks, was entirely cured of Neuralgia of the Heart and Side, which had been a source of misery to me for the last six years. I had tried numerous remedies before without benefit, but as soon as I put on the MAGNETIC VEST I got relief instantly. With unbounded gratitude, I remain

Yours respectfully,
H. A. BROWN.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been under drug treatment for eight years with nervous prostration and female weakness:

OSBORN, O., Dec. 15, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY: Your letter just received; also the Clothing on Tuesday last. Fitted perfectly. FELT BETTER FROM THE FIRST HOUR I HAD THEM ON. Am not joking, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav since Tuesday, will soon be well. Will report again soon. Respectfully yours, E. J. K.



This lady reports herself entirely cured in less than six weeks after putting on the garments, and, although in bed, unable to get out, when applied, she nevertheless was able to ride twenty miles in two days after the application. The lady's name can be had upon application at this office, by anyone desiring to communicate with her.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been suffering for two years with an Ovarian Tumor, and who had been told that nothing but the knife would save her life, and the chances were as 9 to 1 against recovery. In four months' time she is perfectly well, and has not taken a dose of medicin since putting on the appliances. Consult us when your physician tells you he can do nothing for you; it will pay you.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., November 10, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY, Dear Sir: About two years ago my health began to fail me; I became nervous, lost all desire for food, and, in fact, began to fail rapidly, so that I became alarmed and consulted several physicians of St. Louis, at which place I was then stopping, all of whom declared that I had an Ovarian Tumor, and that the only thing that would save my life would be the knife. About six months ago I grew rapidly worse, and had about made up my mind to take the only course that seemed left to me, and submit to an operation, when my attention was called to the Eureka Magnetic Appliances. As a drowning man will catch at a straw, so did I catch at this faint hope of a cure. Four months ago I purchased a suit of your appliances. From the very first I felt invigorated, the tumor, which had extended entirely across my abdomen, began to decrease, my pains became less from day to day, until now I am as well as I ever was in my life. Since putting on the appliances I hav not taken a single dose of medicin. My bowels, which before were constipated, are now regular. I would therefore cheerfully recommend them to anyone suffering as I hav, believing that they will do all and more than you claim for them. I remain,

Gratefully yours, MRS. MARY J. STEWART.

Remember that these appliances are not worn next the skin, but over the under-garment, and, unlike all other appliances in the market, they impart no shocks and leaves no sores.

Gems of Thought.

IT may be no sin for a man to lack good sense; it may be no crime for him to be simple and overcredulous; it may not necessarily make him a bad man to believe every wild and unfounded tale he may hear, but certainly there is no virtue in becoming a fool, nor in swallowing every falsehood that may be uttered,—D. M. Bennett.

LIFE could not go down, if it were not admitted that impulses must be controled and that reason ought to govern our actions.—Mill's Autobiography.

THE weakness of the body and that of the mind in infancy are exactly proportioned, their vigor in manhood, their sympathetic disorder in sickness; their common gradual decay in old age. The step further seems unavoidable—their common dissolution in death. The last symptoms which the mind discovers are disorders, weakness, insensibility, and stupidity [stupor?]—the forerunners of its annihilation. The further progress of the same causes increasing the same effects totally extinguish it. Judging by the usual analogy of nature, no form can continue when transferred to a condition of life very different from the original one in which it was placed. Trees perish in the water, fishes in the air, animals in the earth. Even so small a difference as that of climate is often fatal. What reason, then, is there to imagin that an immense alteration, such as is made on the soul by the dissolution of its body and all its organs of thought and sensation, can be effected without the dissolution of the whole? Everything is in common between soul and body. The organs of the one are all of them the organs of the other. The existence, therefore, of the one must be dependent on that of the other.—Hume's Essays.

THE idea once conceived and verified, that great and noble ends are to be achieved, by which the condition of the whole human species shall be permanently bettered, by bringing into exercise a sufficient quantity of sober thoughts, and by a proper adaptation of means, is of itself sufficient to set us earnestly on reflecting what ends are truly great and noble, either in themselvs or as conducly to others of a still loftier character; because we are not now, as heretofore, hopeless of attaining them. It is not now equally harmless and insignificant whether we are right or wrong; since we are no longer supinely and helplessly carried down the stream of events, and feel ourselvs capable of buffeting at least with its waves, and perhaps of riding triumphantly over them, for why should we despair that the reason which has enabled us to subdue all nature to our purposes, should (if permitted and supported by the providence of God) achieve a far more difficult conquest, and ultimately find some means of enabling the collectiv wisdom of mankind to bear down these obstacles which individual shortsightedness, selfishness, and passion oppose to all improvements, and by which the highest hopes are continually blighted and the fairest hopes marred. —Sir John Herschel.

PLATFORM MOTTO.—In things proven, unity; in whatsoever can be doubted, free diversity; in all things, not trenching upon others' rights, liberty; in all things, charity.—S. P. Andrews. Though I speak with the tongues of men and of angels, and hav not charity, I am become as sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal. . . . Charity suffereth long and is kind; charity envieth not; charity vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up, doth not behave itself unseemly, seeketh not her own, is not her own, is not easily provoked, thinketh no evil; rejoiceth not in iniquity, but rejoiceth in the truth. . . . And now abideth faith, hope, charity, these three; but the greatest of these is charity.—1 Cor. xiii, 1-13.

"Go to the Bible!" said a sharp voice, etc. "You speak well, madam, yet there is room for a gloss or commentary on what you say." "He who would bring back the wealth of the Indies must carry out the wealth of the Indies!" What you bring away from the Bible depends to some extent on what you carry to it.—O. W. Holmes.

ERIGENA, a famous philosopher of the middle ages, flourished during the ninth century. He held that God is the essential ground of all things, from whom all things emanate, and into whom they return again. Pantheism, therefore, lurks in his system. His leading work is De Divisione Naturæ, and one of its leading thoughts is the identity of philosophy and religion, when both are properly apprehended. Erigena uttered his opinions with great boldness, and he exhibited no less subtlety and strength of intellect in their defense. He expressed his contempt for theological dogmatism, and vindicated the authority of reason over all other authority. His words are: "Authority is derived from reason, and not reason from authority; and when the former is not confirmed by the latter, it possesses no value."—Chambers's Encyclopedia.

> As for priesthood, I shall say but little;
> Corbies [crows] and clargy are a shot right kittle.
> —Burns.

FICHTE left Jena for Berlin. Immediately on his arrival, there was a hesitation among the state officials as to whether they should allow him to remain, both his political and religious opinions being of a questionable character. The matter was laid before the king, who replied: "So long as Fichte is a peaceable citizen, let him remain. If he has fallen out with the good God, then the good God must settle that. That is his affair, not mine."—Mrs. S. K. herman.

BARNUM'S great white elephant hymn for next season will be, "Just as Slam, without one flea."

A BOSTONIAN has just been arrested for marrying a dozen wives. He made a very creditable attempt to become the "hub" of the universe.

WHEN Clara was asked what she would do if a nice young gentleman would ask her hand in marriage, she naively replied, "I don't think I'd no."

"I ALLUS gets outen de way o' de man what is too smoove," says Uncle Mose. "De snake is a heap slicker dan de toad, an' he's nine times as pizen."

"WELL, my child," said a father to his little daughter, after she had been to church, "what do you remember of all the preacher said?" "Nothing," was the timid reply. "Nothing!" he exclaimed in a severe tone, "Now, remember, the next time you must tell me something of what he says, or you will hav to be punished." Next Sunday, the child came home with her eyes all bright with excitement. "I remember something to-day, papa," she cried eagerly. "I am very glad of it," said the father. "What did he say?" "He said: 'A collection will now be made?'"

"WHAT church do you belong to now, Abe?" was asked of a colored gentleman. "Mefrodist, sah." "Why, no longer ago than last Sunday you were a Baptist?" "Yes, sah." "What made you change?" "'Case da got too high up fur me, boss. W'y sah, de preacher made a s'atement, an' I got up and called him a liar, an' da tuck me to law 'bout it. Da said dat I oughter said dat he didn't tell de truf, but ter save me I kain' tell de difference twixt suthin' what ain't true an' er lie, so I thought ef da was gwine ter be so particular, I'd go ober ter de udder church whar a man ken slosh er 'roun' nachul."

"HOW'S your wife to-day?" the preacher asked of a parishioner, whose wife was reported dangerously ill the day before. "I don't know, sir; she's dead." "Ah, indeed? That's very, very sad." "Yes, sir, I know it, but there is a balm in Gilead, a recompense for all our sorrows." "Very true, very true, my friend, and I am glad you look at it in that light." "It's the best way, sir. I tell you I find lots of relief in the thought that she died during the cold spell, and there won't be no expense for ice to keep the body. Just think how it would hav been if it had happened in July with ice at three cents a pound and meltin' fast."

REVEREND WANGDOODLE BAXTER has considerable trouble in collecting his salary from the delinquent members of his flock. Uncle Mose, in particular, shows a great deal of delicacy in paying his pew rent. Not long since, Wangdoodle met Uncle Mose on Austin avenue and tackled him on the subject. "Uncle Mose, you hasn't paid up for de last two mumfs. Doesn' yer know dat dose who serbs at de altar mus lib by de altar." "Dat's so, my belubbed pasture, but dar am annuder text in de Bible what am in confliv wid dat ar." "Whar did you find 'em?" "I sarched de scripture and foun' 'em. I'se one ob de sheep of your flock, ain't I?" "You is, Uncle Mose, but I feels you am one ob de black sheep." "You ain't no strawberry blonde yerse'f, but ain't de commandment gibben to de shepherds and pastures of de flock, 'Feed my sheep?' and here yer comes to me—one ob de sheep—and wants ter be fed, you ole blackened sepulcum. Ef you means ter bide by de Bible, why doesn't yer lead dis heah sheep inter an ister saloon and set up a dozen on de half-shell? De good book say 'Feed de sheep;' but you don't do nuffin but shear 'em. Whar did you read, 'Sheer my sheep?' Go home, ole man, and sarch de scriptures, 'stead ob nosin' about me fer a stray quarter what I's arned by de sweat ob my brow, holdin' mules, and whitewashin' fences." We learn that a grand ecumenical council will hold daily sessions in the Blue Light Austin Tabernacle to pass on Uncle Mose's case.

BERYL'S ARK—A TALE OF THE FLOOD.

Cincinnati is inundated. Two young men, Gaston and Victor—stout young fellows of the type one sees so often among the peasantry of Britanny, but with features that show refinement and education—are standing at one of the upper windows of a building that has not yet succumbed to the flood. But its time of destruction is close at hand. Already the walls are crumbling, and in a few moments the noble edifice, but yesterday so proud and stately, will hav gone down in the general ruin. The young men know this. Their cheeks are blanched. They know that soon there will begin for them a struggle with death which can end only in defeat. The lips of Victor move, but the words they are uttering are rendered inaudible by the roar of the waters. His companion shouts to him:

"What are you doing?"

"Praying for my parents. My death will kill them. They liv in Coshocton.

"I also hav parents," says Gaston. "They liv in Akron. Include them in your prayers."

Victor nods his head.

Suddenly Gaston utters a cry. "Look!" says he.

Victor raises his head. Coming toward them is a beautiful girl. She is drowning. Gaston shrieks again. "It is Beryl!" he cries. "Beryl Hopkins, my betrothed!"

As he shouts the name to Victor the winds bear his voice to the girl, and she recognizes her lover. With the sight all her strength seemed to return. "Thank God!" she exclaims in clarion tones. "I can save you, although I myself must die," and by a mighty effort she plunges one hand beneath the waters. In a moment it reappears, grasping something which, as she sinks beneath the waters, the noble girl hurls through the window at which Gaston and Victor are standing.

. . . . . .

Five minutes later the building had sunk beneath the seething torrent, but Gaston and Victor are safe—floating securely down the stream in a craft which no storm, however severe, can wreck. Gaston sits in its stern guiding its course, while Victor sleeps peacefully under the bulwarks

She had thrown them her overshoe.

Notes and Clippings.

MENNONITES in Nebraska occupy three whole counties, are good farmers and hard workers, and so economical that their prosperity is remarkable.

AN Anti-Starvation Club is a novelty of Cedar Rapids. The object is to provide for members the best boarding accommodations at the lowest terms.

RESOLUTION by the miners of Alene, Dakota: "Not a Chinamen shall ever enter the diggings unless he climbs a tree, with one end of a lariat over a limb."

LINCOLN'S tomb at Springfield, Ill., is going to ruin. Two of the supporting arches hav collapsed, and one corner of the monument has settled several inches.

ANDREW JACKSON spelled money with a big M, and dollar with a big D, but wrote "almighty god" without capitals. He was a politician, and knew where the honor belonged.

NEW ORLEANS has taken up the subject of cremation. A society has several hundred members, embracing most of the physicians and many lawyers, merchants, and other business men.

JOSEPH COOK has invented "meiagnostic," meaning "a little knowledge." A little knowledge (which, we presume, means learning in this case) is a dangerous thing, and the word meiagnostic looks so.

GRANT'S parson, Newman, says $800,000,000 are spent annually on strong drink, while only $12,000,000 are spent for the support of preachers. This must be looked into. Twelve million dollars is a great deal of money to throw away.

A RECENT London dispatch says that three hundred Christians hav been murdered in Tonquin. We knew long ago that the race hereabout was getting extremely scarce. So it seems they all went to Tonquin. And now they are all murdered. This is sad, very sad.

PIOUS joke: Mention it is painful to make of a bashful young clergyman in Nebraska who lately rose, peony-color, to begin his sermon, and started off beautifully with his text as "And immediately the cock wept, . . . and Peter went out and crew bitterly."—Funny column in the Independent."

ONE morning recently Mrs. Mary Miller, a widow, of St. Elmo, Ill., crazed by religious excitement, walked into the Rev. Dr. Pierce's pulpit, and insisted on marrying him. That night she was barely prevented from dashing out her child's brains with an axe. She said she was going to offer the child as a sacrifice.

THE Baptist Weekly says: "The Christian Advocate, announcing special services at one of the Methodist churches last Sunday, says: 'It may interest some to know that the pastor has in his possession the cradle in which Bishop Janes and his twin brothers were rocked. It may be seen at the church next Sunday.' If, with such an attraction, there was not a full attendance, it is hard to tell what can be done next."

KATE FIELD says that when she goes to Massachusetts, "the land of the Pilgrim fathers, the home of Garrison, Wendell Philips, Whittier, Lucy Stone, and Julia Ward Howe," she finds that the women, the most enlightened in this country, are praying in vain to hav a voice in the making of the laws. When she goes to Utah, "where education is at its lowest, and culture is almost unknown," she finds woman enjoying suffrage.

AFTER the death of Peter Otterbach, a wealthy resident of Mahanoy City, Pa., last summer, it was ascertained that on the day preceding his demise he had made a will, in which, among other things, he provided that $2,000 should be paid to St. Fidelius Catholic church for masses for himself and his deceased wife. Lorenz Mertens, the residuary legatee under the will, objected to this, and began a suit which has just resulted in his favor, the court declaring that such a bequest for a religious purpose, and conditional, was against the law, and ordered that the sum be paid to Mertens. The case has aroused much feeling in the church.

DEACON DEWGOOD'S son returned home very late the other night from a pressing engagement with his pretty sweetheart. "Where hav you been?" growled the old man, as the youth came sneaking up stairs in his stocking feet. "Dear father," he replied, "I cannot tell a lie; I've been to a protracted meeting." And the good old man upraided himself for having treated his son so harshly.

PROFESSOR ADLER'S tenement house religion starts well. It proposes a somewhat new theory of regeneration, beginning with the idea that people do not want merely to be told to be good, but to be helped to liv in conditions where the practice of Christian virtues will be easier than they find it as they now liv. An endeavor to improve the sanitary and other conditions of tenement house life is an important step toward that end.—Herald.

THE Rev. Perry Mannis, who last fall was pastor of the United Brethren church, at Terre Haute, Ind., has just been convicted of murder and sentenced to prison for life. In September he induced an old widow of Anderson, Ind., to leave home for Kansas City with over $1,000. A month later her body was found in a ravine near Terre Haute. Mannis returned after a short absence, having plenty of money, and was arrested for the murder. He told his attorney he was willing to take a life sentence and the judge instructed the jury to bring in a verdict accordingly.

A WITNESS was objected to in the trial of a suit about a party wall in Baltimore, Md., a few days ago on account of his religious belief. The presiding justice said that the constitution of the state provides that a witness shall believe in God, but does not undertake to define what is meant by that word. If a man believes in moral responsibility and a system of rewards and punishments in this world or one to come, he is a competent witness. The witness answered that he did so believe, and the judge said: "Then you are as competent a witness as any man in Maryland."

VISITORS at the Crystal Palace, London, are now amused and instructed with a giant electric microscope and a powerful electric light installation, which show a large number of familiar articles, such as snuff, lace, cheese, vinegar, water, and beer. A drop of water presents the most extraordinary monsters imagination can conceive. Serpents, crocodiles, worse dragons than St. George had to deal with, whirl about through their liquid element, striking terror to the hearts of all beholders. Salt and sugar are exhibited as densely populated, and even the most carefully filtered water is filled with black specks, which float rapidly about, giving an occasional eddying whirl which suggests vitality.

THE Boston Advertiser's Salt Lake correspondent giv an interesting account of the revolt of the San Luis Park Mormons in Colorado against the political tyranny of the church, and lets daylight through some of the dark ways of the Latter-Day Saints. The San Luis Park Mormons are mostly Americans from the Southern states, and in common with all Americans they hav a jealous regard for their political independence. The attempts of the church authorities to compel them to vote for certain candidates opened their eyes to the fact that the church was engaged in making political bargains, and regarded its disciples as mere tools. Forty men first refused to be dictated to, and were promptly excommunicated. This aroused the rest of the voters to defiance, and about 300 of them denied the authority of the church, and renounced the system altogther. No doubt the foreign converts to Mormonism would hav yielded under such circumstances. Commenting upon this phase of the Mormon question, developed in the politics of Colorado, the Advertiser says: "The pride of these San Luis people was touched. The ordinary developments of Mormonism would scarcely hav driven them away from the shelter and the tyranny of the church. This fact givs emphasis to the proposition that if in some practicable way Mormon immigration could be stopped, the system would be weakened not only by reason of a cutting-off of the European contigent, but by disloyalty within. On American material, the Mormon leaders could not work with such facility, as on the reinforcements from over the sea. The Mormon hold is a powerful one, but it can be broken, as this case shows, when Americans are involved. The story of Mormon trades with political parties, and the attempt to hold the balance of power, is instructiv. The question why the movement against polygamy has been thwarted and delayed, is answered in part by the consideration that trafficking politicians hav cared more for personal and party advantage than for the extirpation of a great evil."

ALL who witnessed the play of "Facts," as given by the Florences here last week, will remember the game of poker where Florence for a time plays the part of a vulgar cheater, taking advantage of the ignorance of his associates. This cheating jars upon the sense of the audience, as the character portrayed by Florence is altogether too good for that, and there is a general feeling of relief when Florence hands the money back. It is not generally known that in the original play the money was not given back. The change to the way it is now played was made at the suggestion of Col. Ingersoll. Florence read the play to the colonel at Long Beach last summer. The colonel said at once, "Florence, you must giv back the money at the end of the game and treat it as a joke, or you will not be able to play the part in the last act. No vulgar card cheat can rise to the high ground of the final work of the play." Florence saw this instantly, and so was indebted to the colonel for one of the best points in the play.—Washington Post.

MR. E. G. GILMORE was telling the other night of some of the difficulties he experienced while acting as manager of the Madison Square Garden. The greatest trouble he encountered was in finding attractions suitable to the immensity of the establishment. After various ineffectiv efforts in odd directions, Mr. Gilmore was struck with the advisability of putting in a large panorama of the Holy Land. This institution received the hearty commendation of the Young Men's Christian Association and various church organizations, and Mr. Gilmore was encouraged. He wrote his relativs to the effect that he was on the point of departing from the sinful ways of regular theatrical life with a view of launching out upon a kind of pursuit at once extremely moral and very lucrativ. The proposition met with their vigorous approval, and, full of enthusiasm, Mr. Gilmore prepared to open. He had something like a barrel of written assurances of hearty co-operation. The expenses were about $2,500. Everybody admired the panorama, but for the most part their admiration was conducted from afar off. Up to Thursday the receipts had not reached the total of $700. Mr. Gilmore viewed the situation with profound gloom. In this melancholy frame of mind he was proceeding down Broadway in the morning of the day mentioned, when his eye fell upon the erect form of a well-known pugilist. Mr. Gilmore's face brightened. He overtook the fighter and engaged him in conversation. He learned that the artistic fisticuffer had not gone through the process known as "taking a benefit" in about a year. Mr. Gilmore asked him if he could manage an entertainment to take place on Saturday night, two days distant. The fighter thought he could. Terms were arranged then and there, and Mr. Gilmore went at once to the printers, getting out a famous announcement that all the "sluggers" in the country would be present to take part in the performance. "It was rather an abrupt change when we went from the Holy Land to a prize-fight," said Mr. Gilmore describing the event, "but we had enough money to giv us a profit on the whole week, and all the people who had indorsed the panorama and staid away from it were in the front seat to see the mauling."

News of the Week.

A BUST of the poet Longfellow was unveiled in Westminster Abbey last Saturday.

MATTHEW ARNOLD delivered his farewell lecture in this country in Chickering Hall last Sunday evening.

A BOX containing clock-work exploded in the post-office at Berlin, on the 2d inst., severely wounding an official.

A BILL is to be presented to the House this week providing for the exemption from tariff of lumber, salt, and coal.

EXPERIMENTS are being made with a telephone by which it is expected to talk across the Atlantic when the Bennett-Mackey cable is laid.

A DECLARATION on the part of the Irish National League in opposition to Henry George's land scheme was made at a meeting at Cork on Sunday.

El Progreso (newspaper) of Madrid has been confiscated, and its management will be prosecuted for publishing articles containing insults to King Alfonso.

THE lack of brotherly love is so great in Dr. Newman's church in this city, that last Sunday a sister refused to receive the sacrament at the hands of a deacon.

FIFTEEN hundred dollars was recently extracted by parties unknown from a package of money sent by express from Cleveland, Ohio, to Washington, D. C.

A CRUCIFIX ten feet high, alleged to be made of oliv-wood from the Garden of Gethsemane, has been placed on the cardinal's throne in the Cathedral in this city.

THE forces of El Mahdi, the False Prophet of the Soudan, met with defeat in a battle with the British troops last Saturday, one thousand being killed and wounded.

UTICA, N. Y., was visited by an $800,000 fire on Sunday last. The Utica Herald was burnt out; also the National Bank, which had $1,000,000 in its safe, supposed to be uninjured.

ORDINARY reading-books hav been supplemented in the schools of Newton, New Jersey, with the New York journals. The different newspapers are used in rotation, each one week.

MR. GIBBS, of this city, who is conducting temperance meetings at Cooper Institute, reports that the liquor-dealers are on their last legs. The staying powers of last legs now remain to be tested.

A ROCHESTER, N. Y., electrician has a scheme under way for utilizing the water-power of Niagara Falls to light sixty-five cities with electric lights. A capital of $22,000,000 is expected to be raised for the undertaking.

THE Presbyterians of Philadelphia are at loggerheads over the proceeds of a charity ball for the benefit of a Presbyterian hospital. The trustees of the hospital had a wrangle over it, and used very strong language. A majority voted to receive the money.

ANTHONY COMSTOCK arrested a large number of candy dealers last Saturday, charged with selling prize candy in violation of the lottery laws. On the same day a high Catholic dignitary of this city drew a sewing-machine in a lottery at a church fair on 23d street.

MR. BRADLAUGH has sent a letter to Sir Stafford Northcote, charging him with having violated the law in having had Mr. Bradlaugh excluded from the House of Commons. "That act," Mr. Bradlaugh says, "was mean and spiteful, and unworthy of an English gentleman."

AT the annual meeting of the Newark, N. J., Conference a charge of immoral conduct will be made against the Rev. George R. Bristor, D.D. The accusation is immorality with several boys. The Rev. Mr. Bristor is still preaching the gospel with great ardor. His name is apparently destined to decorate the pages of Col. Billings's celebrated Year Book.

A Freethought Romance.

Waifs and Wanderings.

BY SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

CHAPTER XVI.

HARRY.

The sergeant greeted Cupples in the morning light and told his adventures.

"I don't see how we can manage it," said he. "The woman is locked up with the baby, and he watches her like a lynx. He has a large mastiff to keep off intruders by night. And there's that enormous negro, silent as death, and as cruel, too, I believe. If he gets hold of you, Cupples, I think he'll swallow you at a gulp, and no one would know where you'd gone to. He's an awful nigger. If he could only speak I could stand him. But he is too much like the grave. He makes me shudder; and how to get round him, or over him, I don't know. I'm afraid I should get into him, and then there's an end of us."

"Can't you pisen him?" said Cupples. "Throw him a chunk of beefsteak."

"I'd like to. But he's as cunning as Beelzebub, and won't bite. It's a nest of devils there, from the master down. How to get those poor things out of their clutches I don't know. But I won't give up yet."

"Nor I. I know something can be done," responded Cupples, as he drank the rest of his coffee, and drew in a long breath of fresh air, looking upon the sparkling landscape. "There must be a way to help them, or there is not a God in heaven."

Presumptuous Cupples! He had not read theology enough to know that "whatever is is right." He gave way to the impulse of his heart, a thing of which theologians are never guilty—and hence their amazing wisdom."

"I'm stuck," said the sergeant. "It's a perfect iron wall about me. Only a miracle can tumble it down, and I'm afraid the day of miracles is over. They could blow their horns at Jericho, but here we must keep still as mice, and haven't even the advantage of noise, which, I tell you, Cupples, is a mighty help. I've seen many a thing go through by mere noise. It's the devil's best holt; and it's a pity we cant't use it. We must talk under our breath—and who can succeed in this world that has to do that? Well, if we haven't the thunder, I hope we've got got some lightning, and if it only hits in the right place we'll win. But it's got to hit strong."

Just then they heard a resounding cry, "Cupples, Cupples, Cupples."

The man actually turned pale. Who knew him in this far country? Was it a voice from the sky? The astonished sergeant rushed in the direction of the sound. He found a youth not far off, eager and anxious, with a frightened look.

"Is this Cupples?" he gasped out.

"No, but he's right here. Want to see him?"

"Yes, hurry."

They dashed into the hut.

"Here's Cupples."

"I'm Harry Bolton," broke in the boy. "I've just come home, for I heard that Amy and her baby —my baby—had been caught and brought back. I was in the room with her last night. She gave me this piece of paper," holding up Cupples's note. "I've come to find you. We must do something right away, this very night. My father don't know that I've come, and he mustn't know it."

The sergeant and Cupples looked at each other in astonishment.

"Of course we'll help," said they; "that's what we've come for."

"We'll join forces at once," cried the sergeant, "and move on the enemy. You know all about the premises. Guide us, and we'll follow to the death."

"Thank God!" said the boy. "It can be done. But we must be careful. The least mistake will destroy us. There are spies all around us, and even when we get away we must look out for the hounds."

The youth trembled violently.

"Can't you persuade your father?" asked Jones.

"Oh, no," said Harry; "he's hard as a rock. He's the terror of my life. I'm his slave. Yet he was always kind to me until this happened. It seems so strange that he should object, when it would make me so happy. I tried to move him. He cursed me. I helped her to escape. He found it out. I thought he would crush the life out of me. My God! I'm afraid of him—he has such power—and my father too! I was tempted last night to kill myself with Amy and the baby, but I found your note and determined to make an effort."

Harry was the picture of his father, a young Apollo; but he was gifted with the spirit of his mother, who died in his childhood, but whose memory was a perpetual grace. To his youthful mind the world was bathed in the wondrous light of Shelley's poetry. He was an ardent worshiper of the ideal good, and believed that it would shortly prevail on earth, and that men would love one another and humanity.

"Would be good and great and joyous, beautiful and free."

The harsh discipline of life had not forced him to other—and, alas, more common-sense—conclusions. The golden veil was not yet withdrawn. The painted morning was still in the air. He was not in the midst of the fierce battle for the privilege of existing.

He loved Amy with his whole heart, and it never occurred to him to treat her otherwise than as his equal.

"Can man be free if woman be a slave?"

He had not learned that worldly wisdom which often says it is perfectly right to do everything but the right thing; right to have the pleasure, but not right to crown it with heaven's most sacred beauty.

Now, at least, he was ready with a boy's enthusiasm to strike a blow against this hideous wrong, no matter what might be the recoil. Happy for all of us that we can have the luxury of a few divine impulses before we are old and stupid, wise and miserable, and also "eminently respectable."

"Let's talk it over at once," said Harry. "I'll save them or die."

A sharp, shrill whistle was just then heard.

"Good," cried Harry. "That's Columbus. I'll go and find him, and then we'll plan. He's our leader in this thing."

CHAPTER XVII.

COLUMBUS.

Harry soon came back with the huge negro the sergeant had seen on guard at the chamber-door.

"This is my best friend," said Harry. "He'll stick to me till death. Father don't know him. He thinks he does, and perhaps if Columbus could speak and hear like other folks, father 'd find him out. His infirmity 's his salvation, for he can keep things to himself and nobody mistrusts him. He can be like marble, and it's all right. Father thinks he can use him, but he can't. He don't know him as I do. I've learned to talk with him. He's full of soul, of genius; as silent as the grave, but living and sweet as the flowers. He'll help us out of this difficulty somehow, and father 'll never know where the help came from."

The sergeant and Cupples were dumb with amazement. It was very like a miracle indeed; and yet, why shouldn't a negro have brain, and soul, and genius? And if dumb, so much the better; for how often has genius lost its power by its capacity of speech. If genius would only keep still at times, and not let dullness get the start of it by the magic of silence, how potent it would be! How much is wasted at the end of the tongue that, if kept in the heart, might produce happy fruit! It was impossible for Columbus to waste himself either in hearing or talking. Fortunate Columbus! who had indeed found in the depth of his being a new world that might have remained unknown had he been compelled to hear and repeat the nonsense to which so many of us are slaves, taking in and giving forth a thousand airy nothings.

Harry and Columbus talked together. The face of the negro was lighted with intelligence. Ah! the devil is often blind. Bolton thought Columbus a dog; but he was a man, with a man's capacity and fiery force. The master saw only a hard, sullen, gigantic animal serviceable to his bad purposes. He did not see a keenness vaster than his own, working constantly to his defeat. He was blind, as all evil is blind, to the hidden power of goodness. Harry, by his very simplicity, had plucked out the heart of the mystery of Columbus, and knew him as a trustworthy friend. The boy had taught him many things by the language of signs. The negro was an apt student, and what he learned went into unfathomable depths of secrecy. His infirmity was indeed a mask. As his silence required no effort, his heart and mind presented to his master a dead blank; no gleam of intelligence shot athwart his face to arouse suspicion. The sharp eye of the brutal master noted only obedient flesh and blood; not the volcanic intensity brooding and silent within; the sagacity that defeated his cruel schemes.

"Who'd a thought it?" said the sergeant. "What a resurrection! That's not a whited sepulcher with dead men's bones in it; but a black one with the angel of God in it. What a splendid face he has, Cupples."

"That's so," returned his companion; "and look at Harry, too. He's the makin' of a man in him. I hope the squire won't spoil him. What a strange world this is! Things are mightily mixed. I s'pose slavery's a divine institution. They say so. Hapgood proves it right out o' scripter. It must be right. But what a chance it givs the devil!"

"I think I'd be a devil myself if I had such a chance," said the sergeant. "It's awful tantalizing to one who wants to be a saint. But we can't understand these things. Slavery may be a good thing, take it all round, though we have to go a good ways round to see it. One thing is sure, however—it's an infernal shame for this woman and baby to be in the power of Bolton, and I'll do all I can to get 'em out of it, even if the Constitution goes to smash and I have to vote the Democratic ticket a dozen times running on the same day to make up for it."

"That's my fix," said Cupples. "Religion and politics are mysteries for ministers to settle somehow. But this is a thing of real common sense and kindness, and religion and politics hasn't anything to do with it. I suppose I must make up for it, though. It's a sin, I reckon. Everything that a fellow likes to do is. I'll go to Hapgood's next donation and give him a box of blacking. Won't that brighten my prospects?"

"Certainly, if it gets onto his boots. I wonder if Hapgood blacks 'em himself. He does get a shine on 'em. I believe I get more real gospel out of his feet than I do out of his head. They are always telling me to be careful, to walk more circumspectly. I can't help avoiding the next mud-hole, though I have on a rusty pair of cowhides, for his boots are floatin' before me, and I wouldn't spatter 'em for the world. Well, Harry, have you and Columbus settled things? What shall we do, and how shall we do it?"

"We've planned the best way we can," said Harry. "It'll take courage and energy to put it through. Columbus says that we can't go north. The bloodhounds will be sure to catch us before we get to the Ohio. We must go south. There's a flag station over the mountains, twenty miles away, on the New Orleans Railroad. The morning train passes at eight o'clock. We must get there in time for that. Once on the train we are safe, for they can't telegraph before we shall be able to disguise ourselves completely. Here's a hundred dollars, Cupples. Hire or buy a team, and be ready at ten o'clock on the road that winds along at the foot of this hill. We can't start before twelve o'clock, and the way is terribly rough."

"All right," said Cupples, "but Columbus can carry us if we get stuck."

"Columbus won't go with us," said Harry. "He and I will bring the mother and baby to you, and then he'll have to go back and stand guard, and give warning, and help put the dogs on the wrong track."

"That's right," said Cupples. "Let them run to the Ohio and drown themselves in it."

"No such good luck," said Harry. "They'll get on our track eventually, and then the question will be, can we get aboard the cars before they catch up? The last resort is pistols. I hope you've some good ones."

"That I have," said the sergeant. Even while he was speaking Columbus had disappeared, gone back into his grave, silent, watchful, profound as the Sphinx.

Harry remained until dark at the hut, and then went back to Amy. The sergeant bargained for a team at a house three or four miles away—bought it out and out; and at ten o'clock he and Cupples were waiting at the appointed place.

An Insolent Proposal.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In the New York Herald of Feb. 8th, the public are informed that Mr. Nicholas Quackenboss, as counsel for the presbyters who preferred charges of heresy against the Rev. Heber Newton, said that if the bishop, whom the laws of the church invested with the "discretion" to proceed, or not proceed, against a person suspected of heresy, does not order a trial, "we may apply to the courts for a mandamus to compel the ordering of a trial."

I hav been surprised at the failure of the radical press to notice this fact. Here is a lawyer, in the state of New York, under national and state constitutions which declare the total disunion of state and church, actually proposing that the state of New York, by its courts of law, shall compel an Episcopal bishop to prosecute one of his inferior clergy for heresy! This lawyer, Quackenboss, thinks that Mr. Newton's religious opinions are damnable, and that he ought to be proceeded against and stopped! A large and intelligent congregation, who pay Mr. Newton's salary out of their own pockets, like to hear him discourse upon these subjects, but because they are distasteful to Lawyer Quackenboss, and others like him, and inconsistent with the religious opinions entertained during the reign of Elizabeth, three hundred years ago, it is proposed to silence Mr. Newton, and deprive his congregation of their chosen minister! I acknowledge that the fact alarms me. It shows that the spirit of superstition is the same bloody demon it was during the dark ages, and that, if it had the power, would paralyze every tongue and pen that would call in question the dogmas it approves. It is the only thing I know of which is not modified and improved by civilization. Remember, this proposition does not come from the Catholic church. If it had it would be nothing more than might be expected. For that church has always claimed, and still claims as vehemently as ever, that as vicegerent of Almighty God on this earth the civil magistrate is, and ought to be, its obedient servant to carry out her decrees vi et armis. But the Episcopal church is a Protestant body, existing under a civil Constitution which distinctly and intentionally recognizes no God and no religion, but which protects every person of every church, and of no church, in the enjoyment of his religious, or anti-religious, opinions, whatever they may be. Yet Mr. Quackenboss, a lawyer, who, on being admitted to the bar, took an oath to support this Constitution, is such a narrow-souled bigot as to think of compelling Bishop Potter by state authority to proceed against Mr. Newton!

Mr. Wakeman, in his grand speech at the Paine anniversary in New York, alluded to Paine's motiv in immediately beginning to write the "Age of Reason." The characters of the men in the French National Convention who sent him to prison, and would hav sent him to the guillotin, for not falling in with their bloody designs, were all formed in and by the church. Her dogmatism and her bloodthirstiness had taken complete possession of them, so that when Paine pleaded for the life of the man, Louis Capet, while he would banish the king, they turned upon the wise and benevolent Quaker, and ordered him to prison and to death. Then was the supreme moment of Paine's life. Instead of reproaching them and bidding defiance to their rage, as other victims did, he soliloquized thus: "It is their cursed religion which has dehumanized and diabolized these men, and made them what they are. In all past ages it has converted men into demons, and will continue to do so in all ages to come, for superstition never changes its character; it is the same always, and its whole history is written in the blood and tears of its victims. My abilities in England and America were used to make men politically free. The rest of my days shall be devoted to making them religiously free and independent. To break the bondage of the human intellect and conscience shall henceforth be the purpose of my life." To this holy resolve we owe the "Age of Reason." Why is it that Ireland welters in her own blood, and cannot secure, as we did, her own autonomy? It is her religion that makes her foolish, and cuts the hamstring of all her endeavors! What makes Mexico, with all her natural advantages, so contemptible a nation? It is her religion that has enfeebled her brain first, and then her arm. England would be a republic on the demise of Victoria, but for the vile, emasculating religion with which the priesthood for centuries has indoctrinated her people; and which will, when the time comes, make them rally round that worthless fellow, the Prince of Wales, and proclaim him king of England and emperor of India! It seems exceptional, and very strange, in nature's grand process of evolution, that when superstition is the greatest of all hindrances to the civilization and progress of mankind, she did not grapple with it first and foremost, but left it to be among the last of her conquests.

I do not believe much in wasting money in building monuments to men of mere stone and mortar, but if the day ever comes when the American people shall properly estimate their debt of gratitude to Thomas Paine, first, in order of time, for his political, and then for his religious services to mankind, the exuberance of their gratitude will not be content till they raise a monument to his name like that now being erected on the banks of the Potomac to George Washington. And on its ample sides, in deep granit cut letters, ought to be engraved the words of the "Last Crisis," dated Philadelphia, April 19th, 1783, which Paine begins by repeating the phrase of the first crisis: "The times that tried men's souls are over, and the greatest and completest revolution the world ever knew gloriously and happily accomplished."

Infidel Philosophy.

Gen i, 27: "So God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him, male and female created he them."

Gen. ii, 1: "Thus the heavens and the earth were finished and all the hosts of them. 2. And on the seventh day God ended his work which he had made, and he rested on the seventh day from all the works which he had made."

Here is a full and complete creation. The whole work is finished up, and a long rest taken, and everything pronounced very good, after God had deliberately reviewed the whole job.

Gen. ii, 7: "And the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and man became a living soul."

Here we find God engaged in another and a new creation, after the "heavens and the earth were finished, and all the hosts of them." How could God keep right on creating after everything was finished? According to the account, there must hav been two first pairs created. Now I ask any general reader to read carefully from the beginning of the first chapter up to the tenth verse of the second chapter of Gensis, and he will see that it is made up of fragmentary statements, which cannot be made to join together like a continuous narrativ.

There are at least three fragments of accounts by different individuals of the same transactions (at least, so it appears) joined together in such a bungling manner as to be absolutely painful to the close observer.

Creating light before there was any source of light, and then "dividing" the light from the "darkness," and having three days elapse before there was anything to produce day and night, seems to be a part of one account.

Putting the lights in the firmament to divide the day from the night, and the creation of man and woman, seems to be a fragment of another account. Remember these first lights were to be for "signs and for seasons, and for days and years."

And then God made two "great lights," "the greater light to rule the day, and the lesser light to rule the night." And these lights were to divide the light from the darkness, although in the first chapter, fourth verse, God had already "divided the light from the darkness." These facts taken in connection with the creation of another man and woman, and planting the garden after everything was "finished," show conclusivly that the story of the creation is made up of fragments.

Moreover, the style is not the same. A part of the time it is the "Lord," and then it is the "Lord God" who is doing the work; and it would seem as if different individuals had tried to tell a story, a part of which each remembered and a part of which had been forgotten, and the parts had been jumbled together, without skill or ingenuity, as we now find them.

Gen. ii, 19: "And out of the ground the Lord God formed every beast of the field and every fowl of the air, and brought them to Adam to see what Adam would call them, and whatsoever Adam called every living creature, that was the name thereof."

After God had finished the heavens and the earth, it took him one-seventh of the time to rest that it did to perform the entire job, and after bringing "every living creature" to Adam he must hav required a short breathing spell at least.

If God had only possessed the ability to name the animals as he created them, it would hav saved a deal of trouble. But it is not to be expected that one poor God, after performing such a week's work as he had, could keep right on without help. Besides, it does not appear that Adam had much on hand, and it was only reasonable that he should lend a helping hand where God had more than he could well attend to.

Wonder if the climate was agreeable to both the lion and the polar bear. If he touched the electric eel, I guess he thought of his funny-bone. No wonder Adam gave the skunk a short name; he wanted to get rid of him as quick as possible. The octopus, cuttle-fish, alligator, and anaconda must hav been an awkward squad to bring into position before Adam. Lucky that the "wicked flea" did not hop away before being named. He must hav got down to fine work when he named the infusoria. ("Their multitude is so great, and their size so small, that those contained in a single cup of putrid water may exceed in number the whole human population of the globe"—Encyclopedia.) But Adam named "every living creature;" of course these must hav been included.

If the lions, and tigers, and panthers had pounced upon the deer, and the sheep, and the goats; and the hawks upon the dunghills, while God had them before Adam, he would hav been compelled to roll up his sleeves and make a new batch. Wonder if the elephant, and lion, and anaconda did not part company with the reindeer and polar bear pretty quick after being named. While God stood there with every "living creature" before him, hearing Adam pronounce the "name thereof," I wonder if it occured to his mind that the "serpent" was "laying low" for him.

Gen. iii, 8: "And they heard the voice of the Lord God walking in the garden in the cool of the day, and Adam and his wife hid themselvs from the presence of the Lord God, amongst the trees of the garden."

God is omnipresent, but they hid away from him all the same. This shows the advantage of being posted in scripture lessons. The sinful ministers who hav been exposed by Col. Billings hav found out that they can hide away from "the presence of the Lord" when he turns to the debtor side of the account.

"God is a spirit," and why a spirit should chose the cool of the day, on account of the agreeableness of the temperature, is not apparent. I fail to see how a "voice" could walk; and if it could, it could not get up much of a racket. How a spirit could, by walking, make noise enough to scare Adam and Eve, so as to make them run and hide in the trees, can only be explained by one of God's attorneys who has been commissioned to expound his law.

The apple and the snake story, of course, is familiar to all; but there may be points which hav escaped the notice of many. It is generally understood that guilt attached to the eating of the forbidden fruit—that the terible penalties visited upon Adam and Eve were on account of their transgression. But there was no guilt, no transgression, and I proceed to show it.

In the first place, is it possible for guilt to attach to an act, the perpetrator of which is not accountable, and does not know good and evil? I apprehend that there can be but one answer to this question.

Gen. iii, 6: "She took the fruit thereof and did eat, and gave also to her husband with her, and he did eat." Verse 22: "And the Lord God said, Behold, the man has become as one of us [how many?] to know good and evil."

This shows plainly that they did not know "good and evil," until after they had partaken of the fruit. Neither were their eyes opened, as will be seen in the seventh verse. "And the eyes of them both were opened." When? after they had eaten the fruit, not before. It is evident, from the account, that a punishment was inflicted upon Adam and Eve, when they could not in any just sense be blamed. They could not see; their eyes had not been opened; they "went it blind," and did not know "good and evil."

If any one can see the justice of the punishment, he can see what does not appear in the statement as found in the Bible. An act committed in ignorance cannot merit punishment.

Gen. iii, 19: "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread." This is universally believed to mean that man shall work and earn the bread which he eats, and that it was pronounced upon Adam, and through Adam upon the race, as a curse for his transgression.

In the early periods, when there was but little to stimulate the ambition of men; when enterprise was at a low ebb, and there was little interchange in natural products, labor was considered a curse; and, of course, God's curses were dealt out according to their superstition and prejudice, just as he ordered their wars to be conducted to suit their savage brutality. Labor is not now considered a curse, but a blessing, promoting health, happiness, and long life.

Gen. iv, 16: "And Cain went from the presence of the Lord, and dwelt in the land of Nod."

What a "God-forsaken" place that must hav been! It seems to hav been quite easy in those days to shy away from the "presence of the Lord." God is now everywhere present; has he changed?

Gen. iv, 17: "And Cain knew his wife." And where did she come from? Adam must hav lost two ribs instead of one, or else she must hav come from the first pair (Gen. i, 27) which God created before he made Adam and Eve. It seems a little strange that God should create a man and woman, and then forget what he had done and create another pair. There is no account that the first pair had any children, and Cain was the only one left of the Adam family, except the father and mother. Now, Christians, I don't understand this, and I giv it up. I leave it in your hands; you hav always proved yourselves equal to any emergency; the rack or the thumbscrew has always made everything clear which you could not explain, and with your "higher" arithmetic, where three is one and one is three, I hav no doubt you will be able to cipher it out, and make it as clear as mud.

Gen. vi, 4: "There were giants in those days; and also after that, when the sons of God came in unto the daughters of men, and they bore children to them, the same became mighty men which were of old, men of renown."

This is too hard for me, and I don't propose to go to hell, either, because I can't understand it. If it is necessary for me to understand God's word, he ought to hav fixed my brain differently. I don't wonder such a blundering God should repent of what he had done.

I can form no conception of these heavenly hybrids referred to in the text, half God and half man. They must hav been men of renown, sure enough, for they had God Almighty for a grandfather.

Gen vi, 6: "And it repented the Lord that he had made man."

Balked again? This is too deep water for me. My Christian friends, you must come to the rescue. Just tell me how God can repent, and you can take the chromo. If God repented he must hav lacked either wisdom or power. Will Christians fix it up among themselvs? I am like the Chinaman at the Centennial, "It's too damee muchee."

Gen. vi, 5: "And God saw that the wickedness of the world was very great." Verse 6: "And it repented the Lord that he had made man." Verse 7: "And the Lord said, I will destroy man whom I hav created, from the face of the earth."

Now compare these passages with the thirty-first verse of the first chapter of Genesis: "And God saw everything which he had created, and behold it was very good."

What business has God to get soured, and repent, and go "down in the harness" in so short a time, after he had created everything, and pronounced it very good. Did God hav everything in his own hands? Was he clothed with almighty power? Was he infinit in wisdom? Then, how was this great change brought about from the "very good" to the very bad?

If it is claimed that this change was brought about through the agency of the devil, why didn't God put him out of the way? He had power over him, he cursed him above all cattle, he could make him crawl on his belly, and if he could not kill him, it is a fair inference that the devil had more power than he. Oh, what a predicament for a God!

It would appear from the account, that God created a devil without knowing the mischief he would do. He planted a tree in the Garden of Eden without knowing the amount of trouble it would giv him. He created man, and said he was all right, and then repented of the job. He brought on the flood without foreseeing that it was a great waste of water. Men were just as bad after the flood as before it. Old Noah, his chief fugleman, got cocked the first opportunity.

O Christians! what a God you worship! He has brought into existence millions of trillions of human beings, and knew from the beginning that nine-tenths of them would be damned. He sends a drought in one country, and the people die of starvation, and hundreds of unburied putrefying corpses add pestilence to famin. In another country he sends a flood, and thousands of homes are washed away, and outstretched arms of drowning children appeal to frenzied fathers and mothers in vain for help. He belches forth his fury from a volcano, and whole cities are buried in ruins. Earthquakes disrupt the solid crust of the earth, and towns and cities are swallowed up.

And yet every year some political dude sets apart a day for thanksgiving and praise to God for these great blessings. Bah!

I read in the Koran of the terrible penalties which God will visit upon the unbelievers. They are to roast in hell (I quote only from memory) until the brain fries in the skull, and the eyes bubble in their sockets.

Now I cannot believe in such a vengeful, savage God; neither can I believe in the shifting, changing, short-sighted, repenting, blundering God of the Christians. I see nothing in the Bible God but a picture of the human mind; photographed when men were far less enlightened than they are at the present time. Man to-day would create a far better God. It is high time we had a different one, or dispense with one altogether. JOHN PECK.

Naples, N. Y., Feb. 19, 1884.

The Liberal Club.

The 330th regular meeting of the Manhattan Liberal Club was held on the 29th of February. The club will not meet again on Friday the 29th of February until sometime in 1900. This meeting was addressed—very appropriately, considering the date—by a lady, Mrs. Lillie Devereaux Blake. Mrs. Blake is one of the best known of the woman suffrage advocates, and is the author of a book entitled "Woman's Place To-day," a series of lectures in reply to the Rev. Morgan Dix, which attracted considerable attention at the time they were delivered and published. Mrs. Blake is described by the secretary of the club, who has kindly furnished the material for this report, as an eloquent speaker of fine presence, whose shafts of wit strike home, and who should be heard to be appreciated. The speaker had, she said, nothing new to say on the subject of woman's rights. Like the teacher of an infant school, she must repeat the A B C until the pupils had learnt those important rudiments, before proceeding to join the characters in syllables. She would treat her subject on this occasion algebraically. She could recollect the portentous appearance of the unknown quanitity x until she learned its nature. It then lost its mysterious and wonderful potency. She discovered, however, that she must ascertain the value of the unidentified x in order to solve her problem. So also men must recognize the significance of the unappreciated x of society—woman—before they would arrive at the solution of the problem now before us, the institution of justice. Leap year was a good illustration of the estimate placed upon woman's importance; she has one year in four, while man has all the rest. Mrs. Blake instanced two examples of the influence of woman in politics. Gov. Robinson of this state was candidate for re-election, but his administration had been so inimical to the rights of the gentler sex that the women of New York were aroused in opposition and he was permitted to retire to private life. Again, Horace Russell was nominated for attorney-general by the Republican party and backed by powerful influence. Yet Mr. O'Brien, with the help of the women, and notwithstanding his decidedly Greek name, got about four thousand more votes than Russell. Of the million votes in this state women would need to control but two per cent to hold the balance of power. The speaker wished the men to take notice of this fact and its bearing on next year's election. Mrs. Blake secured the approbation of the chairman throughout. This was shown by his frequent nods of assent, and the ejaculations of "that's so!" that escaped him.

The strongest point of criticism made against extending the electiv franchise to woman was offered by Mr. Cohen, who held that as they were still more under the domination of the church than man, to allow them the privilege of voting (the right he conceded) would be to extend the power of the church, especially the Catholic, to a dangerous limit. Mr. Cohen admitted that this argument applied with equal force to some men.

Mr. Palmer would giv suffrage to woman as a right which was hers as well as man's, although he did not doubt, as Mr. Cohen had said, there would be a temporary retrograde movement; but liberty was its own educator. The question of woman's political rights was but an incident in the trend of human progress beginning with the Protestant Reformation, more than three hundred years ago. That trend had been toward liberty, and if we were to hav republicanism and a government of the people, woman must take her equal place in the republic. Mr. Palmer thought that the province of the ballot in the future would be to vote men or women out of office when unfaithful to their trust or incompetent to discharge their duties, all officials being allowed to serve as long as they served well.

Dr. Weeks, as usual, communicated to the club a large amount of useful information, which a majority, somehow, had not the patience to listen to and appreciate in a manner at all adequate to its importance. The doctor said that he fully appreciated the value of woman's work in housekeeping, although she would sometimes brush around to the annoyance of man. (He perhaps does not fully realize, muses the lady secretary, the difficulty a woman labors under in "brushing around" when a man is constantly at home.) He therefore thought that woman's aid was necessary in the governmental household.

Mr. Langerfelt (we quote the secretary's words) made his usual speech, calling the attention of Mrs. Blake to the fact that the "economic basis" was the underpinning of the whole business—of art, of religion, of all civilization, in fact; but he spoke in the most subdued tone, evidently overawed by the eloquence of the speaker, and affirming that he was not in any sense exuberated by the inebriance of his own verbosity. The phrase "all this business" he employed but once, showing a gratifying tendency toward a higher method of expression. "What is rights?" he asked. There was not a person in the audience who knew, although rights were forever talked about. People had the right, affirmed Mr. Langerfelt, without pausing to explain what a "right" was, to develop their abilities, each and every one, to the utmost. The secretary here makes the criticism, in an eminently universological sentence, that Mr. Langerfelt ignores the fact that the privilege of voting, the right of which is woman's as much as man's, and for which Mrs. Blake is contending, is one of the necessary factors of this development of which he was speaking, and the greater part of the audience knew it as well as he did.

Mrs. Leonard confronted Mr. Cohen's statement that enlarging woman's sphere of activity would increase the power of the church, with a chapter from her own experience. For writing and publishing an article on prayer she had been branded "Infidel" by the newspaper press, conducted by the lords of creation.

Mrs. Blake made an eloquent speech at the close, showing her to be familiar with every phase of the question, the economic, the domestic, and all. She had not touched upon these because she had chosen other topics, and there was a limit to what can be said in an hour. The condition of the streets of New York was a proof of man's incompetency as a housekeeper. The thoroughfares of this city would never be properly cleaned until woman had control of the work.

The program of the club for the month of March is as follows: 7th, The New Marriage; or, Uniform Marriage Laws, by Charles Stuart Welles; 14th, Mormons and Mormondom, by Rev. G. W. Gallagher; 21st, The Mormon Question, by J. W. Stillman, of Boston; 28th, The Mad World; or, What is truth? by Madame Henri Delescluze.

Debate.

The dry bones of orthodoxy had a shaking at Murray, Iowa, on Jan. 29th and 30th. Mr. Branch (Campbellite), of Murray, challenged Mr. V. B. Cushing (Unitarian), of Creston, to a theological debate. The audience was large, but would hav been much larger had the Baptist building been larger. The proposition was, "That the New Testament is not true in all its parts." Mr. Cushing argued that the genealogy of Christ is contradictory, as the one list givs fourteen generations more than the other, and that both could not be true. Mr. Branch replied that one genealogy was for Joseph, the father of Christ, and the other for Mary, the mother; but Mr. Cushing pointed out that view is mere assumption, not in accordance with scripture. Mr. Cushing also hinted that genealogies were superfluous where the birth was miraculous. Mr. Branch, to get rid of the dilemma, asserted the two first chapters of Matthew are not genuin, and written by a different author; also that ten or twelve interpolations in the gospels are spurious. Whereupon Mr. Cushing politely thanked his opponent for conceding a point that he (Mr. Cushing) came all the way from Creston to prove. Mr. Branch somewhat lost temper, and said he believed the whole of the New Testament—the two chapters, interpolations, and all—to be true. A great number of contradictions were pointed out by Mr. Cushing, and his opponent labored, with more zeal than success, to reconcile the contradictions. At this stage of the proceedings, Mr. Branch unwarrantably charged the chairman, Mr. Wick, with "posting" Mr. Cushing, and promoting the cause of Infidelity. Mr. Wick then merely explained that the gentleman was entirely mistaken. Next day, however, at close of debate, Mr. Wick repudiated more fully the slur attempted to be cast on him as chairman, and told an amusing anecdote, wherein he likened Mr. Branch to the mountain sheep that bounces against rocks, and sometimes breaks its own head.

Mr. Cushing's last address of only five minutes was a masterpiece of eloquence, and completely won the sympathy of the audience. This debate I consider very damaging to orthodoxy, and, per contra, very beneficial to the cause of Freethought in all the neighborhood.

I would suggest an apology for the red-haired preacher in this debate, and for red-haired men generally. Their Saxon blood causes them to be excitable and peppery. They may sometimes be impassioned and eloquent, but never cool in debate. Blame not harshly their constitutional weakness; they may be generous or just; but in charity do not ask them to keep cool. Mrs. Severance Objects to Mr. Hull's Methods.

To MOSES HULL, My Friend and Brother: I feel impelled to write you at this time, firstly, to thank you for those wise words lately published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, in which you clearly set forth case after case where individual workers had been induced for certain reasons to take positions at variance with brave, progressiv ideas, and in harmony with conservativ prejudices, and the results of this suicidal course. Your points were suggestiv, and call attention to a law I firmly believe in—compensation. Secondly, I hav just read in the Offering of Jan. 6th a communication that has filled me with amazement and sadness, for I discern in this a beginning of catering to the old superstitions which I never expected you to manifest. In the first place, your society organizing as a church, so as to "get the ear of people who could not be induced to attend a spiritual lecture," you call a wise movement. Now, I would like to know of what use, as workers in reform, are such narrow-minded, prejudiced people as these, and will you not hav to keep constantly catering, assuming church methods and ordinances, to keep them in "the fold?" Such seems to be the case already as manifested by your christening ceremony, which "sensible-looking people" required at your hands. "But after a little reflection something seemed to say, Why not? If there is anything in magnetism, may not the laying of hands on him, and his dedication to the cause of human progress, possibly giv him more strength to fight the battles of life, to resist temptation, and to work for humanity? At least we will try it. And with a few appropriate remarks I took the little fellow in my arms and blessed him, as did one of old. Now let me say I believe in it."

If magnetism does giv strength to its recipient—and I know it does where there is a proper adaptation of the parties—is there any increase of that power from the fact of your having been chosen pastor of the church of the New Spiritual Dispensation? If not, did you not help by that ceremony to perpetuate a superstition that all Liberals ought to try to educate people out of? Was the taking of that child in your arms and blessing it "as one of old" anything different from what people hav done all these years since the "one of old" was purported to hav lived and hugged babies, and is not an equally beneficent effect produced every time a magnetic person takes a child in his arms? Did a dove descend upon the child, or what manifestation did you receive that so suddenly converted you to a belief in the ordinance? For it seems you began it as an experiment, but when you had finished it you declared, "I now believe in it." And who gave that child to the angels (What does that mean, anyway?), or who has any right to giv or pledge another person, whether child or angel, to any special line of life? If this can be done, if certain ordained ministers can dedicate others to works of humanity and love, I would like to know it, for I am in possession of an ordination certificate, which I received about twenty years ago, and I would like to dedicate our professed reformers, not to the angels, but to a sensible, honest, earnest, progressiv work for humanity. But I hav always held the opinion if there be any such dedication, it must be an individual work of one's own doing.

Your pastoral work begun, of course your duties increase, and next comes your marriage ceremony. You who hav spoken such strong, brave, defiant words against this institution; you whom I hav heard claim before large audiences that our marriage laws sanctioned the worst of crimes, and perpetuated them, and that it was a slave institution; you who refused to yield to its unjust demands, and suffered with a brave heart and bold front all sorts of persecutions for your opinions like a man; you who hav for these many years been striking such effectiv blows to break the fetters that laws bind about human hearts, now enact the role of priest in sanctioning and solemnizing this abomination, as you hav claimed it to be, and send out a form or ceremonial as a pattern for others to follow which is not one whit better than that used by other priests. So step after step in the conservativ direction, your church business is leading you, and I should not be half so much surprised to hear of your church and its pastor celebrating the eucharist, as I now am at what you hav already done. Some day some "rather sensible-looking people" may come to you and ask to hav bread and wine served. You say: "Why not? We will try the experiment. And I took bread and wine, and blessed it, and gave to my disciples, saying, Eat ye all of it, as did one of old. And now I believe in it."

I hav always had faith in you; hav known you to do things that I thought showed lack of judgment, perhaps, as we are all wont to do, but never thought you capable of catering to popular prejudice till this present move, and it is a sorry conclusion for me, for I know just as soon as a reformer begins to cater he places himself in a negativ position to the party or parties he is trying to please, and his influence for good is lost; he is acted upon instead of being a controling force himself, and as a reformer he is dead. There are too few now who will follow truth, let it lead where it may, or who are strong enough and brave enough to dare to be true.

Sincerely yours, JULIET H. SEVERANCE, M.D.

Southern California.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In your paper of Feb, 2d J. Heinrich and brother ask for some information in regard to Los Angeles and vicinity in this state. Southern California is the most favored section from a climatic point of view in the United States, and though but a comparativly short time has elapsed since American industry and enterprise superseded Mexican indolence and ignorance, wonderful changes and improvements hav been made. Land is steadily increasing in value, and indications point to a splendid future for sunny southern California, and all those who desire to leave the East, with its six months of winter and attendant hardships, for a semi-tropical climate should come here at once. Come where you can pick the ripening orange in January, and liv without a continual exertion to keep up the animal heat; where snow and blizzards are unknown. But particulars are wanted, and I will confine them to the Santa Ana valley, which lies about twenty-five miles south of Los Angeles, and in connected by a branch of the Southern Pacific Railroad. California has no fairer locality, no more equable climate, than is found in this valley, which is about twenty miles long and sixteen broad. Two-thirds of its area is arable land. Santa Ana, Orange, and Anaheim are its principal towns, and more beautiful places are hard to find. The rainy season here is from December to April, and the remainder of the year is dry. Everything is irrigated during the summer by water from the Santa Ana river which is brought into the valley by a ditch nine miles long.

A great variety of fruit is here produced, among which are oranges, lemons, limes, apricots, nectarines, figs, pears, peaches, apples, prunes, etc., numerous kinds of grapes, English walnuts, almonds, olivs, peanuts, yams, and vegetables of all kinds. Considerable corn is raised, but not much grain, for it is cut early and used for hay. Alfalfa, which grows like a weed when wet, is the feed for cows, and every place has a small piece on which to stake the domestic animal that supplies the family with milk and butter. Wells with windmills are plenty, but many hav cisterns made in the ground which are filled from the irrigating ditch. Wood is scarce, and sells for eight or nine dollars per cord. It is mostly oak. Ten acres of vinyard or orange orchard is about all one man can take care of, and good help is worth twenty-five and thirty dollars per month the year round. Irrigating is the most unpleasant thing about farming here, but one soon gets accustomed to that. The only disagreeable thing about this climate is hard winds in the winter, but what we get here would be called gentle zephyrs back in Missouri. They do not blow very often or long at a time, but are occasional affairs.

The summer months are middling warm, and the mercury plays about in the vicinity of 100 degrees quite often, but the nights are always cool, with ocean breezes, and sleep is both sweet and refreshing.

We hav just had the heaviest fall of snow known in nine years, so old residents say, and everybody is jubilant in consequence. Land has risen about ten per cent in the past two weeks, and in the undeveloped state now sells at from $150 to $200 per acre. Vinyards two years old are worth $250 and $300 per acre, and in one instance $600 was refused for a vinyard five years old. Orange orchards are worth about the same. In Riverside, sixty miles east of Los Angeles, $1,000 per acre is no uncommon price, but its being an older settled community explains why, and as time is destined to make land as valuable here as there, delay in purchasing is expensiv. Grapes are the crop to be preferred in this locality, for they require less water than trees, and either the wine or raisin variety is sure to pay. From twenty to thirty dollars per ton was paid for grapes last year, and an old vinyard will produce from four to six tons, and some hav as high as eight. Oranges, being rather scarce, are selling for from six to eight dollars per box this season. Last year they were from two to three dollars, and a person in Anaheim picked one thousand boxes from a ten-acre orchard four years old—but that was more than an average yield.

That money can be made in the Santa Ana valley is a question above doubt, but to succeed here a person must not run in debt too much, for the rate of interest in California is ten per cent.

In closing I will say, it has been my privilege to see a good part of the United States and portions of Mexico, but a more healthy and genial climate than this I hav never met, and I feel as did a lady I saw returning from a four years' residence in Arizona—said she, "There is only one California, and there I want to make my home." Jewels from Afar.

So you hav wandered on through Persia;
Through the orient wide and grand,
And gathered its flashing jewels
With a deft and busy hand;
You hav caught a thousand colors
From the sea and sky and flower,
And I think the genii helped you
With something of Eden's dower.

You hav wrought a wondrous picture.
From these travels far away,
But still in your wildest wanderings
You were thinking of home each day;
And when the last jewel was gathered,
And the brightest of gold was found,
You placed the magnificent glory
On the hearth-stone's sacred ground.

The spirit of love thus ever
Wanders the wide world through;
It is restless for every treasure,
For every form and hue—
To pour its sweet delight in,
To image its fair thoughts,
For love cannot be loving
Except some task is wrought.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Religion in Politics.

The convention to frame a constitution for Montana was not able to get God into it without spirited opposition. Among the glittering generalities which usually form the preamble to such documents it was proposed to insert this religious slush:

"We, therefore, the people of Montana, acknowledging with grateful hearts the goodness of the Great Legislator of the Universe, in affording us, in the course of his providence, an opportunity, deliberately and peaceably, without fraud, violence, or intimidation, of entering into an original, explicit, and solemn compact with each other, and of forming a constitution of civil government for ourselvs and our posterity; and devoutly imploring his direction in so grand and interesting a design, do agree upon." And so on to the end of the chapter.

The reading of this in the convention brought to his feet the Hon. Mr. Fergus, of Meagher county. He showed the idiocy of the language used, and the uselessness of expecting God to take extended notice of the doings of a territorial legislature. Among other pertinent objections he urged are these:

"A member on this floor has remarked that this constitution is to endure through all time. Time is but the measure of eternity. Time always was and always will be. Man came on the earth, as it were, but yesterday, but in that short time nations, languages, and religions hav had their infancy, their maturity, and their decay. It is an inexorable law. Our government, our language, and our religion will in turn be swept away by the scythe of time, and the place that knows them now will know them no more forever. Space, too, is everywhere; it is without limit. Our sun is but one of the millions of stars, and our earth but one of its smoothest satellites (and a poor one at that), rolling from side to side, burning us in summer and freezing us with its winter blasts. If there is a God—an impartial God—he must divide his time amongst this great universe, and Montana's share cannot be worth asking for. Therefore, I regard the passage I move to strike out as only an incumbrance to our fundamental law. If he guides and protects us, I hav looked for this protecting power in vain. The cars rush together, and there is no God to warn. The engineer asks not God to stay their mad career, but applies the air-brakes, the invention of a fellow-man. The steamship sinks in mid-ocean, and no helping hand is there; the shrieks of the helpless are borne on the wind until they are buried in the insatiate sea. The earthquake, the cyclone, and the volcano, following inexorable laws, destroy the just and the unjust, and Nature neither pities nor rejoices, neither loves nor hates. If man is saved, he must save himself; if he is hungry, he must feed himself; if he is cold, he must warm himself. Our prayers are unheeded; no deity puts forth his helping hand. Then, why bemean our manhood by inserting a lie in this our fundamental law?

"Jefferson, in a more superstitious age, and the framers of our national Constitution, pandered not to popular prejudice. Yet the nation livs, our own people hav ever ruled themselves; if Montanians cannot do the same thing they are unfit to be a free people.

"I hav heard it said on this floor that we don't want mossbacks or old fogies. In this case, sir, some of the old fogies are in accord with the spirit of the age. Henry Ward Beecher said in Denver not long ago that Adam never fell, that he began at the bottom, and if he fell at all, he fell up. Dr. McCosh, president of Princeton College, has published a pamphlet upon the same subject; and Bishop Heber, I think it is, of England, has also placed himself on record in favor of evolution. Had these men uttered such sentiments two hundred years ago, they would hav been burnt at the stake.

"But the world moves, except the constitutional convention of the territory of Montana, which goes back to the constitution of good old Massachusetts, just after she had burnt her witches, for stale, worn-out adulation to an imaginary being, who is supposed to be floating around in our uncongenial atmosphere, while we are enjoying ourselvs in warm apartments.

"I venture the assertion that neither the people of the United States, nor the people of Montana, are in accord with the spirit of this passage which I ask to hav stricken out. It is simply clinging to old traditions. A very intelligent gentleman on this floor has well said that man is only half developed, and to prove his assertion, he sits enveloped in the smoke of a poisonous weed, clinging to the superstitions of an ignorant age and race.

"Mr. President, about this matter I hav no pride of opinion; but I think the declaration I hav excepted to is unnecessary, uncalled for, and only an incumbrance. Old, with one foot in the grave, I still love and honor the man who stands up to his convictions without fear, favor, or affection, at all times, and in all places—one whose hell is to do wrong, and whose heaven is found in well-doing. Whether for or against this measure, I hope to be able to love and honor all here."

Mr. Fergus was supported by Mr. Callaway, a Christian, who announced himself capable of swallowing the Apostles' Creed, and with receptiv powers nearly sufficient to take in the creed of St. Athanasius; but he wanted religion confined to its proper sphere, and to cram it into a state constitution was certainly ill-advised and out of place. The holders of these views were in the minority, however, and Montana will hav a constitution which recognizes "Gaud."

The Truth Seeker Led into Error.

In an editorial on the death of Wendell Phillip's, in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Febuary 9th, the particulars of which were obtained from the Sun, the following statement occurs: "On the Chinese question, Mr. Phillips favored the restriction of Chinese immigration as a means of protection to American workmen. He said: 'They who seek to flood us artificially with barbarian labor are dragging down the American home to the level of the houseless street herds of China. If the workingmen hav not combined to prevent this, it is time that they should. When rich men conspire, poor men should combine.'" Can it be shown where he made the quotation referred to above? Of all the libels against him in the past, none equals this in its utter falsity. It is in direct contradiction of his whole life. As an abolitionist, he was for "equality before law," and the following letter shows that he retained his clearness of acumen. I cut it from the San Francisco Chronicle, and preserved it for its terseness on the Chinese question. His letter is as follows:

BOSTON, Sept. 5, 1878.

DEAR SIR: I read the slip you sent me stating Judge Black's views on the Chinese question. I do not accept his law. Any state regulation which violates a United States treaty is void. No one but a secessionist would question it. As to the general subject—Chinese immigration—I dissent entirely from the opinions entertained on the Pacific coast. Indeed, I detest the shallow, heartless, and narrow views taken there on the subject. In the first place, I have no fear of the Chinese coming here in such numbers as even temporarily to disturb our welfare, or the character of our institutions. Nations emigrate gradually; never in tens of millions at a time. History and common sense both bear witness against the possibility of it. Secondly, all the millions from any race, that will or can come here, are sorely needed to fill up the vast wastes in our possessions between Omaha and the Pacific. "The earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof," and we hav no right to shut a man out of any vacant lot which he needs to earn his bread. The Chinese are a painstaking, industrious, and marvelously capable people. Statesmanship and political economy, as well as Christianity, bid us welcome such help in subduing the continent; not violently to thrust them out. That we, who fled here only two centuries ago, should refuse the Chinese a place, is monstrous. But that the Irish, who took shelter under institutions already established, should use the rights we hav shared with them to oppress and torment the Chinese, is shameful inconsistency—another instance of how often the persecuted are themselvs the first to persecute. Shame on the Irishman who, after his country's four centuries of protest and rebellion, borrows of England the selfsame infamous and hateful weapons, to use them against the Chinese! If so sad and wicked an act could be the subject of mirth, the whole civilized world would see it as the most ridiculous inconsistency. But a deeper feeling than that of detestation and abhorrence is the mood of every honest man, and one needs the masterly sarcasm and rebuke of O'Connell fitly to describe it. Very respectfully yours,

WENDELL PHILLIPS.

To those who knew him, his whole life was a refutation of such a statement on the Chinese question as was gathered from the Sun. The statement is a travesty on his humanity. To those who look for truth, his letter givs no uncertain sound.

Church and State.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER Sir: A bill has been introduced into our state legislature to create in our state university a chair of theology. It ought to pass, and then the assembled wisdom ought to get up another bill to surround the chair with a lot of stools for the scholars to sit on, while the theological nincompoop in the big chair dispenses his inspired drivel to the embryonic asses who listen to his teachings. Maybe it won't do us much good but, Lord! what a big thing it will be for posterity. Mister Speaker, I vote for that bill. J. E. WICK.

VIVISECTION.—ELLIOTT PRESTON TO E. B. FOOTE, JR.

Sir: Permit me to open, for the benefit of the public, if not of your learned self, this communication to you, with a brief poem of my own, descriptiv of one of the most touching incidents recorded in the bloody annals of vivisection:

MAJENDIE AND THE DOG.—AN ACTUAL FACT.

In that dread hell of horrors where the knife,
With fiendish cunning, tents the mangled frame,
Exulting in each direr throe of pain,
The "prince of torturers" stood!
There in the trough
A hapless victim lay, bound by the thong;
But as the vivisector gloatingly
Bent to his task, and with deft chisel sought
To cleave the quivering spine, down to the red nerve's root,
The creature, in delirium of pain,
Broke from its bonds, and fled in mad dismay;
But, with remorseless hand, he drew it back,
Down to the torture-trough, that demon soul!
And yet again the pitiful, poor brute,
In awful agony, 'scaped that red hand;
But when, once more, the artist plucked him down,
Knowing quite well his fearful fate was sealed,
And no slight strength of his might more avail,
Clasped he his fenseless paws round that grim neck,
Licking the monster's face, with pleading vain!

First, let me warmly thank Harvey W. Pinney, Esq., of Mill Brook, Conn., for his manly words in condemnation of E. B. Foote, Jr., and his (Mr Foote's) stand in the vivisection controversy, as explained in his (Mr. Pinney's) article in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Feb. 16, 1884.

Mr. Pinney most justly says, in substance, "Two wrongs do not make one right, nor is vivisection the less atrocious because other forms of cruelty exist."

I hope all readers of this paper will imitate the worthy example set by Mr. Pinney, and decline to trust their own lives, or those of their families, in the hands of medical men who espouse or practice vivisection. Surely a man whose sensibilities are so blunted—as are those of the vivisector—by the frequent infliction or witnessing of animal pain would not be likely to be especially tender of the sufferings of these human beings who might commit themselvs to his care.

During the investigations made at the sessions of the Royal Commission in 1876 (which convocation of learned physiologists and others took place owing to the commands of Queen Victoria, and for the purpose of sifting this terrible question as thoroughly as possible) it was found that German physiologists, as a rule, ridiculed the idea that their fellow-craftsmen in Germany and elsewhere labored for "the good of humanity," but that it was simply for science in the abstract.

What has our champion of vivisection, E. B. Foote, Jr., to say relativ to the abominable proceedings of Signor Paolo Mantegazza, who recently carried out a long series of horrible experiments upon living, unetherized animals, merely to make a study of pain? Not pain inflicted with any possible beneficial end in view, but solely and simply out out of a hellish curiosity to discover how much agony various animals could be made to suffer before death took place.

He subsequently published the tabulated results of these atrocities in a work entitled "La Fisiologia del Dolore" (Florence: Felice Paggi, editore. 1880). I quote the following from "Light in Dark Places," a most valuable illustrated pamphlet by Miss Frances Power Cobbe, the eminent English opponent of vivisection. It will be sent free to readers of this article on application to the "Victoria Street Society for the Protection of Animals Liable to Vivisection," Victoria st., London S. W., England.

Let every interested person drop a postal card (adding a one cent stamp thereto, as required on postal cards for England) with the request for a copy of "Light in Dark Places," and it will be forwarded to their address free of charge. It contains twenty large illustrations of vivisected animals and vivisecting implements, beside much valuable printed matter.

"To study pain properly it was necessary, so Professor Mantegazza thought, to create the most intense pain he could possibly contrive; and with this object in view he devised various combinations. One, which he found excellent, consisted in 'planting nails sharp and numerous, through the feet of the animals, in such a manner as to render the creature almost motionless, because in every movement it would hav felt its torment more acutely.' Further on he mentions that, to produce more intense pain (dolore intenso) he was obliged to employ wounds followed by inflammation.

"Going a little further, he devised, and, with the help of an ingenious machinist in Milan, brought into working order, the instrument depicted in our illustration, which is exactly reproduced from his book, page 98. This machine enabled him to grip any part of an animal with pincers with iron teeth, and to crush, or tear, or lift up the victim, 'so as to produce pain in every possible way.' The first series of his experiments, Signor Mantegazza informs us, were tried on twelve animals, chiefly rabbits and guinea pigs, of which several were pregnant. One poor little creature, 'far advanced in pregnancy,' was made to endure dolori atrocissimi, so that it was impossible to make any observations in consequence of its convulsions. In the second series of experiments twenty-eight animals were sacrificed, some of them taken from nursing their young, exposed to torture for an hour or two, then allowed to rest an hour, and usually replaced in the machine to be crushed or torn by the professor for periods of from two to six hours more. In the table wherein these experiments are summed up, the terms molto dolore and crudeli dolori are delicately distinguished, the latter being apparently reserved for the cases when the victims were, as the professor expresses it, lardeltati di chiodi (larded with nails)."

I will now quote, once more, from another part of "Light in Dark Places:"

"We now come (page 20) to an illustration which will be recognized by many readers—the first of the two stoves invented and used by Claude Bernard. It is taken from his 'Lecons sur la Chaleur Animale,' Paris, 1876, p. 347, and represents, as M. Bernard states, his 'first apparatus for the study of the mechanism of death by heat.' Of the results of experiments made with it he prints several tables. These tables show how dogs, pigeons, and rabbits baked in the stove expired at the temperatures of 98° or 100° Cent. in six minutes, ten minutes, twenty-four minutes, etc., and at higher temperatures at different intervals; and again how, when the apparatus formed a hot bath (i.e., the animal was boiled instead of baked alive), a different scale of heat and subsequent death was observed. A small dog placed in a temperature of 55° expired after eight minutes, and so on. Again, another series of results was obtained when the head of the victim was kept outside the stove, while its body was baked or boiled. 'The animals' (M. Bernard notes, page 356,) 'exhibit a series of symptoms always the same and characteristic At first the creature is a little agitated. Soon the respiration and circulation are quickened. The animal opens its mouth and breathes hard. Soon it becomes impossible to count its pantings; at at last it falls into convulsions, and dies generally in uttering a cry.'

"In a subsequent table M. Bernard gives the particulars of the deaths in this apparatus of seventeen dogs, and of numerous rabbits and pigeons; and then proceeds in the next lecture to show his audience the diagram of another and more elaborate stove, in which many other series of animals were sacrificed. . . . We try the same experiment (baking alive) on a rabbit. The same series of phenomena are exhibited, but more slowly, for it only dies at the end of twenty minutes!"

Vivisectors commonly endeavor to hoodwink the public with the assertion that nearly all animals are rendered insensible to pain, through the administration of ether, chloroform, or the like, before being vivisected. This is absolutely untrue, as a glance at the report of the Royal Commission (a document of several hundred pages) will suffice to show. Indeed, it is nearly, or quite, impossible to render the majority of animals thus insensible; many die before reaching an unconscious state, and still others at the very moment of its attainment. Abundant testimony was obtained from the vivisectors themselvs, during the sitting of the above commission, to discredit the statement that anesthetics are given except where it is for the operator's convenience to do so, which is but very rarely.

The greatest vivisectors hav declared, at the end of their careers, that their terrible experiments were barren of useful results, and, at most, could only point to possible success in the future. The dying Claude Bernard said that he passed away with empty hands.

Another fact which many of my readers may be surprised to learn is, that during the course of history numerous men and women hav been given over alive to the vivisectors (particularly by the government of Tuscany), and it may be well imagined how exquisit must hav been the delight of these learned(?) gentlemen in having an opportunity to test at length their multitudinous experiments on dogs and cats, upon real live men and women! Nor let it be imagined that in these latter days of the nineteenth century vivisectors hav gotten over their penchant for vivisecting human beings—by no means. Very recently two vivisectors seriously proposed (in the London Spectator) that condemned criminals should be given over to them for vivisection, instead of compelling them (the vivisectors) to resort to the vivisection of unoffending dogs and cats (an unusual and most beautiful ebullition of virtue on their part).

Within a very few months a great stir has been made in England by the fact (published in the London press by these worthies themselvs) that certain of the vivisectional fraternity had been administering to the free patients of a great London hospital a specific poison, from which several of these poor people suffered injuries from which it appears doubtful if they ever will fully recover. Numerous cats, to which it was also administered, died.

In their first published account of these abominable proceedings, these gentry did not claim that the poison given bore any relation to the diseases of the patients, but later (finding public opinion deeply incensed against them) they said that "they had hoped the poison might do their victims good!"—about as likely a sequence to their poisoning "experiments" on human beings, apparently, as that 2 and 2 will sometimes make 5.

E. B. Foote, Jr., says in his criticism, now before me, of my essay referring to vivisection, "To prove its utility would require more of my time and THE TRUTH SEEKER'S space than the subject is worth," etc.

Right you are, Mr. Foote. It would take more space to demonstrate such utility than would be contained in every line of every page of every copy of the noble journal in which I print these remarks that ever came from the press-room.

Here is a further example of Mr. Foote's lack either of information or of fairness: "It [vivisection] is, as I contend, not enough of an evil to deserve attention from those who hav time and strength to devote to reforms."

Not so fast, Mr. Foote, if you please. Wait until the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER peruse my account in this present letter, of the "experiments" of Mantegazza, and of Claude Bernard; if I do not err greatly, your coadjutor's "scratching-newts'-tails" theory is becoming slightly transparent beneath the focus I hav brought to bear on it, and similar "cock-and-bull" stories, calculated to mislead the lay-public.

As good, or better, judges than yourself bear testimony that the tortures which vivisectors inflict are "the most atrocious that the imagination of man can conceive.

Let no reader of this epistle be led to suppose from what you write that vivisection is on the decline, and that great cruelties are not now perpetrated. Whatever you or your brother may or may not hav seen during your medical apprenticeship, the fact remains that this atrocious practice was never more widely prevalent than it is to-day. Here in the United States, state of Ohio, one vivisector alone is reported to hav sacrificed three thousand animals! If extremely painful vivisection is unknown at the present day, except in very rare cases (as you would hav the public believe), why the carefully detailed directions to students by Professor Austin Flynt, of New York city, in his student's handbook of physiology, as to the correct method for them to pursue in vivisecting "the fifth pair" in a living, unetherized rabbit?

You will find this a hard nut to crack, if I mistake not. This "fifth pair" vivisection (as I fully explained in my original essay upon vivisection, in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Dec. 29, 1883), is esteemed by the leading physiologists of the world to be the most acutely painful operation which it lies within the power of man to inflict.

In a very valuable pamphlet by M. Scholl, printed in the French language, and now before me, I find the minimum number of dogs sacrificed, in the laboratories of Europe alone, by vivisectors each day of the year, to be estimated at one hundred and forty-three, or forty-two thousand, nine hundred every year (allowing three hundred working days to the year). To these stupendous figures for dogs must be added thousands upon thousands of cats, rabbits, guinea-pigs, horses, asses, etc. And yet Mr. Foote thinks the subject of too little importance to deserve the attention of philanthropists!

I believe three motivs only commonly enter into the calculations of the true vivisector: 1. A burning curiosity to see what animals will do when subjected to intense torment; 2. The love of cruelty inherent in men's nature, and which becomes enormously enlarged by the constant sight of blood and suffering. 3. Ambition to surpass in feats of horror, and hence science (?), their fellow-craftsmen.

What vivisector, of even common intelligence, would devote a lifetime to vivisecting in hopes of benefiting humanity, when no valuable results hav been obtained therefrom in all past time, and the most persevering vivisectors die (as did Claude Bernard) with the admission that nothing of value has been accomplished as yet?

You will pardon me, Mr. Foote, for saying that your slur upon the gentler sex, because they disapprove of the atrocities of vivisection, is not a worthy sentiment to emanate from the pen of a Liberal, and one of which you may liv to feel ashamed. I deplore it the more in emanating from you, whose illustrious father has proved in his various invaluable works a true benefactor and friend of woman. No man can afford to sneer at a cause because it is championed by women, for without the approval and sanction of intelligent and noble-hearted women, no great reform ever has, or ever will be, carried on to a successful issue. Woman is the great civilizer of the world, and her presence and influence in any reform can be but an unmitigated blessing. Intelligent male readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER will condemn you for the utterance of so narrow and unmanly a sentiment, and its female readers will, I feel certain, not be sparing of their disapproval.

If thoughtless women, as you say, wear the wings of slaughtered birds upon their bonnets, it is men who killed these birds and (at first hand) offer them for sale. The boiling alive of lobsters (to which you allude) is an abomination which should not be tolerated amongst civilized people. I hav used my influence against the practice for years, and I trust no one who reads these lines will ever be guilty of committing such a cruel act. If lobsters cannot be eaten except when thus prepared, humane people will unhesitatingly deny themselvs the delicacy.

That you question (as you say you do) that very painful vivisection is common, proves beyond the possibility of a doubt that you are "wofully ignorant of its atrocities" (as I suggested as being quite possible), and hence had better "shut up shop" as an authority on this subject, and allow someone else to take up the cudgels who is up to the times, both in this matter and that of the proper position of woman in all reforms worthy of the name.

I trust I hav not belabored you too hard, Mr. Foote. It is not you personally, but the class which you represent, that I attack; hence, "let not your angry passions rise" if I hav presumed to "handle you without gloves."

I will conclude this epistle with a poem of my own, now published for the first time, descriptiv of the renowned baker and boiler of living animals, about whom I hav had so much to say in this letter. It is entitled,

A VISION OF THE SOUL OF CLAUDE BERNARD.

The mind can merge itself, at times, with that
Which seems unearthly knowledge, and from out
The ghostly chambers of dim destinies, call shapes
In ages yet unborn. I once saw such—
Kind fortune grant I view them not again!
I had been conning, in a quaint, old room,
The vivisector's tale, and horrors strange
Crept through my curdling blood!—the fair earth paled!
Stood I, transfixed in black, abysmal hell!
And as I, shuddering, gazed on all around—
'Pon wraith of hideous crime and hapless woe,
A horrent genius rose, by which all else
Showed almost fair 'mid that infernal crew!
It bare not form of man, yet did I deem
It once walked earth, and dwelt in mortal mold,
Though eons since humanity had fled
Her outraged temple—and her charnel-house!
Its lean and sinewy hands were wet with blood
Of slaughtered innocents, whose poor, mute mouths
Could not denounce the author of their woe;
Dumb beasts they were, and yet to me it seemed
It wrought foul murder, that did butcher them!
And, ever and anon, 'pon those red hands
It gazed, with hellish joy Death could not kill!
Then, quoth I (plucking courage, lest my fears Should serve to whet it), "Answer! what art thou
To whom yon blood seems incense, sweeter far
Than Araby's blest gale?"—but dared no more.
It spake not, but those pitiless, fierce eyes
Fixed on me, in a gaze so horrible—
So full of lust for blood, for blood's own sake,
I swooned to look; yet, ere my sense had gone,
With gory finger viewed the phantom trace,
"In me behold the soul of Claude Bernard!"

ELLIOTT PRESTON.

Money and Its Meaning.

NEW YORK, Feb. 16, 1884.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Last evening Mark M. Pomeroy ("Brick" Pomeroy) lectured, according to announcement, before the Liberal Club (New York), on "Panics in the Commercial World, Their Causes and Cure." In the course of his remarks he diverged to the consideration of money and the greenback issues. He was followed by Mr. Courtlandt Palmer, who alluded with courtesy and appreciation to my little work entitled. "The Labor Dollar." Contrary to a general resolution I hav long entertained not to discuss the money question, incidentally, or except when with ample opportunity to explain myself somewhat at large, I was betrayed into making a five or ten minutes' speech on the subject, and, as usual, under those circumstances, succeeded, I believe, in getting myself quite generally misunderstood. I said among other things that money did not, as I had understood Mr. Langerfelt to assert, depend on any real value inhering in it, or the fact that it would ever be redeemed at the fountain-head from which it was issued; but simply and purely upon the fact that for the time being the community gave it their confidence, or believed in it; and I instanced the case of a bank which is utterly bankrupt, and so known to be by its directors, but in whose bills in circulation the community, ignorant of the bankruptcy, continue to hav confidence. I affirmed that those bills continuing to circulate, and to serve as the instrument of effecting exchanges, went on performing all the functions of money, and accommodating the public, in that respect, the same, and just as well as if the bills were really guaranteed by gold coin back of them. Hence I inferred that it is not the gold, or the guarantee, but the simple element of confidence, merely, which is the gist of the function performed by money. I added that there are three principal ways in which such confidence may be secured. One is to make the money-token of a material which has an intrinsic value—thereby furnishing an immediate and tangible ground of confidence going along with the token in every exchange—which is the hard money device. The second mode is to place collateral securities back of the token (as gold in the bank back of the bill), the intrinsic value not then accompanying the token, but being (supposably) within reach when called for. The third is a sentimental and generous confidence such as a people may giv to its government, a tribe to its leader, or the whole people to mere usage, not looking for nor expecting any real redemption of the token, except from the equal confidence of the same sort, on the part of other citizens, making them willing to take and so redeem it in each repeated transaction of trade. I said that this last kind of confidence, if it existed, gave to money all the sanction it needed; and that in that sense fiat money is philosophically justified; but that the extent to which a government can go, in utilizing this spontaneous faith of the people, is matter for grave consideration and wise experiment.

In his reply, Mr. Pomeroy ignored my exposition, and brought up instead a stock argument of the Greenbackers, that it is the legal tender character impressed on the token, by fiat of government, and that only, which makes it money. This position, which has been a powerful one with the orators of that party, in worrying their still less well-informed opponents, is still entirely erroneous, as I will show farther on.

When the session of the club closed, I was surrounded by critics and inquirers, with protests against my views, or with inquiries respecting them. Mr. Langerfelt, for instance, was indignant at me for having said, as he construed me, that a bad bill is just as good as a good one. Mr. Cohen asked earnestly, showing real insight into the subject, if it were not price rather than value which money represents. I was in that way convinced on the one hand that I had made myself only partially understood, and on the other, that there is a deep and earnest interest, among us, at length fully aroused on the subject. Years ago I tried to find listeners in discussing it, but nobody cared for it. Now it seems to me quite different; and, with your leave, I will make a short analysis of the subject, after my method; but such as will probably not hav been met with in the books, nor heard in the current political discussion on finance. To put it in better form for quotation or reference, apart from the mere circumstances I hav recited, I will giv the treatis a sub-heading or title, as below.

STEPHEN PEARL ANDREWS.

ANALYSIS OF THE NATURE OF MONEY.

All things whatsoever hav three very fundamental aspects, which are, 1. Essentials, 2. Incidentals, and 3. Accidentals. Essentials are those properties, features, or elements without which the thing is not at all, or cannot be, or exist, as the thing in question. Incidentals are those which, without being essential, are so usual and so implied in the idea that they follow, of course, as belonging to it, unless they are expressly excluded. Accidentals are those which the thing does not necessarily, or even of course, imply, and which must, therefore, be expressly supplied in order to belong to it, but which may be, and often are, so supposed. This, then, is our universological basis of criticism. The utmost confusion comes from the lack of this kind of discrimination in the estimate of things. Let us now apply this Canon (or Rule) of Criticism to the consideration of the nature of money.

Money is, in a general sense, the means, or, as it were, the tool, instrument, or contrivance, employed to aid us in making exchanges of commodities (things in trade), when there is delay on one side in making the actual delivery of the commodities, and a consequent credit or indulgence given on the other side—the money being that which is given temporarily in the place of the commodities which are not forthcoming. If, on the contrary, the two commodities or lots of commodity exchanged are both on hand at the time, and are mutually delivered, the transaction is called barter, and no money is needed or used. The need of money arises, therefore, wholly from the fact of credit or trust. In short, money is the direct and chief instrument of trade on credit. Money, therefore, strictly considered, instead of ever paying debt, is like a note of hand, an acknowledgment that a debt is due, ultimately to be paid (and the money redeemed) by the actual delivery of useful commodities, as agreed on. It is a contrivance to that end, seemingly a very simple one, but really, as we shall see, quite complex in its nature.

I.—ESSENTIALS OF MONEY.

There are three essential characteristic elements going to the make-up of the very idea of money, which, when they are all present, constitute money, and without any one of which money does not and cannot properly exist. These are:

I. It must be a measurer or measure of the mutual estimate of the parties of the basis of exchange in their bargain. The usual expression here is "a measure of values;" but that is not sufficiently exact for the present critical purpose. It would be better to say a measure of price, since price may refer to values, and usually does so in the present state of commerce, or to cost alone (the amount of labor put into the product), as it would do in a perfectly equitable commerce (a statement which I hav written a book, "Cost, the Limit of Price," to prove, and which I cannot elaborate here); hence it is better to say the basis of exchange to mean either value or cost or a mixture of the two; that, whatever it is, which fixes the price (or mutual prices) agreed on*. If values, then it need not be any other than those immediately concerned in the bargain; and again, it need not be the measure of the true or intrinsic values, even of these commodities; but merely of their values as estimated or assented to by the two minds—the agreement or consent of the parties to the bargain. They may underestimate or overestimate, which is not essential. Hence the expression is preferred: A measurer of the mutual estimate of the parties, of the basis of exchange (i. e., of the mutual prices agreed on, whether founded on value or cost).

In order to be a measure in this limited sense, or in any sense, the substance chosen to serve as money must be of such a character as to be conveniently divided into proportionate parts, as the metals, paper, parchment, and the like—and which a horse, a house, a cap, or a hat is not—so that its differences of quantity (dollars, dimes, cents, etc.) may be easily referred to, and may giv a sort of certainty to other things, as we refer to or use the inches on a scale or rule; and for the same reason that an elastic substance would not serve well for a yard-stick.

II. It (money) must be a token, or reminder, of the measurement it has served to effect; a convenient and off-hand permanent record of the terms of the transaction; so that, by referring to the ten dollars (for example) in hand or agreed upon, and held as the sum (in commodities) due, we recall the facts even after they hav been forgotten, by calling up this unpretending witness, to the extent of now knowing what amount of commodities it should command.

III. It (money) must contain a pledge or promis (express or implied) by the party handing it over or giving it out (by him who has failed otherwise to complete his part of the exchange; who has obtained the credit or delay—the debtor) to the party who completed his part by delivering commodities, that he (the debtor himself), when called on (the money tendered back), or that some one for him (if the money is tendered to that some one instead), will supply an amount of real commodities equivalent to the face of the money presented—which promis, if believed in by the community at large, who are then ready to step in, each man in turn, and fulfil the promis, expecting it to be fulfilled to him in like manner—becomes the general purchasing power of the money.

The pledge or mere promis does not necessarily imply any other security than the promis itself, and the faith that is reposed in the promiser; as, when lovers pledge or plight their faith, it is not usual to exchange or deposit jewelry or other valuables as "collateral" to indemnify each other in case of a breach of marriage contract. Still that may be done, and in respect to money is often done. But the two things must be distinguished. The promis and the faith in the promis are of the essence of money, but not the additional securities which may or may not be given to back up the promis. These may not be needed; but if deemed necessary to secure the fulfilment of the promis, that fact, or factor of the transaction, is, as will be shown, an accident merely. If the promis is accredited or sufficiently believed in, on any ground, this third essential condition is present—and these three conditions constitute money.

To recapitulate, these are thus:

I. Money is in the nature of a yardstick, a steelyards, a quart-measure, or any other measuring instrument.

II. Money is like a memorandum-book, a record, a monument, or any other reminder of a past transaction and its particulars.

III. Money is in the nature of a pledge or promis given and credited, or believed in, and hence acted on, as a basis of a trade—transaction—or of an exchange, where on one side the actual commodities are not at the time forthcoming.

II.—INCIDENTALS OF MONEY.

It is an incidental of money that it should hav currency; i.e., that it should be continuously believed in by a succession of people, and, at its best, by the whole community; so that everybody else, as well as the original promiser, shall be willing to stand in his place and redeem his promis, for the time being, by the delivery of the specified amount of real commodities upon the surrender of the money, used now as the evidence of the promis; and so that it should pass from hand to hand, when presented as a means of purchase, or should, in other words, go into circulation. But even this common attribute is not essential to its character as money. If one person has believed in it and received it, as the temporary equivalent of real commodities in a trade transaction, it is already money; although, if it be said that this one transaction is a beginning of circulation, then to that extent it is essential.

It is an incidental or usual property of money that it should be of a convenient character and form for transmission, for packing away, and for preservation. But this is not essential to its character as money. Lycurgus's iron money, which was expressly intended by its cumbersomeness to discourage the credit system and the use of money, was still, and none the less, money. There are doubtless some other incidentals of money, which it is not important to hunt out and characterize.

III.—ACCIDENTALS OF MONEY.

It is an accident of money that faith in its purchasing power (or real redemption) is sometimes backed up by something more than the mere promis. It is just as much money if all this confidence truly exists and rests merely on the well-known character for honesty and ability of the promiser; or on the established confidence, on whatever grounds, in the minds of others, giving it currency; but other security may be required, and often is. This other "collateral" or backlying security may be in the nature of intrinsic value in the token chosen to serve as money, as in the case of gold and silver coin; or it may be the (supposed) fact that such gold and silver money will be substituted for the paper token on demand at some bank or office for such exchange; or it may be merely the greater esteem and confidence of the people for a token issued by their government than they would be likely to hav for individual promis.

Paper money is to all intents and purposes money, if it hav the three essential qualities. Its real and final redemption is effected when it exerts its purchasing power, and is surrendered for its equivalent commodities, and so in each transaction where it is used. But, in the popular use of the term, "redemption" means the exchange of one kind of money, which carries an intrinsic security along with it, for another kind, the security for which is confidence merely. The gold is no more money than the paper, and has itself to be redeemed by the delivery of the actual commodities which it is said to purchase. In other words, the intrinsic value of coin is a collateral security to augment a confidence which the paper money may not command. But if the paper money does command the confidence requisit, the additional security is a mere incumbrance. It is like heavy armor worn amongst peaceable citizens. The intrin-

The Uncertainty of Salvation.

It is generally held by the Protestant church that the four gospels are essential to salvation. Christ said that unless we believe we must be damned. But without the gospels how can we know what to believe? The Catholic church in this rises superior to her rebellious daughter. With her the church is superior to the Bible. It is now admitted by the Christian scholars that nothing was authoritativly known of the gospels till about 150 years after the alleged birth of Christ. The assertions made by the church, that Mark wrote his gospel within ten years after Christ left the earth; that Luke penned his within a couple of dozen years after the same event; that John was only sixty-three years posterior to his hero, are all valueless and false. Then, if this be so, how, allowing the claim for the sake of argument, can the Christians of to-day expect to meet in heaven their few and feeble brethren of the first and second centuries? For certainly one hundred years there were no Christian gospels. Gospels there were, but they were not recognized nor quoted as Christ's words. Indeed, all the Christians for three hundred years were worse than gospelless, for in the primitiv days of Christianity there were many false scriptures in circulation. The sin of running after strange gods was vigorously denounced by Jehovah, and can we suppose that a belief in false gospels was any less dangerous to the soul's salvation? And it may be that now the church is on the wrong track, for we do not know who did really write the four gospels, and twelve—and perhaps thirteen—of the other books. So, if a knowledge of Christ's words is necessary to avoid the brimstone flames, what a slim chance the Christians of the world stand of preserving the integrity of their soul's tender skin!

Until printing was invented, the gospels and the whole Bible were beyond the reach of the people. In the early middle ages a copy of a Bible cost a large fortune; and aside from the cost of the work, the fact that each copy differed from every other copy impaired, we should say, the value of the book. It has been estimated that every copy of the Bible previous to printing facilities cost over eight thousand dollars of present values, and that sum in those times is equivalent to many times that now. Bibles were therefore scarce. But if without the Bible there can be no salvation, how did the people then living get by St. Peter at the gate? How did they know what they were to believe, or what they were to do, through their ignorance of the Bible and its teachings? The pulpit of to-day pompously asks, "What doth it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?" The Pews meekly respond, Nothing; and further query, "What shall we do to save our souls?" The Pulpit answers back, "Read your Bible. That is, always has been, and must always be, the only door to heaven!" But ever must come up that question of the people who could not, can not, and never will, get a Bible to read.

It is also supposed to be vitally important that the Bible should be read aright. There are over three hundred different Christian sects in the world. They differ in almost every vital dogma. Yet they all derive their authority from the Bible, drawing from it doctrins in opposition and contradiction to one another. About the only doctrin they hav in common is the one in which it is improbable that any are right—that is, that their particular sect is certain of heaven and the other sects equally certain of the other place. It is an impossibility for them all to be right. The Methodist prayerfully pours over the book, and comes to one conclusion; the Episcopal repeats his liturgical prayer, and arrives at a different conclusion; the Presbyterian goes into his closet, calls out his directions to the deity so that outsiders can hear him, rises from his knees, and says the Bible means this; the Baptist asks the blessing of God upon his studies and asserts the Bible means that; the Quaker, the Shaker, the Campbellite, the Mormon, the Unitarian, the Universalist, the Christian, the Congregationalist, the Catholic, the Mennonite, and all the others, little and big, say they hav the true meaning of the scriptures. They are all prayerful, devout, earnest, and sincere. Which is right, and what must we believe to be saved? Christ made belief the one prime consideration of salvation, and commanded that he that doth not hear let him be unto you a heathen and a publican. But who can tell us what Christ meant by his commands? The eternal things are all mixed up and there is none faithful enough to straighten them. Mountains and scriptural difficulties are not removed by faith, and, after all, those who cannot read the Bible are as well off as those who can. Our sympathy for the primitiv Christian is misplaced.

The Religion of Humanity.

It was Draper who said that nations, like individuals, hav their periods of youth, of manhood, of decay. This observation was not predicated upon hasty generalizations, or insufficient premises. It holds good of society and of religions. As Comte says, all essential phases in the evolution of society answer to corresponding phases in the growth of the individual. The highest progress of man and of society consists in gradual increase of our mastery over all our defects, as a child's progress is marked by the overgrowth of his babyhood faults. When the bib and rattle are laid away in the nursery, the child also lays aside many of his immature feelings. Fancies givs place to thoughts, aimless play to work with a visible object.

Under the rule of theology men hav been kept children. In other words, the intellect is the slave of the heart; reason subservient to emotion. It is the province of the religion of Humanity to giv men a religion worthy of man's estate; to furnish a rational outlet for those emotions, the abuse of which has led to foolishness of action and thought on the one hand, and cruelty and tyranny on the other.

Christianity satisfies no part of human nature. It approaches nearest to doing this in the affections, but it so perverts these feelings as to render them an instrument of exquisit torture, rather than a source of happiness. "If any man come to me and hate not his father, and mother, and wife," etc., "yea and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple." It is the criticism of the religion of Humanity upon the church, that the aim it sets before men, being unreal and personal, is ill-suited to a life of reality. The love of God requires the abandonment of all that is really worthy in life, and the abasement of manhood in utter rejection of reason. The desire for some central point round which all can meet, and to which all can cling who feel the need of some subjectiv leaning-post (which is all that God really is) is met by the new religion in its conception of humanity as a whole. This great being, compounded of separable elements, depends entirely upon mutual love knitting together her various parts. The disintegration of the great being would be the decay of humanity itself, and as to her existence there can be no Agnostics, for the object of worship is not like that of theological believers, an absolute, isolated, incomprehensible being, whose existence admits of no demonstration or comparison with anything real, but is a being, the evidence of whose existence is spontaneous, and shrouded in no mystery. The alleged saying of the Christian idol, "Inasmuch as ye hav done it unto the least of one of these, ye hav done it unto me," could hav no sense with him except in metaphor, but how appropriate and true a sentiment to be spoken in the church whose great being is composed of the "least of one of these."

Before we can, however, praise, love, and serve Humanity as we ought, says this religion, we must know the laws which govern her existence, an existence more complicated than any other of which we are cognizant. To accomplish this, not only must the supreme science of humanity be diligently studied, but the special sciences of life and the inorganic world be elevated and fostered. But science will be concentrated in the study of humanity, and all its researches will be to make this world and this life better and brighter. The men of science will also rise to the dignity of philosophers, and thus supplant the preaching impostors of the present, who teach neither science nor philosophy.

From philosophy to morality is an easy transition. The superiority of the foundations of morality implanted by this new religion cannot be gainsaid. Its morality is human in all its parts. By pointing out distinctly the way in which individual action reacts upon society, says Comte, it forces us to judge our own conduct without lowering our standard. Accepting the truths of science, it teaches that we must look to our own exertions for the only providence by which the hardships of life can be mitigated and avoided. The one great object of life is to become more perfect in every way. Christians' morality and reform are like their hell—exclusivly for their neighbors. In the religion of Humanity, by making the great being consist of the sum total of the race, there is a likelihood of ultimately attaining something near a perfect ideal; for in working for the great being, which is the sumnum bonum of existence in the new religion, each individual must improve himself, which is the object of all morality.

Poetry and art are cultivated by the religion of Humanity. They properly come under one head. And in the orthodox religion of Humanity (for there are already heretics and unorthodox members) art is placed ahead of science. Festivals are likewise a feature of the philosophical religion, and consist of two kinds, one to illustrate the existence of humanity; the other, her action. (It will be noticed that the great being is an improvement upon Jehovah, being of the feminin gender.) The first kind of a festival is called the static, and in it is illustrated the solidarity of the race—the oneness, Mr. Andrews might call it; the second, the dynamic, will explain social progress, and inspire the sense of historical continuity.

Such, in brief, are a few of the more important points—dogmas, some might call them—of the religion of Humanity. The propounder of the scheme is Auguste Comte, and the philosophy which it supplements is Positivistic. The immortality desired and expected by this school was shown in THE TRUTH SEEKER a few weeks since.

Pennsylvania is a Christian State.

It will be recollected by our older readers that in 1879 B. F. Underwood was engaged to deliver a course of lectures at Irwin Station, Pa. The schoolhouse, which, in that town, is used for a public hall, was hired by Wm. Crookston and others, representing the Liberals. The contract for its use was signed by Dr. McCormick, president of the school board. On the Sunday previous to Mr. Underwood's appearance the preachers united in an attack on the Liberals of the town, and on the coming lecturer, and demanded that the school board violate its contract and refuse the use of the school-house.

The next day the school board passed a resolution forbidding the opening of the school-house, but President McCormick refused to break the contract, and gave the managers of the lecture course an order on the janitor for the key. Mr. Underwood arrived on the day appointed, and the managers presented the order for the key. The janitor informed them that it had been delivered to the village constable by order of the school board, and he refused to surrender it. At the hour named for the lecture about five hundred people had gathered and were clamoring for admittance or their money. Finally A. M. Browser and Wm. Crookston forced open the schoolhouse door. The lamps were lighted and the hall was soon filled. All the leading church-members were present, however, and when Mr. Underwood began his lecture they drowned his voice by shouts, cat-calls, whistling, and stamping, at the same time addressing him in insulting and uncomplimentary terms. This was kept up so persistently that the lecturer was compelled to retire, and the meeting broke up amid great excitement.

The next day Messrs. Browser, Crookston, and Underwood were arrested on a charge of forcible entry, and detainer, and blasphemy. They gave bail to appear for trial, and the same evening Mr. Underwood delivered his lecture on "Science Against the Bible." The case against the three defendants came up at the April term of court, 1880. The suit was to recover damages for injury done to the schoolhouse by breaking into it, and by the "immoral and blasphemous use to which the building had been put." The damage was placed at $500. The injury done the building by breaking into it had been repaired for twenty-five cents. The jury deliberated for half an hour and returned a verdict against the defendants, fixing the damages at $150. The case was appealed, and the judgment of the district court has just been affirmed.

The result of this trial givs Pennsylvania a prominent place in the list of states renowned for bigotry and blue laws. Her courts hav made her the equal of little Delaware. It is, perhaps, useless to expect the Christian legislators at Harrisburg to change these blasphemy laws, but the attempt should be promptly made. Such of the politicians as escaped conviction for bribery may be found willing to set their state ahead a notch when they find the Liberals hav several thousand votes at their disposal.

A Devilish Outrage.

An outrage in which the chief offender will probably escape punishment was perpetrated at Corning, Ohio, last Sunday.

Two weeks ago A. J. McDevitt of that place caused the arrest, on a charge of gambling, of the pastor of the Corning Catholic church, the Rev. "Father" O'Boylan.

A wheel of fortune at the church fair was the instrument on which the charge was based. The pastor gave bonds and resumed his occupation. Last Sunday Mr. O'Boylan preached a sermon in which he denounced McDevitt as a villain and a murderer. The words of the priest made a most intense impression on his ignorant followers, who left the church breathing vengeance.

A blinding snow-storm was raging, and through it eight men made their way to McDevitt's drug-store, where they found him alone. Drawing revolvers they marched him to the door. The telegraph tells the rest of the tragedy in these word:

"For God's sake, what do you mean? What are you going to do?" asked the frightened and helpless man.

"You'll find out what we're goin' to do," replied the one who seemed to be the leader. "We're goin' to march you out of the town, for one thing, ye black-hearted son of a divil."

McDevitt asked to be permitted at least to get his hat and overcoat, and not be compelled to face the pitiless storm bare-headed and with only a thin office coat.

"It's little you'll want o' hats or coats when we're done with you," said one of the men, and they hustled him out into the street.

They marched him a mile west of town to a secluded spot, and then compelled him, at the muzzle of a revolver, to strip to the skin. As fast as the garments were handed to them they cut them into shreds with their pocket knives and gave the tatters to the winds. When he was entirely naked the leader of the pitiless mob ordered him to kneel in the snow.

"Would you kill me?" pleaded their victim.

"Kneel!" demanded the leader, sternly, and he enforced his order by the click of a pistol.

McDevitt knelt on his bare knees in the snow.

"Raise your right hand," commanded the leader.

He did so.

"Now swear by the Virgin Mary, the holy mother of God, that ye'll never set foot or face in Corning again, the longest day ye liv."

"I swear it," said the shivering McDevitt, through his chattering teeth.

The men then left him there and came back to town, shouting back, as they left him still kneeling in the snow, "Good night to ye, Mr. McDevitt. Good riddance to the likes o' ye!"

McDevitt has not since been seen, but gangs of men are searching for his remains, and swearing vengeance on his outragers.

When a man hires another to commit a murder or burn a barn he is regarded as particeps criminis, and punished accordingly. This priest deserves to share the fate of his activ helpers, whatever that may be, and it should be the severest the law allows. In the eyes of an Irish Catholic, an offense against a priest is a crime against God himself. A priest can raise a mob by a few incendiary sentences. His power in a Catholic community is immense. His dupes are prompt to catch his meaning, and it needs no direct command to incite them to deeds of most infernal cruelty. They can be thrown in conflict with the government as easily as they were induced to strip and leave to freeze a helpless individual who had offended a tool of Rome.

Catholicism must be watched, its crimes punished, its interference in public affairs rebuked, and the state aid now rendered it withdrawn. Fanatical ignorance led by designing knavery is too dangerous a force to permeate a republic without jealous watching in the interests of liberty.

Editorial Notes.

The Popular Science Monthly has an article on the "Disappearance of the Reptils." Can it be, asks the Winsted Press, thal Joe Cook and Anthony Comstock hav taken themselvs off?

A man and his family were found in East Winsted, Conn., last week, who had lived for several days on walnuts. They were too proud to beg, too honest to steal, and the father was unable to obtain work.

Daniel Curry, D.D., writing in the Independent, says it was not Garrison, not "Phillips and his following, nor the American people, nor Mr. Lincoln, acting out his own thoughts, that abolished American slavery, but Almighty God." It seems very curious if this be the case, and Almighty God is opposed to human slavery, that that great personage did not begin earlier his career as an Abolitionist. Certainly opportunities were not lacking. He might hav manumitted the slaves of the Old Testament as a starter.

The Lord does not seem to smile upon the efforts of the Methodists to convert the pagans of the Micronesian islands. In 1856 the church begged enough pennies from the Sunday-school children to build a vessel to be used by the missionaries in that unpromising field, but she was lost ten years after. Another was built, but she left her bones on the bottom of the sea within three years. A third is still afloat, but she is insufficient for the purpose, and to build another the church is again opening the little fists and grabbing the pennies therein. Great is Christianity—especially Methodism!

The nature and inutility of the parochial schools of this city are well illustrated in the remark of a porter in a down-town paper warehouse. His wife is an enthusiastic Catholic, and he himself is a nominal one, but possessed of rather too much sense to be truly faithful. His boy had been attending the parochial school at the instance of his mother, but one day the porter withdrew him and sent him to the public school. On being asked by a red-whiskered nothingarian drummer employed by the paper firm why he did it, he replied, "I didn't want him to study the lives of the saints; I wanted him to learn reading, writing, arithmetic, and spelling."

When Miss Justine Levy, a pretty young Jewess of Scranton, Pa., married Mr. John R. Farr, a Christian gentleman, her folks published a black-bordered "death notice" concerning the affair. This exhibition of fanaticism was rebuked by Rabbi Stern, of Wilkesbarre, who said that the intermarriage of members of two monotheistic sects had been decided to be regular by no less an authority than a rabbinical synod. By inference, then, the marriage of a monotheist to a polytheist would be a sin to be expiated by sacrifice. Religion is a funny business, and it takes many years to become an expert in it. As long as we hav studied theology, this kink is new to us.

The legislature of New Jersey refused to repeal the clause in the tax act exempting churches. It is not to be supposed that the short-weight and penny-pinching law-makers of a state whose judiciary hang chattering idiots to keep up their reputation for severity will ever voluntarily pay taxes on their religious joss-houses. We must admire the courage of the member who introduced the bill, but if he has only slightly studied paleontology he must know that tertiary-period fossils hav but little sympathy with nineteenth-century sentiments. As well expect Delaware to giv up her whipping-post or listen to Col. Ingersoll as New Jersey legislators to do an act of justice without immediate prospect of gain. The Pennsylvania Railroad has ruined the consciences of the Trenton statesmen.

Comptroller Swain has decided that all school property in Texas—the public schools and strictly charitable institutions alone excepted—is subject to taxation. This decision will reach property to the value of several hundreds of thousands of dollars, and add materially to the revenues of the state. The institutions affected number over one hundred, the larger proportion of which are controled by the churches, who maintain them to propagate sectarian dogmas. The rest are business schools conducted for profit. Among the church institutions are the Ursuline school, at San Antonio, and St. Xavier's Academy at Denison, institutions in which Catholics are manufactured to order. Mr. Swain is to be commended for the bold and honest step he has taken. Texas is a comparativly new state, and it is to her advantage that she start aright. Let her legislature extend impartial taxation to the churches and she will save herself much future misery.

On page 158 of this issue we print the address of David S. White, Esq., delivered before the Third Annual Convention of the Tonic Sol-fa Association. Tonic Sol-fa is a comparativly new system of teaching the art of song, largely in use in Great Britain, and now being introduced to some extent in this country. It is apparently much simpler than the old method of staff notation. The claim made for Tonic Sol-fa, as we understand it, is that it is a system derived, like the conclusions and demonstrations of Mr. Andrews, from the nature of things, although its discovery was made incidentally and by a man unacquainted with the science of universology. Mr. White is himself a disciple of the Great Universal Preacher, and a musician in a general way. Any inquiries which may be raised by the perusal of his address may be sent to David S. White, Mayor's Office, New York, who will, we hav no doubt, be pleased to furnish the desired information.

The Old and New Testaments are in conflict in Georgia, and a discussion is growing up between the Hebrews and gentiles of that state which bids fair to rival in bitterness the feuds of ancient times. In this case, however, the Christians cannot build a bonfire of Hebrew bodies as did their ancestors. At the last meeting of the Methodist conference two Hebrew brothers bearing the name of Magath, having presented themselvs as converts to Christianity, were licensed to preach. In Savannah and Atlanta their preaching stirred up the ire of the Israelite population, who denounced them as trading in the superstitions of gentiles. The most notable incident in their preaching occurred in Athens. A prominent Hebrew published a card stating that his brethren would not listen to the ravings of perverts, but if any respectable Christian preacher of gentile blood desired to enlighten his people they would giv him respectful attention. Rev. Mr. Davis, Methodist, offered his services. To this Rabbi Levi replied that not only would the Hebrews flock to hear Mr. Davis and giv him careful hearing, but that he himself would preach a return sermon to the gentiles, the only condition being that on neither occasion should the name of Christ be mentioned. Whether Mr. Davis will accept this condition has not yet developed.

Cant and imposture are the characteristics of the churches of to-day. The ministers know that the Bible is not what they pretend it is; among themselvs they openly admit the fact; but the people would be shocked to know the same, therefore it is concealed. It is solely for the good of the people that the conclusions of modern scholarship are locked in libraries and smothered in ministerial studies. Of course the bread-and-butter side of the question is of no account with our unselfish preachers.

Prof. Adler continues his efforts to reform the tenement house system of New York. Last Sunday he said that tenement house reform was really the first subject to be taken up in religion. The state of most of our tenements lowered self-respect and moral nature. He spoke for cleanliness for a moral purpose, for even the feelings of the cultivated and refined in the great cities must be lowered by the belt of contamination which surrounded them. The cry of better wages was but the old cry of "Stop thief!" He proposed to build one tenement of fifty feet front for a model. This could not amount to much with 38,000 thousand tenements around, but the vast good which would inure to the tenants would cause the building of more such houses as the demand spread for decent homes. The right to property was sacred, but the right to life was more so. The burning of the Van Riper family was an instance of the necessity of tenement house reform. Such houses should be torn down. Mr. Adler has raised $27,000, and has much more guaranteed. As soon as the architectural plans can be prepared the building will be begun.

Twenty-two New York and Brooklyn preachers receive $307,000 annually for their services in preaching the gospel of one who had not where to lay his head. Beecher heads the list with $25,000 salary, and perquisits at least equaling that sum. Heber Newton derives $10,000 a year from his pulpit, to say nothing of the fun he enjoys in seeing his brethren squirm over his utterances. For opening his cavernous mouth once a week and wearing his cap and bells with good grace, Talmage is paid $13,000 yearly. His perquisits are uncertain, but are no doubt large, as many people are willing to pay heavily to see a moral circus. Rev. Morgan Dix handles $20,000 in payment for keeping the women in subjection, and since Lillie Devereaux Blake got after him he earns it. Howard Crosby saves something out of his annual $10,000 by belonging to the Business Men's Moderation Society. The payment of John P. Newman's $10,000 is about as near the first cause of the little unpleasantness now running in his church as an analysis by able Methodists can determin. The "Little Church Around the Corner" yields Mr. Houghton $10,000, and Robert Collyer realizes an equal sum from the generous-hearted congregation of the Church of the Messiah. Ten thousand seems to be a popular salary, for out of the twenty-two aristocratic soul-savers listed by the World, thirteen worry along on that amount. As we insinuated at the beginning, Christ squeezed through life on much less; and if Paul's command to the brethren to hold all wealth in common were obeyed, these gentlemen would not be able to keep carriages and liveried servants while their betters are tramping the streets with leaky shoes.

"The subject of 'Church and State,' said Rev. E. E. Hale, to the class on public duties of an American citizen, "is not much discussed in this country. In Europe it is discussed a great deal. We hav attained a status that is envied by the whole world, and we hav almost no record of how we attained it. All the countries in Europe hav a strong ecclesiastical tinge in their organization, and where there has been an antagonism—not in England—between the church and state, it has generally been settled to the advantage of the church. The burning questions now before France and Spain are how far the state shall contribute to the support of the church. Carcless writers hav frequently said that the church and state in America were absolutely divorced from each other. That was because Europeans write upon our politics too much, and we write upon our fundamental principles too little. But," averred Mr. Hale, "there is not such a divorce as some imagin. It is the same body of men," he said, "who vote at the parish meetings who elect the governor and legislators of the state, and there is a great sympathy in the action of the church and state, though on paper the church and state are distinct. In the question of marriages the state and church touch," he said. "The state certainly should hav something to do with marriage, inasmuch as it must look after the legitimacy of the children and prevent adultery and prostitution. In the matter of oaths they touch again. The state, with all its pride, wants the truth, and can't get along without it. The state, therefore, says to the church, 'We will be glad to hav your full sanction in making this man tell the truth.' The church is very good-natured and replies, 'You shall hav it.' And then it turns to the man and says, 'You must tell the truth; if you don't you'll be damned.' But new difficulties arise when the Quaker refuses to swear at all, and the Agnostics refuse to be governed by the church in the matter. The drift," Mr. Hale continued, "is clearly to disconnect the state from the church on this subject, and the state must not attempt to bring ecclesiastical penalties to bear upon the witness." Mr. Hale favors taxing the churches, unless they spend for the public good a sum of money equal to the tax assessment. But would Mr. Hale favor exempting all property that did this? If not, where is his theory of equal rights for all citizens?

MONEY AND ITS MEANING.

sic value of hard money, supposed formerly to be so essential, turns out, therefore, on analysis, to be a mere accident; not even an incident; still less an essential of money.

In like manner, the "legal tender" attribute of certain money is neither essential nor incidental, but merely accidental. It is a mere contrivance of the governmental authority to limit misunderstanding, quarrel, and litigation, where money is concerned. While money is a representativ of unpaid, or undelivered, commodities, it in turn is a commodity relativly to a common note-of-hand which is a promis to deliver money. But as there are various kinds of money afloat, this promis to deliver money is not definit. One of the two parties may tender as money that which the other party does not believe in, or think as good as some other; and a fruitful source of litigation occurs. To meet this difficulty and keep the parties out of the court-house the government specifies a particular kind of money which, if tendered, shall be received for such indebtedness; or, if not, the party refusing it shall hav no aid from the courts to collect his debt. But the parties can, if they choose, specify in their contract the kind of money intended, and then the "legal tender" falls, and the courts will enforce the contract as it is. The legal tender qualification is, therefore, also a mere accident of money.

Again, that money should bear the impress or fiat of government, or not, is a mere accident; and not incidental nor essential. Money, as an instrument of trade, never grew up out of government action, and does not rest upon it. Its currency may be favored by it, by increasing confidence, and certainty, and convenience, but not otherwise. Money grew up out of the social necessities of the people, and probably existed long before there was any government, properly so-called. The wampum of the North American Indians was just as essentially money as the best greenback or bank bill or gold coin—only not so well made an instrument. The stock argument that what passes in our country as money will not pass in another, for want of the proper government stamp, locally, does not alter the case. All that is accidental, affecting the degree of confidence merely. The old United States bank bill, or the Mexican dollar, had just as much currency in China as in the United States or Mexico; becaue confidence existed. If, on any ground, confidence should cease to exist in any one kind of money all over the world, that money would be money, and would hav currency all over the world.

Finally, that the money will ever be redeemed in any other way than by exerting its purchasing power; that it is or is not with or without additional security back of it; that if the security or the confidence fail, it will cease to hav currency; and that if it does cease to hav currency somebody will suffer loss equal to the amount held. All of these considerations are accidents more or less unfortunate, and needing various devices to guard against them; but none of them touching, in the least, the essential nature of money. The bill of a bank that is completely insolvent goes on serving all its purposes as money (helping to exchange commodities) just as well as before, so long as the public believes the bank to be solvent. Hence it is not the real condition, but the supposed condition, of things, and the resulting confidence, which is the gist of the purchasing power of money; which justifies Mr. Boucher's proposition that money is essentially not a thing, but an idea.

It is, however, a frequent absurd and gross error to suppose this statement to mean that a bank bill really worthless is just as good for all purposes as a good bill. All that is meant is that so long as it is accredited by the public it is equally good as an instrument for effecting exchanges. Thousands of people may be convenienced by a bill which is destined never to be redeemed in gold. A coin of such a size that it may be easily swallowed by the baby is not so good to prevent disaster of one kind, in the family, as a larger coin not liable to be swallowed, but is equally good to buy candy; in which connection the possible accident to the baby is not taken into the account. So the fact that if the bank fails the holder of its bills will suffer loss, does not in the least affect the goodness of the bills, as money, so long as the bank does not fail; and, still further, so long as the public hav not learnt that fact and lost confidence. The accident to the baby and the accident to the individual bill-holder who gets caught by giving a confidence which was not warranted, are mere accidents, from the point of view of the essential idea of money.

Missouri Churches in a Bad Way.

The town in which I liv is noted for its numerous churches, its very bad boys, its lack of rational amusements (they being all crushed out by the churches). Every winter there hav been, for the last twenty years, exciting "revivals" in which, after earnest beseechings to "flee from the wrath to come," the "mourners" pressed forward and filled the first one, two, or even three front pews. Here, hoary-headed men, blooming maidens, and callow youth, even infants, made a pandemonium of cries, groans, tears, and shouts. The receipts, of course, were increased in a manner gratifying to the pastoral brethren who had earnestly prayed that they might "be blessed in their basket and in their store." This winter one denomination had its revival, and the fruits of two weeks' panorama of hell-fire was one poor little girl. Another denomination has hammered away two weeks and continues to do so, but not one "mourner," so far, has gone to the "mourners' bench." The other denominations made no attempts this winter.

There is no reason for friends of truth to be discouraged. We hav seen, and still see, a greater revolution than was ever before wrought in so short a time.

The Truth Seeker Annual and Freethinkers' Almanac.

I take a great pleasure in recommending to our friends this valuable publication. It is a new departure in the right direction.

It is a bright light gleaming upon the pathway of all future generations.

As far back as I can mind, the almanac and the Bible hav been the two books that hav been found in all homes, the two most read and best appreciated.

Henceforth the newspaper will take the place of the Bible, but as no other periodical can take that of the almanac, it is a grand and glorious idea to hav one that is devoted to truth, fact, and science, instead of weather guesses, saint days, pious twaddle, and medical cure-alls.

The TRUTH SEEKER ALMANAC is certainly a gem; an encyclopedia of valuable facts, and a mine of useful information.

It is a splendid book of reference. It has a regular chronicle of events, dates, etc., for each day of the year, not St. Peter's Day, St. Alban's Day, John the Baptist's Day, and such other pious records, but it has D. M. Bennett's Day; Elizabeth Cady Stanton's Day; Horace Greeley's Day; Lydia Maria Child's Day; Thomas Paine's Day; Frances Wright's Day; and those of other good, true men and women who hav benefited their race and hav left and will leave the world better than they found it.

There are splendid quotations from Ingersoll, Huxley, Bennett, Confucius, and other philosophers, and tip-top contributions from some of our best authors. Peter Eckler's description of the Old Free Enquirers' Association of New York is very interesting. In it he givs a fitting tribute to Frances Wright and her book, "A Few Days in Athens;" and right here I will say this book has been one of my choicest treasures from early girlhood, and I am glad to see this mention of it in our first almanac. "Ten Years of Freethought," by G. E. M., is also full of notes and jottings, well worth being remembered. H. L. Green has a good article on "The New York State Freethinkers' Association"—just the subject the great organizer of Liberal works is best fitted to treat upon.

Our Theron has several pages of valuable matter descriptiv of the grandest association in the world, "The National Liberal League," an association no one man has done more to keep alive and in good working order than has Mr. Leland himself.

Then comes a list of our Liberal Leagues, with names of the presidents, a list that should always stand honored as being the beginnings of Liberal conservativ organized work.

Mr. Stevens, in his interesting article, "Liberal Thought in Canada," tells us how Liberals in that dominion are taxed in their efforts to obtain useful information. He says, "I ordered from New York a small parcel of books, price, sixty-seven cents, charges on which amounted to sixty-five cents."

The old veteran publisher, Josiah P. Mendum, has a brief description of "Paine Memorial" and its uses. This being the only public building ever erected in memory of Thomas Paine, it is to be regretted that the article was not supplemented with a plate of this grand and noble structure. Pictures speak so much more expressivly than words; and we hav so few really Liberal pictures.

S. P. Putnam's "Ideal World" is so poetical, earnest, enthusiastic, and beautiful, so full of burning, blazing thought, that I feel like quoting it entire. He says: "Instead of growing less, this ideal world is growing larger as we come to a more clear and deep understanding of what is. Science unlocks a thousand springs that from the very heart of earth and sky fling their brightness into this invisible domain of mighty hope and impulse. Life becomes more royal as it sweeps in harmony with the force of nature. . . . The radiant links of the eternal order bind us to the true, the beautiful, and good, and we see the meaning of our work—that the seed of to-day blooms in the fruit of to-morrow, and that what we do joins itself on the stream of time with all the shining harvests of the race."

Our "Bell" has some good ideas on "Industrial Education," one of the most important movements of the age.

Chainey sticks fast to his "Rock of Ages," This World. He says: "What are all the pictures of heaven compared to these joys of earth? What is a host of angels compared to a true friend? What are all the cherubim and seraphim, and all the winged and wheeled creatures of heaven, compared to the children that expand and enrich our lives as we seek to strew their paths with flowers? Above all, what is the fair virgin of paradise—the mother of God—to the Catholic, the queen of heaven, and the star of the sea, compared with a true wife, the star of our love and queen of home?"

Eugene has a good article, "Agnosticism and Immortality." He says: "Nature has inspired men with a desire for existence; it is but natural that they should not wish to be blotted out. Yet if our little life is rounded with eternal sleep, if we are blown out like a candle, we shall be no worse off then before we awoke and the flame of life touch our candle-wick."

A brave list of "Liberal Charities" is given, and I hope each year more will be handed in and recorded, so that Christians will see that we do not "lay up our treasures in heaven," but use them for the earthly good of our race.

One quite lengthy and interesting story, "Big Jack Small," makes the work complete. The illustrations are fine, and I trust each year will increase their number. And I here suggest that a picture of the monument of our Bennett will be in the next issue, so all the contributors to it, as well as the rest of the world, will see the stone under which rests the sleeping hero of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and the true friend of humanity. I am sure every Liberal will want one of these almanacs, and will file them each year in regular order. They will thus become in a decade an encyclopedia of immense value of interest and instruction. If twenty-five cents' worth of more important facts hav ever been before compiled for Liberals, I do not know of its existence. Truly, ELMINA.

WHAT OUR CORNER EDITOR SAYS.

"What a pretty book!" I exclaimed, when I first saw THE TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL, and so full, too, of useful information, suited for all tastes. I am quite charmed with it, for it is a book that you can take up again and again, read over and over, and find a gem to admire every time you open it. I was most delightfully surprised with it. The articles are all fine, the illustrations perfect, and all is in such excellent taste that I wonder how it can be sold at the low price of twenty-five cents. If it is not already in every Freethought family, it ought to be, and I trust it will be, for really nobody should afford to be without it.

THE TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL AND FREETHINKERS' ALMANAC. 284 (1884). With eighteen full-page illustrations. New York: published at THE TRUTH SEEKER office. Price, 25 cents. For sale at this office.

This first attempt in the way of a Freethought almanac in America is a success, a grand success. Its one hundred large octavo pages are replete with most interesting reading matter. In the almanac proper we find the usual astronomical facts, together with much of especial interest to Freethinkers.

There are contributed articles by Peter Eckler, Eugene M. and Geo. E. Macdonald, T. C. Leland, Charles Stevens, J. P. Mendum, S. P. Putnam, C. Watts, W. S. Bell, George Chainey, and H. L. Green. Mr. Leland's article is a condensed history of the National Liberal League, and in connection with it he givs the constitution of that body and a list of the local leagues. A sketch of the Freethought movement in England during 1883 is taken from the National Secular Society's Almanac. A list of foreign Freethought societies is given; a list of Liberal charities; also of noted Freethinkers and reformers; population and area of the states and territories; a partial list of the ancient and modern schools of philosphy; the sacred books of history; "Jefferson's Religion," useful measures, a number of short poetical and prose articles, and the story of "Big Jack Small."

The leading poems are "Sword and Pen," by Geo. E. Macdonald, and "Meditations of a Hindoo Prince and Skeptic." These are each very fine.

We hope to be able to soon hav space to giv our readers some samples of the bill of fare prepared by our enterprising TRUTH SEEKER friends, but now we can quote from its broad pages these lines only, applying them to this annual as compared with all preceding ones:

There is nothing so good as the new,
There is nothing so poor as the old;
Better the morning's silvery dew
Than the evening's river of gold
Better a thousandfold.

Doubts if He Saw God.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In James Russell Lowell's alleged sonnet on Wendell Phillips, he says, "He saw God stand upon the weaker side."

The undersigned had the pleasure of corresponding, to a slight extent, with Phillips, and the latter never mentioned seeing God. If he did it was very reprehensible in him not to tell us what he looked like (not to murmur of photography). Our Anglo-American dude must be mistaken.

Letters from Friends.

MILWAUKEE, WIS., Feb. 13, 284.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $1 for your paper. THE TRUTH SEEKER grows better each number, and I like it the best of our Liberal papers. You hav my best wishes always.

FARMINGTON, UTAH, Feb. 10, 284.

MR. EDITOR: Please find within fifty cents, for which send me two ANNUALS. From the advertisment I judge them to be an annual necessity, and will do a deal of good. The dear old TRUTH SEEKER is the first among our many papers, and ever wanted. Our greatest need just now in Utah, I think, is some of our best Liberal lectures to lessen the Mormon majority.

With best wishes, H. W. HAIGHT.

ALUM ROCK, PA.

MR. EDITOR: Denton says, "A perfect man the world has yet to see;" and I suppose a perfect paper the world has yet to see also; but THE TRUTH SEEKER comes damned near to perfection since the "Children's Corner" and Putnam's story hav been added. I see no chance to improve anywhere; and where man can't improve, there is no use of God's trying. Compare THE TRUTH SEEKER with the best publication the Christian world can produce, and one minute's examination will show where all the merit is. The country is safe. Freethought is spreading like wildfire nearly everywhere. May you liv long and prosper. G. W. DINSMOOR.

NORFOLK, NEB., Feb. 8, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Allow me to say a few words about prohibition, as everybody seems to be nearly crazy on the subject. I would advise prohibition all around. Commence on marriage; prohibit a man from getting married unless he has a certificate from an orthodox preacher, showing that he is not consumptiv and free from every disease that is hereditary, a bald head not excepted. Then question as follows: Do you drink any? Do you smoke any? Do you use any medicin that has the smell of opium? Do you chew gum so as to cause your jaw to wag? Do you know that whisky will destroy the body and Infidelity will destroy both soul and body in hell-fire? Keep mum of the millions that are sent to the kingdom come before the first birth, let alone the second. JAS. GOODMAN, M.D.

ZANESVILLE, OHIO, Feb. 6, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I like your paper very much. I hav been taking it ever since it was published in Illinois. I am happy to see the strides Freethought is making. It does me good. I remember the time that I hardly dared to open my mouth as to any story contained in the so-called Christian Bible. It is different now, and times hav changed. The multitudes are becoming more intelligent, and, thanks to all the great Freethought advocates, Freethought is spreading. I honor all honest men for their opinions, and despise hypocrits. I hav never been influenced by the bibles or the supernatural since I could think for myself. Probably I was born a genuin Freethinker; but, as I hav read, a man who does right, being honest and upright, needs no savior; in fact, I hav not ever been cognizant of possessing any other individuality than my reason, the make up of which is my five senses. I am not aware of being double. I am satisfied I am here; I shall be satisfied when I go hence to the grave. I am with Solomon, who says there will be no more of us. J. BURGESS.

LAKE CITY, IOWA, Feb. 7, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find money to pay for the ANNUAL. I am much pleased with the manner in which your paper is managed, but cannot be deceitful enough to say I think the editorials excel those of Mr. Bennett. I do not think that man livs who could quite equal Mr. Bennett in putting in sledge-hammer blows at the right time and place. I think your paper, all in all, never was better than at the present time. I desire to thank that good and noble man, Elliott Preston, for his labors in behalf of animal creation. Yes, dear brother, from the bottom of my heart I thank you. You surely hav taken lessons from the teachings of Buddha, who said every good man would hav the same regard for every living creature that he had for himself, and I truly believe it. I hav no words of condemnation strong enough to express my loathing and contempt for any man that has one word to say in behalf of vivisection, and I do not believe there is a man living that has a disposition above a hyena or jackal that would engage in any such damnable business. I hope every Liberal having a kind, humane heart will speak out against this crime of all crimes. To say that such wickedness is committed in the interest of science is worn out and entirely too thin. Now, after asking pardon of the hyenas and jackals for comparing them with human brutes, I bid you a kind adieu.

J. L. TOMPKINS.

JACKSON, MICH., Jan. 2, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: An article in your paper by Elliott Preston, upon the painful subject of vivisection, was partially read, not wholly, because the subject was of so terrible a nature that I could scarcely endure the torture of even reading it. But it created the firm determination to do all that lies within my power to crush out such a monstrous practice. Oh that such things can be done, that creatures falsely called men—demons rather—can be found that will commit such fearful deeds! Words fail to express the horror of my soul. The community stands aghast at some murder; the murderer is hanged or sentenced to prison for life. Justice, they say, is satisfied. What then would satisfy justice for such acts as these, the torture of innocent, helpless creatures? A murderer is white and pure beside such criminals as these, for the victims of murder suffer but a short time generally. But this is deliberate torture. Science! Medical science! the less of it the better, bought at such a price. I would rather die; I had rather that my children, who are dearer far to me than my own life, should die than anything should be tortured to save them. These may seem strong words, but they are true, and I believe there are many humane people that will say the same. The death of an animal is nothing, nor, if necessary, dissection after chloroform is administered; but the living, conscious, quivering flesh—O God! No human life nor animal existence should be saved at such a fearful cost. Enough of words; now to business. Is this practiced in all medical institutions, or are there special ones? Did Mr. Bergh's lecture before the legislature hav any effect to prohibit or check the evil? Which would be the better method? Appeal to the legislature or arouse the indignation of the people? If circulating papers and books on the subject among the law-makers would effect the desired object, it would be better to do so, thus saving much suffering of mind. If that course will not succeed, then appeal directly to the people by voice and pen, the press, the pulpit by every means, until such a storm of indignation is aroused that the law-makers and the offenders will not dare to disregard it.

What is the address of the Society for the Prevention of Vivisection? What is its membership, and what are its terms of membership? Please reply through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Now, let every one unite, who has any knowledge of this subject, and resolve to fight against this monstrous crime until it ceases to exist. MATTIE C. MITCHELL.

OSCEOLA, IOWA, Dec. 25, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: For your persistent efforts to abolish superstition I admire your paper; for helping to knock all the gods from their pedestals, I commend you; for contributing with Ingersoll to knock the bottom out of hell, I giv you great credit. But high above all these considerations I honor you for the recent indications that your efforts are likely not to be limited exclusivly to metaphysics—to gods and devils, to heaven and hell, to celestial affairs only. In your recent numbers are indications that point to a protest against the grievous wrongs for many years perpetrated against honest labor in this world. Some indications in your late paper recognized the fact that both the old parties are corrupt, and care for naught but the "spoils." Haughty monopoly and down-trodden honest labor are in a great measure the results of party lobbying all sorts of injustice through Congress. Reform of any kind is out of the question by means of the old parties; and any paper that is so far in advance of its compeers as clearly to admit this proposition is greatly to be commended. Gerald Massey's hymn, "The People's Advent," is prophetic, and a few good papers like THE TRUTH SEEKER, in the van of progress, will help to fulfil the prophecy. Would any one paper, belonging to the "associated press," be willing to admit, or dare to hint, that the two old parties hav outlived their usefulness (useful now only to monopoly and oppression)? Yet such is the fact.

JACKSON, MICH., Feb. 13, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I herewith send you an account of a church row, as I clip it from our daily: ADA, OHIO, Feb. 12th.—A disgraceful scene occurred at the Baptist church Sunday morning and in the evening, which was only stopped by the interference of the police. At the meeting of the Sunday-school in the morning, Deacon D. A. Wood, a leader of one faction of the church, declared the election of a Mr. Enos as assistant superintendent of the Sunday-school null and void, and made some very uncomplimentary remarks. Superintendent Cary ran down from the pulpit, and, shaking his fist under the deacon's nose, commanded him to sit down. The deacon's friends arose to his rescue, and commanded Cary to sit down. The two factions then cried out, "Sit down!" "Cover me up with sawdust!" "No gamblers allowed to vote here!" etc. The superintendent endeavored to dismiss school, but the deacon commanded his party to remain, as he desired to hold prayer-meeting, and rallied his forces by singing, "Hold the Fort." One faction left and the other remained. In the evening the church was filled to overflowing with the curious, in anticipation of another row, as three members who were expelled from the church were to hav their trial. Promptly at 7:30 o'clock the music began; the deacons jumped to the floor; sometimes as many as twenty persons were yelling at one time. Roughs who had congregated cheered, women screamed, and everything was confusion. The police finally quelled the riot, and the meeting closed without attaining any result or receiving the benediction. J. B. STOCKHAM.

NEW ALEXANDRIA, O., Jan. 20, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: In response to your call for names, quite a number hav occured to me, and with a hope for their mental liberty and to increase the circulation of your worthy paper, you get them. They are, I affirm, each and every one, persons who are governed by their own thought and whom I should love to see liberated from the last of the threatening chains of their infamously diabolical superstition. And I would proffer a suggestion. If your "Catalog of Liberal and Scientific Books" is not too expensiv, send them to a few parties, keeping a memorandum of the names, and observe the result.

The reason is this: persons reared in orthodox families are taught that none object to Christianity but the lowest types of characters with whom it interferes, and then it is only because they hav not reflected upon its "most wonderful truths;" and if hearing and disbelieving still, they were, beyond all doubt, special instruments of the devil and invariably bigoted ignoramuses.

Now this is the influence your catalog had on me. There are names of the most profound scholars and scientists—Haeckel, Huxley, Tyndall, Humboldt, et al—either defying Christianity openly or giving their voices to scientific productions from which the Infidel gets his foundation. Now, I don't like to say it, but it staggered my confidence in my Christian instructors at once. However, reflection caused me to think their experience was not dissimilar to mine up to that time and that they had not intentionally lied to me. But seeing the names of so many noble, yes, illustrious, characters adorning the pages of that little book, roused a spirit to investigate for myself; hence, besides several dollars' worth of Freethought works, I am a subscriber to your paper. This is only a suggestion, remember, and I feel that I'm a Liberal. R. H. R.

LAWRENCE, MASS., Feb. 7, 284.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed 35 cents, for which please send me "Crimes of Preachers," also "False Claims," by John E. Remsburg.

As the ministers throughout the country hav organized for the purpose of influencing legislation in favor of more stringent divorce laws, etc, a copy of "Crimes of Preachers" should be placed in the hands of each member of the different legislatures, that the hypocrisy of the clergymen may become apparent and thus lessen their influence among law-making bodies. Cannot some such plan be devised? J. P. THILSON.

JOLIET, ILL., Feb. 10, 284.

MR. EDITOR: What do we know of nature beyond matter and electricity and magnetism? I believe these to be the triune God, and why look for something that does not exist? I believe that electricity and magnetism acting upon matter constitute the soul; and when the body dies, it passes back to its great fountain, and the soul also returns to its fountain. I believe that matter always did and always will exist, and also the soul (or magnetism and electricity); and soul and body both lose their identity.

Now, I will try to giv my view of Spiritualism. There are "mediums"—I call them connecting wires—and they are human bodies, but connect with this great fountain, their material body, with the soul fountain, and form images to suit their imaginations. If not, why hav different teachers? I should think that they would hav one spiritual teacher, and that he would teach all alike. I think there is an ethereal telegraph that will yet be discovered by which a person may, here in America, commune or converse with another living person in any part of the globe. I wish some one would consider and let me know if I am wrong.

When we can once learn what constitutes the soul, a gate will be opened between the orthodox and the Liberals. Then we can answer, when asked the question, What becomes of the soul? that it has gone to its element with its fountain-head; I think this would harmonize Liberals and Spiritualists when once established.

There are a great many Liberalists in this city, and what we want is that two or three good lecturers should come here and speak. We hav 20,000 inhabitants, but the city is governed by Jesuit influence. Every saloon-keeper is a Roman Catholic. We hav three or four Catholic churches, one German, and two Irish, and, I believe, one at the rolling-mills. Our police justice is a German and a Liberalist. I am a cripple, and hav to use two canes to walk with, or I should try to start a Liberal League. I am doing all I can to hav one formed. Our city has improved morally since the liquor license was raised to one thousand dollars. I asked two brothers, liverymen, if they would read Remsburg's lecture. "Oh, yes;" they had "nothing else to do nights and Sundays;" so I gave THE TRUTH SEEKER to one of them on Sunday morning, and went across the street. When I returned, the other followed me and handed me the paper, saying, "That's a nasty paper—it is not fit to read." The men are Roman Catholics. We hav two Presbyterian, two Methodist, one or two Lutheran, and how many more churches I don't know. S. G. SCOLLAY.

HELENE, NEB., Feb. 29, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I received the pamphlets and ANNUAL all right. The ANNUAL is immense. I had no idea of its real value till I read it, and cannot understand how you got so much together in such grand style for the insignificant sum of twenty-five cents.

"False Claims" is a clincher; so is "Crimes of Preachers.' They must be the means of making the saints feel very uncomfortable. What rascals they are! and Billings has made them appear in full dress.

"The Problems of the Universe" is in every respect a masterpiece. I hav advocated the same ideas for a number of years, but was not capable of dressing my thoughts in such grand language. I think Putnam is one shake ahead of anything I hav ever seen, and my private opinion, publicly expressed, is that it will be some time yet before anyone gets even with him.

Over thirty years ago I read Paine's "Age of Reason," and had not seen it from that time up to this winter. I hav been reading it of late, and must say it is a most wonderful book. Everything that has been written on the subject from that time to the present has added nothing material to it. Thomas Paine touched the key-note, and others hav only extended the strains. Could Paine's writings be read more, we would hav fewer crimes of preachers. Let Liberals see to it that it is put into the hands of the young. W. P. BROOKS, M.D.

FLOYD, VA., Feb. 1, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: We hav been passing through the dark shadows of our days. Our little babe, the joy and pride of our lives, has been taken from us by the merciless hand of death. Its age was four and a half months.

For a little season it came to gladden our hearts with smiles, then it passed away in childhood's morning, when the flowers of love and sunshine bloomed. I would gladly hav taken its place on death's sad bed, but alas! that could not be. Each one must go through the dark valley alone.

There is hope until death, and consolation after death. The cheering words of Ingersoll were ever with me during the babe's sickness. "In the night of death Hope sees a star, and listening Love can hear the rustle of a wing."

My one consolation is that its little eyes will never again be dimmed with tears. We know that "on the shores of death the sea of trouble casts no wave; hearts of dust do not break." Death touched the weary little heart, and he rests in the bosom of his Mother Earth, with her tender arms thrown lovingly around him. In that dreamless sleep called death no cries or shrieks of war or famin or distress can awaken him; and so we will think of him as resting in calm and peaceful sleep.

DESDEMONA, TEXAS, Feb. 11, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Next week I will send you cash for four subscribers. The cause is growing slowly here, and orthodoxy gradually decreasing. We want a Liberal lecturer to shake up the dry bones and let the light of truth in.

The Independent Pulpit is doing good work in this state. The children are delighted with their Corner. "Waifs and Wanderings" is getting almost as good as "Golden Throne." The fact of the business is, we Liberals think your paper is improving all the time. Now while I think of it, you may possibly want just ten dollars, so will send our names and the cash. Wishing you a happy New Year, and a double subscription cash down, the subscriber—ourself—a full-blooded Infidel.

MR. EDITOR: I would like for some one to tell the reason why gold is deposited in the natural quartz in higher or mountainous regions more than any other ore mineral, for we are all here to liv and to learn the way and purpose of all things. I love to hear the doors of wisdom opened against superstition. I think your paper is improving very much. The Children's Corner is a golden thread in the volumes. I would like to hav a talk with Mr. Putnam, Mr. Chainey, Mr. Watts, or any other sound Freethinker, for the words of such men are nourishing to the minds of all who are Liberal. I wish them goodspeed into every household. I am trying my best to Liberalize by distributing my papers among people who will not consent to subscribe. I think that by and by they will walk into the ranks. May your paper long liv to send its echo to the remotest bounds of the earth.

HART, MICH., Feb. 12, E.M. 284.

MR. EDITOR: The grand old TRUTH SEEKER comes to hand in due time, and the perusal of it givs me much pleasure and strength to fight the old theology in this place, as I am a radical Liberal and a Materialist. The pious people hav given me a through ticket for hell, but on the whole I rather like it, as it will assure me of good company, such, for instance, as Paine, Franklin, Jefferson, Bennett, and Ingersoll, and hosts of other great and good men. If we liv after death I would much rather enjoy the society of these men than walk the streets of the New Jerusalem with monsters like Calvin, Booth, Guiteau, Cook, Comstock, and their ilk, and hav to shout myself hoarse in singing praises to the God of such angels. I hav no taste for shouting praises to such a God. I do like to talk common sense to deluded and creed-bound children of men. THE TRUTH SEEKER helps me much in convincing some of them of truth. Long may it liv and prosper.

Inclosed please find 75 cents, for which please send me the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL, "Problem of the Universe," and Paine's "Age of Reason."

GILBERT G. GABRION.

CASNOVIA, MICH., Feb. 6, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: We hav a prohibitory law against moral sins which is said to hav been given by Moses of old, and I hav been offering a premium to any man or preacher that will find a prohibitory law against spiritual sins in the Bible, and seeing that they hav failed to find it in the Bible, I think we had better hav one. Here it is:

"Thou shalt not sin against the spirit of the living God. Thou shalt not sin against the spirit of the living Christ. Thou shalt not sin against the spirits of the living apostles. Thou shalt not sin against the spirits of the departed. Thou shalt not sin against the spirit of thyself. Thou shalt not sin against the spirits of thy fellows. Neither shalt thou sin against the spirits of any kind that are in the universe above or on the earth below."

Now, Mr. Editor, a place for everything, and everything in its place. He that disobeys the prohibitory law against moral sins must hav his punishment in this moral or material world, where it belongs. He that disobeys the prohibitory law against spiritual sins must hav his punishment in the spirit world, where it belongs, providing we can establish the prohibitory law against spiritual sins. But if it can't be established, then where is that great scheme gotten up by the so-called divines as salvation for the people through the atonement of Christ? You're gone, for it was on spiritual sins that the atonement scheme was based.

Now, Mr. Editor, I will leave it to the readers of your paper to say whether there is a prohibitory law against spiritual sins to be found between the lids of the Bible.

R. H. TOPPING.

NORTHFIELD, MINN., Feb. 7, 284.

MR. EDITOR: Please excuse my tardiness. I believe this is the first time I hav been late since I entered your school. I shall make an effort to be prompt in the future, which will make excuses unnecessary.

Mr. Editor, the brief reports through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER of the proceedings and lectures at the Liberal Club, and elsewhere, are very interesting and instructiv; also some of the criticisms made at the club are very amusing. I would like to see a more complete report of these lectures and meetings published in your columns, and less of the "isms" that hav been discussed for some time past. The struggle and contest that hav been going on between the two schools may hav been enthusiastic to some, and amusing to others, while many regretted most sincerely that such a spirit of antagonism should exist between humanitarians.

It seems to me that there are other subjects that need to be discussed of far more importance to the present welfare of humanity than either Materialism or Spiritualism. As a whole, of what benefit has this strife been to either side? Was any knowledge gained, or any truths established? Are we not as deeply in the fog, and as remote from knowing the truth concerning existence or annihilation after "death," as we were before these discussions commenced?

If nothing gained, is there any loss? The columns of your paper might hav conveyed, to its hundreds of isolated readers all over the country, burning truths, the productions of the mind and brain of our most eminent thinkers. How many of us there are that hav no other facilities for knowing anything about grand orations and eloquent lectures but through books and papers! And while the latter are the most extensiv circulating medium, are we not doing injustice to many of the patrons of THE TRUTH SEEKER in using its columns to discuss subjects that we can neither prove nor substantiate satisfactorily to the world? Can discussions change a fixed law in nature?

Yet I hav no fault to find with these discussions nor the isms, no more than it seems to me to be unprofitable to discuss either Spiritualism or Materialism. I am a Spiritualist, yet I hav had no proof nor evidence, but I believe (at least I want to believe) there is a conscious state beyond what is termed "death." I can't come to the conclusion (though it may be true) that "death ends all," nor admit that oblivion is better than remembrance, nor annihilation better than existence. Neither can I see anything "terrible" in a continued life, if it were possible, even in this "wicked" world of "sin and sorrow," especially if we never grew old, for they say we don't in the "next world." For my part I like this world well enough, and would, if I could, liv "forever" on this beautiful globe, where there is more good than evil, more love than hate, and more sunshine than clouds.

Right here I would like to call the attention of the readers of your paper to the case of Mr. Heywood. Friends, he is not fighting the battles of liberty to gain freedom for himself and the Heywoods alone, but for us, and our children too, that we may all enjoy the full freedom of our inherent rights, rights that are being daily denied us by a bigoted majority. And for no other reason than we insist in exploring fields of advancement, and advocate truths and ideas that are in advance of the times. These narrow-contracted minds would usurp every right that a Liberal enjoys, if it were in their power; shut our mouths and pens too, if it were possible. But, friends, make good use of both. And more! furnish Mr. Heywood with the ammunition of war; be it ever so small an amount it will be appreciated and thankfully accepted by our persecuted and prosecuted brother.

Not long since I received a letter from Mr. Heywood, and I fear that he is, pecunarily, very short, and that he and family most suffer before the winter is over unless we unite and come to the rescue.

Friends, let us try and cheer Mr. and Mrs. Heywood in this their hour of need, with money, sympathy, and friendship.

THE TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL received. I hav read it all through, and must admit that it far exceeded my expectation, both in quality and quantity. The choice selection of information it contains is of far more value than four times the price of the almanac. I hope every one of your readers will send for a copy. The history of the National Liberal League, from its foundation up to the present time, is worth twice the money, to say nothing of the mirthful story, "Big Jack Small," and a thousand and one other good things it contains. And, Mr. Editor, if the next ANNUAL will be one-half so good, or contain one-half the information, be sure and reserve a copy for me, as I should feel that I would be losing too much valuable information if I could not get one.

Let me also call the attention of the readers of your paper to the lectures of Juliet H. Severance, M.D., now in pamphlet form. The fame and ability of this lady, as a public speaker, need no comments from any source. She is a monument of knowledge, and fearlessly promulgates the most radical reforms and practical questions of the day. All who hav not had the opportunity to hear Mrs. Severance should at once send sixty cents to 219 Grand avenue, Milwaukee, Wis., for five champion lectures; and fifteen cents for her able discussion of the social question with D. Jones, editor of the Olive Branch. We need not mention the total failure of the gentleman to hold the "fort" against the true and logical weapons of Dr. Severance.

MRS. S. J. LENONT.

PAWTUCKET, R. I., Feb. 11, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: My attention has been drawn to a correspondent of yours, Seward Mitchell by name, of Newport, Maine. He begins his letter by the statement that his life is spent in doing good. Mark that. He is pained to know that your noble paper does not belie itself in not condemning what he calls the foul murder of Patrick O'Donnell. He classes the English government as the most infamous the sun ever shone upon, and calls them a conclave of assassins. Yet this pure man justifies the assassination of Cary, and calls it a righteous act, and is sorry that a bullet or dynamite has not reached the miserable soul of Gladstone, and a score of lords and dukes, and especially that of Judge Denham.

Mr. Seward Mitchell, how well the word assassin sounds, coming from your lips, condemning and justifying murder in the same breath.

Let us take the case of Mr. Gladstone. All his long and noble life has been spent in lifting up humanity to a higher plane. Hundreds of orphan children will miss, and a whole nation mourn, the grand old man when his life goes out. He has been the best friend Ireland ever had as a British statesman, and a humanitarian in the strictest sense of the word. Yet you, Mr. Mitchell, would end a long and useful life by the bullet of the assassin.

Now let us take the case of the lords and dukes. You want a score or more of them shot. You are not particular as to numbers. Well, because a man is a lord or a duke, is he necessarily a scoundrel? I think not. During the twelve years I was in the British army and navy, I found them the kindest and best officers, far preferable to those that arose from the ranks or came in through the "horse pipes," as Jack says. They, the aristocracy so called, are taught from infancy to be kind and gentle to all, especially to those beneath them. There are exceptions, of course, but only exceptions. Now for Judge Denham. Could he hav acted otherwise than he did under the law? A jury found O'Donnell guilty of deliberate murder. And the prisoner confessed the crime, showing that he deserved the death. But oh! horror of horrors!—the detestable hangman! I should like to see Mr. Mitchell's countenance when speaking of that personage. I remember I and a lot of Mr. Mitchell's countrymen spent an evening in a public house in Melbourne, Australia, in 1847. In a seat at a table opposit us sat an individual smoking. As he was alone we invited him to join our party, which he did, and after a few glasses he turned out to be one of the best fellows you ever saw—full of song, told several capital good stories, and one of the best dancers, being able to perform the sailor's hornpipe to perfection. Towards shutting up time we got pretty maudlin, and some of our company hugged and (I think) kissed the stranger. Well, he finally left for home, after expressing the high regard he felt toward us. Finally the landlord came in and informed us we had been entertaining the right honorable the city hangman of Melbourne. Never shall I forget the look of horror in the countenances of my comrades; they were sober in a moment, and their faces were actually green with horror. Well, the poor devil was safe from their vengeance, and it was well for him he was.

Now, just let us compare the hangman with the murderer. The hangman is simply the executioner of the law, after the culprit has been found guilty by a jury of his countrymen. But the assassin, what is he? In the first place, he is a coward; next he is policeman; next he constitutes himself a magistrate, and issues the committal; he is jury, judge, audience, executioner; he is chaplain, attending to the funeral service, undertaker, and often sexton. He is a whole court and everything belonging to one. He causes children to become fatherless and motherless, and fathers and mothers to become childless, wives to become widows, and husbands to become widowers. He robs the home and fireside of all happiness, and brands himself a demon. Yet you will find society in the world that will take this loathesome thing by the hand and introduce him to wives and daughters; aye, and eulogize him for his crimes. Yes, men will do this that would turn with horror from the hangman, who has committed no crime.

When the Phenix Park murders took place and the news reached this country, the Land League here pretended to be horror-stricken, and, if I am not mistaken, offered a reward for the apprehension of the murderers. Well, all the ingenuity of the government was baffled for a long time, when one of the murderers came forward and gave state evidence, and the wretches were convicted and executed. Then the league altered its tune, and denounced the government as murderers. Now, the evidence such as Carey gave is counted the best of evidence, because he testified against himself, and such evidence is accepted in all parts of the world.

And now, Mr. Mitchell, where is your evidence that the English government is a conclave of assassins? Are you aware that the English is a representativ government, and that this government and its laws are but copies of theirs? Can you in this whole world find a more humane and fraternal government than the English? Can you find a nation that has done as much for humanity, as much for civilization, as the nation you denounce? Look at this United States as a nation, and tell me if she would hav been what she is to-day had it not been for the help of England. In this very town in which I write this letter the first cotton was spun, and the machinery made, by an Englishman. Who furnished you with some of her best mechanical labor, and with the money to build your railroads and many of your public buildings? Who is your best customer for your produce and trade? Think you if England went down to-morrow, that it would not be a great calamity to this country? I say yes; almost as much as it would be to her.

Let me show you some of the beneficial acts she has performed. She freed her slaves at a cost of £20,000,000; that, you must remember, was only the first cost. Ever since, she has been hundreds of thousands of pounds out of pocket by the falling off of the products of her colonies, caused by this one act of humanity. Next she opened up commerce with all the nations of the world. You hav the privilege to trade in every port where she has a footing. Your ships hav the privilege of taking cargoes from one English port to another; and that's a privilege you do not grant to English vessels. Show me the place in all the world, that she has possession of, where the people are not better off. India is ten times better off than under her own princes. Yes, the year before they issued the mandate to stop the suttee, over a thousand women were burnt at the stake under that horrible superstition. They hav opened the country by railroads and canals.

England has done the same for Canada. You say she has done all this for her own interest. Well, whose interest do you work for? Has not her interest been the interest of every other nation, civilized and savage? Has she not kept ships of war on the African coast this last half century, to keep down the slave trade? Has she not sacrificed blood and treasure to do so? Has that been act of humanity, or has been for self-interest?

"Ah! but look at Ireland," you say. Well, I discussed that subject two years ago in the public press, and it caused a great deal of ill-feeling, and that is something I wish to avoid if possible. But you must remember it was not all lovely in the Green Isle when two different popes requested the English to go over and stop the internal wars and bloodshed. But you must remember that you are not to punish the present generation for the fault of their forefathers on either side.

I do not think there is a nation on earth so much maligned and misrepresented as England is to-day; and I am sorry to say it is fostered by a large portion of the press. I don't envy the Englishman that loves his country his situation here, and I am quite sure I do not envy the man that does not love his nativ land, let him be where he will. "With all her faults, I love her still," as one of her great poets said. And, with all the hatred and malice, and all the uncharitableness heaped upon her, I trust she will overcome all her enemies.

She has produced some of the brightest names the world has ever heard of, in every class. She has brave soldiers, and equally brave and hardy sailors, and an indomitably spirited and loyal people, with an innate love of fair play; and as long as she does justice and loves mercy, she need not fear the ravings of a few lunatics that cannot govern themselvs and will not be governed.

Yours, ROBERT NELSON.

Peek-a-Boo.

The cunningest thing that a baby can do
Is to play for the very first time—Peek-a-boo!

It will hide its little pink face in its hands,
Then crow and show that it understands

What nurse and mamma—and papa, too—
Mean, when they hide and cry, "Peek-a-boo!"

Oh, what a wonderful thing it is,
When they find that the baby can play like this!

And they every one listen and think it true
That the baby's gurgle means "Peek-a-boo."

I wonder if anyone ever knew
A baby who never played Peek-a-boo.

I truly think, and believe it is so,
That the very first baby played Peek-a-boo,

And the whole world full of the children of men
Hav all of them played that game since then.

And while the sun shines and the skies are blue,
Babies will always play Peek-a-boo. —Selected.

What the Fern Said.

"What an awful storm! Don't it rain, though? It just rushes right along, doesn't it? Yah—ah-ah-aw! What shall we do with ourselvs, anyway, this stormy Sunday? I've read till my eyes ache, and puzzled over the puzzles and charades and cross-words in this paper, until my head is whirling like a top, and I feel like saying cross words, myself. I say! Eliza Jane, wake up and say something."

"What d'ye want, Melissy?" said Eliza Jane, looking up from her book.

"Can't we do something to pass the time? the day seems more than fourteen hundred hours long!"

"O Eliza! what a whopper! I guess you'd be pretty tired if it was only one-fourteenth as long," said Herbert, yawning, and reaching out to tickle his sister, little Daisy Dumpling, as she was called.

"Let's play meeting, for a change," said Melissa. "It will be real fun."

"How do you play it?" inquired Eliza Jane.

"Why, hav a regular meeting—preaching, singing, and like that, you know."

"And praying?" queried Herbert.

"We can omit that if you wish," she answered.

"But the worst of it is, who will be the preacher? Now, if Job were only here—you know he talks with trilobites and rocks, and he would be a splendid preacher."

"There's Aunt Delight up-stairs. If she only would come and preach us a little sermon—but I think she is lying down, and I will not disturb her," said Eliza.

"Auntie 'Light isn't lying down at all; she is darning her stockings!" prattled Daisy Dumpling.

"Well, Daisy, please go and ask her if she will be kind enough to come below and preach to us. Come, trot along; there's a dear."

Daisy did not wait to be told a second time, and, after a few minutes, reappeared leading Aunt Delight by the hand.

"O Aunt Delight, we're ever so glad you came! We want to hav a little meeting at home, here. We can't go out anywhere, it storms so; and we want you to be the minister. Women can preach as well as men—and lecture, too; can't they?"

"Caudle lectures!" whispered the big brother, Cecil, laughing, while he pinched Daisy's chin.

"Where shall I take my text?" inquired Aunt Delight.

"Anywhere you please—but let us sing first. Daisy shall sing a solo. Go ahead, Dumpling! Don't stand there looking at your shoes all out at the toes, so bashfully. Sing, you little rascal!" And Eliza Jane pulled Daisy's dress playfully.

After some coaxing, Daisy commenced—

"There was a rat who went to mill,
And when he'd ate of corn his fill—"

"Well, what did he do then?—go on," said Herbert.

"He—he—he— just rolled over and went to sleep!" And the little girl ducked her head behind the lounge.

Daisy had forgotten the other part, and finished with a little original matter, at which they all laughed.

"Now, you must keep very still," said Aunt Delight, as she took from her pocket a piece of slate rock, beautifully impressed with fern-leaves. "There is a story—a true story—printed on this rock; and now I will personate the fern, and tell it to you, just as it is written."

"Oh, do!" exclaimed the whole congregation.

And then Aunt Delight—or, the fern—began: "Good afternoon, ladies and gentlemen. I hav come a long distance to meet you, and I hope I see you well. I was born in what is called the Carboniferous age, which means the age of coal. I cannot tell my exact age—not because I am a lady and ladies are not expected to tell their ages, but because I really cannot remember; but I am, probably, without any exaggeration, not far from a hundred thousand years old. At the beginning of the period in which I was born, it is said that the Atlantic ocean passed through what is now southern New York, and west through Ohio, and across what is now known as the Mississippi valley, while the Gulf of Mexico went north as far as the middle of Iowa."

"Where were the great lakes?" inquired Herbert.

"There was but one great lake then, on this continent, Lake Superior. Slowly the waters were drained off, and left muddy, soft, warm earth, which, the dense, moist air pressing upon it, soon began to be like a hot-house."

"Where were all the folks?" asked Melissa.

"There were no human beings then, no air-breathing animals whatsoever—there never had been any at that time, for they could not breathe the carbonic acid gas that was all about. But we ferns could liv, and we did liv, and grew to be as big as giants. We were not like the little waving, feathery things you call ferns to-day, but we were taller than oak-trees, and were full of rich, dark green-foliage. Some of us had drooping sprays of flowers, but the most of us were clothed in leaves only, and resembled umbrellas, spread and covered with feathers and fringes. There were great trees of other kinds, and the trunks were not rough and scraggy as at the present time, but smooth and handsome as carved marble. You hav, doubtless, been in a wet swamp, and jumped from hillock to hillock, noting, at the same time, the spongy, yielding ground that seemed to settle beneath your feet. This typifies the state of the earth at that period, only then it was on a grander, greater scale. There were club-mosses, as you call them now, more than sixty feet high!"

"Oh! O-h-h!" they all exclaimed in a breath.

"Yes; and toad-stools as high as this house! And they were under my feet, for the tree upon which I grew was a foot and a half in diameter, or through its trunk. There were no birds then, and only a few insects humming about, and a very, very few flowers of dull colors. We grew all tangled up together, in hot, sultry silence. Finally, we dropped, and from our bodies sprang more vegetation. This process went on and on, for thousands and thousands of years, and all the time we were steadily at work, bottling up heat and light for future generations, for, as we dropped on the soft, peaty earth, we gradually hardened by the aid of time and gaseous changes, into the coal that makes your bright, warm fire to-day. Growth and decay, birth and death, filled the centuries. The waters would sweep over the great forests and sink them, then float away and new forests would spring up, and thus the leaves, branches, lichen, mosses, trees came to be coal, and the mud, sand, and pebbles, washed in by the waters, were changed into sand-stone, shales, or clay, and as we leaves were pressed into the sand mud, we remained there when these substances became shales, etc. Thus, in a coal mine, may be seen the most beautiful, artistic, and wonderful traceries of foliage and plants, flung in wild yet graceful luxuriance all around. You would fancy yourselvs in fairy land, or in some enchanted grotto, and would almost reach out to pluck the delicate leaves, mosses, and branches that elfin fingers had seemingly traced upon the walls. It would take twelve hundred years of the richest vegetation of this epoch of time in which you liv to make vegetable matter like that found in a single coal-seam six inches thick, so you can judge of the time it required to paint these pictures on the walls of your coal mines. I am only the impression of a little fern-leaf, but I hav tried to tell you, as simply as I could, a little bit of the history of world building. Step by step, as blocks, one upon another, so age upon age has come and gone. As Prof. Denton beautifully said—'As the stars sink, one by one, in the west, and new stars rise in the east, to be succeeded by the dawn, and then the day, so through the night of the past sank the old life-forms to be succeeded by the new, approaching nearer to the dawn of the day, in whose morning we liv.' Amen."

Cecil had drawn nearer the group, and the father and mother had come in to the meeting. The parrot also had been, apparently, an interested listener, and screamed out, "Amen! Molly put the kettle on! Amen!"

They gave Aunt Delight a vote of thanks, and declared it the best meeting they had ever attended.

Daisy Dumpling, when invited to sing again, said, "No! I hungry! I want some bread and butter!"

Eliza Jane went to wait on Daisy, and thus the meeting broke up, while the parrot screamed again, "Amen! Amen!"

[Just as we had finished the above, we received an interesting communication from a friend residing in a coal mining district, and bearing upon the same subject. It will appear in the Corner next week. We take this opportunity to thank our friends who hav kindly assisted in this, as well as our puzzle department; and, also, we would express our sincere appreciation of the hearty welcome with which the Children's Corner has been met. We are receiving scores of letters every week, testifying to the importance and usefulness of our work, and, while seeking a continuance of favors for our Corner, we shall endeavor, as heretofore, to make it as bright, attractiv, and interesting as possible—ED. WORD PUZZLE.

My whole consists of seven letters.
My 4, 2, 3, 1 is what some people sleep on.
My 5, 6, 7 is a domestic fowl.
My whole is where your food is cooked.

WORD PUZZLE.

My whole consists of seven letters.
My 1, 2, 3, 4 is a mineral.
My 5, 6, 7 is a fluid.
My whole is used to light.

HERBERT O. POWLER.

A RIDDLE.

Sometimes I hav four little wheels,
Sometimes a little buggy stand;
No horse or beast my burden feels—
Drawn only by the human hand.

I hav four legs, but, strange to tell,
Only a single foot is mine;
But for my head 'twould do as well,
If you would only thus incline.

A PROGRESSIV SQUARE

Demands our care.
The word to write first
Is a word can be reversed.
Forward it must show
The ocean's ebb and flow;
Backward, nothing less
Than to oversee the press;
The second names a "thought"
That to the mind is brought;
"Beloved" means the word
Which we take for the third;
And last the "spikes of corn"
Must our little square adorn.

PALINDROMIC CHARADE.

Observe two coaches on the track,
And as they stand thus back to back,
A wond'rous change comes o'er the scene—
The cars become a "car marine;"
No car at all, but a ship discern,
With a pork's tail often at its stern;
But not for a whistle, I'll be bound,
For it never here givs forth a sound.

NUMERICAL PUZZLE.

We all know that the chapters in the Bible are all numbered with letters instead of figures —IV. for four, IX. for nine, etc.

Now, place IX. and add to it and make it read less than nine. H. VAN PELT.

Correspondence.

THOMASTON, CONN., Feb. 23, 1884.

DEAR MISS WIXON: My papa takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and likes it very much; and I like it, too, since the Children's Corner is in it. I am thirteen years old. I go to school, and study reading, writing, spelling, arithmetic, and history. I hav studied philosophy and geography, but am through with them now. I hav a Steele's "Fourteen Weeks in Astronomy," and the same in geology, and am going to hav a Steele's zoology, and a Barnes's "History of France." The answer to Fannie's puzzle is "Brainerd," and to Ida's is "Corning." Although I hav never seen you, still I am your true friend, GEO. E. BALDWIN.

BALTIMORE, Feb. 2, 1884.

LOVELY MISS WIXON: I want to write you a letter, but I 'fraid you cannot read such poor writing. All I am is seven years old, and my name is Susie, same as yours; but my other name is different. I hav never been to school, but my mamma teaches me at home. I read your stories, and I am going to write stories when I grow big. I hav a cat. His name is Roger Williams, and he is all over black. I hav six dolls, and one has lost an eye. It had a cat'rack on it. I love her all the same. I love you, too, more than tongue can tell.

Poetry.

My Horse Sultan.

He was the parting gift of one I loved;
One-half the blood within his veins that moved
Was warm and glowing where Arabia's sun
Had shone upon his ancestors; and one,
The stronger half and calmer, came to him
Through Norman mothers, with their strength of limb,
Their width of chest, and loving, lustrous eyes,
Wide, soft, and tender, like those Norman skies.

I never gave to man a love so strong;
For woman not one friendship lived so long;
No joy so great has ever come to me
With music, eloquence, or poetry,
As when in saddle, to his graceful tread,
I skimmed the plains, or through the valley sped.
He had a rare intelligence, and knew
Each word I spoke to him, and soon he grew
To greet my coming with a gladful neigh,
And part from me with saddened eyes. Each day
This strong affection dwelt within my heart,
Until the hand of Death forced us apart.

I watched the luster in his eyes fade out,
Sad hour! But he'd no fear of death, no doubt.
If he had no immortal soul, no part
To liv beyond the beating of his heart,
No spirit in the great forevermore
To know and love as it had loved before—
If he liv not, and souls are but for man,
There's mystery in the eternal plan.

For I am sure no human heart e'er beat
More loyal to his love. I've yet to meet
A human friend more stanch and true and brave,
Or one whose friendship could outliv the grave.
And still my Sultan had no soul, they say,
No death-bed penitence, no voice to pray—
In fact, no proper requisit of man,
With which Eternity's wide bridge to span.

A horse, however human, has no soul;
A man, howe'er depraved, still claims the whole.
Thy mem'ry, Sultan, still is dear to me—
I'll mix it not with dark theology.

Mentor to Telemachus.

When some old hulk, safe anchored in the bay,
Watches the well-trimmed shallop speed away,
With snowy canvas spread to catch the breeze,
With sharpened, knife-like prow to cut the seas,
Mayhap the hulk, by sad experience taught,
May deem the shallop's voyage with dangers fraught.

When some old soldier stiffly walks the street.
And marching columns chance his eye to meet,
With silken banner, loud resounding drum,
Mayhap unbidden sighs or teardrops come,
For memory mingles with the shrilling fife
The moan that marked some comrade's loss of life.

When sweating miners rise from realms of night
To cooling upper air and health and light,
They pass descending cars whose living freight
Is happy, singing men, with hope elate;
Then well they know that soon the song will die
And smiles desert the laughing lip and eye.

So looks the aged on the youthful life
That, flushed and hopeful, seeks the maddening strife;
Age marks the graces that it once possessed,
And feels each fancy in the boyish breast;
Experience knows life's pitfalls and its snares;
Then, loving, fearing, follows with its prayers.

Thou, then, Telemachus, meet not with sneers
An old man's counsel, fervent prayers, or tears.
They oftenest go down to walk the strand,
Whose all is on the ocean, far from land;
The ship when outward bound attracts all eyes
More than a navy that at anchor lies.

Where shining headlands balk the seething waves,
Go look for wrecks and sailors' unmarked graves.
Oft where Calypso combs her golden hair
Some hero rests inglorious in her snare.
And Neptune, who upheaves the yeasty wave,
Will sing your requiem or become your slave.

Youth gazes onward toward the rising sun,
While age looks backward o'er the distance run;
Age harks to wisdom, hope allures the youth.
The gods still leave mankind to find the truth;
Happy the man who can his past survey
Nor wish one page of history torn away.

What Tonic Sol-fa Predicts — A Glimpse of the Future.

Music, in its primary development, passed through three stages: 1. The Rhythmic; 2. The Melodic; and 3. The Harmonic. Musical instruments were developed in a corresponding order: 1. The Drum type; 2. The Pipe type; 3. The Lyre type. Chorus music passed through the same three stages. In the first stage of development men had only the drum type of instrument, capable only of marking the rhythm, and they had only the monotonous chant in chorus, the rhythm being also marked by clapping of hands and stamping of feet. In the second stage the pipe type of instrument was added, on which melodies could be played, and melodies were sung in solo and chorus, the marking of the rhythm becoming less and less prominent. In the third stage the lyre type of instrument was invented, capable of rhythm, melody, and harmony, and chorus singing became harmonic. Drum and pipe instruments were later, however, developed to the harmonic degree. In the musical history of mankind the harmonic stage is never found to precede the melodic stage, nor the melodic stage to precede the rhythmic stage.

The study of the history of the arts and sciences, of government, of religion, of all institutions among men, in fact, of whatsoever thing, shows that they always pass through three stages corresponding to these three stages in the development of music; the second stage being as nearly as possible opposit in character to the first, while the third combines the characteristics of the first and second, with something new added as the result of the combination. Thus, in music, rhythm and melody are opposit in character, while harmony combines rhythm and melody, but is something more than melody added to rhythm. Harmony may be called the rhythm of melodies. This order of development goes on continually repeating itself on higher and higher planes

Music was first written for the voice, but the staff notation has been developed to its present complication by the great masters, who wrote mainly for the orchestra, the voice in this stage of development of music being secondary. In the third stage of development, upon which we are now entering. the voice will regain its supremacy, instruments will be secondary, and the notation will be primarily designed for writing music for the voice. The Tonic Sol-fa notation is a product of this third stage of development and is primarily designed for writing music for the voice.

In Mr. Sedley Taylor's lecture on the "Tonic Sol-fa Movement," printed in the June number of the Tonic Sol-fa Advocate, he shows that the development of musical notation has been parallel with, or similar to, the development of astronomy; that the idea of the "fixed do," with the other tones revolving around it and all related to it, corresponds to the idea of the fixed earth, with the sun, moon, and stars revolving around it; and that as the false idea of the fixed earth has been replaced by the true one of a movable and moving earth, so the method of the "fixed do" has been replaced by that of the "movable do." Mr. Taylor, in this article, also compares the relation existing among the tones of a melody to a system of government, and says:

"In all but the most rudimentary tunes a point is soon reached where one of the subject notes—or even an entire outsider, owning no allegiance to the ruling tonic—seizes the scepter and reduces his predecessor to a private station, or it may be even subjects him to total extinction. Instances of such supercession meet us at every turn in music under the name of 'modulations,' or changes of key. A question of cardinal importance now presents itself. Suppose that, with our simple form of notation, we hav written down the opening notes of a melody in relation to their tonic, and that we come upon a modulation and the accession of a new tonic. What is to be done here? Are we to go on writing down our notes in reference to the dethroned tonic—a relation which has practically ceased to exist—or shall we by a suitable expedient cause our notation to indicate henceforth the relation which these notes bear to the new-crowned tonic, and so deliberately recognize and giv effect to accomplished facts?"

Which is equivalent to saying that the "limited monarchy" dynastic form of government is more rudimentary than that in which the real ruler is recognized to be such, and that the present system of government in England is like the "fixed do" system in music. The inference is, that there is a higher form of government than the present English form of government.

This is the era of great discoveries, which are of far-reaching importance to humanity, and Tonic Sol-faists hav made and are making great practical use of one of the greatest discoveries that was ever made by man. I mean the discovery of what are called the "mental effects" of the tones of the scale. It had long been known that a difference in feeling or character was observable in music written in different keys, that certain keys wers best adapted to certain kinds of music, but it remained for the Tonic Sol-faists to discover that this character—this mental effect—belongs primarily to the tones of the scale, which constitute the key-notes of the different kinds of music. The tones of the scale are the elements of music. You know that you do not assign these mental effects to these tones, but that you discover them there, that they are inherent in the tones themselvs, that the tones are laden with this meaning by nature itself. Now, do you suppose that the tones of the scale are the only things in the universe that hav inherent meaning? These mental effects are easily felt in music, because music appeals primarily to the feelings; but do you suppose that this universe is so lacking in harmonic structure that the elements of only one department of it hav inherent meaning, that nature has made an exception in the case of music? Is it not more reasonable to suppose that there is in the elements of every department of a harmonious universe, something which corresponds to the mental effects of the elements of music? That if the elements of music hav inherent meaning, the elements of everything else must also hav inherent meaning, which you may not yet hav discovered?

It is a universal truth that the elements of music, not only, but of everything else whatsoever, hav inherent meaning. It is also true that the elements of many departments of the universe are known, and what is more important, that the inherent meanings of these elements hav been discovered and that they correspond to, repeat, echo, the inherent meanings of the tones of the scale.

These tones of the scale are primarily the tones or sounds of the human voice. But we also recognize other sounds—the speech sounds of the human voice, the elements of language—and these also hav inherent meaning, which has been definitly discovered, and this discovery founds the new universal language of the future, which is capable of exactly expressing in spoken words, having inherent meaning, the inherent meanings of the tones of the scale, not only, but of everything else whatsoever. It will rightly name everything and exactly express all thoughts and ideas, as no other language does or can. The elementary forms and elementary colors correspond to and echo the tones of the scale; so do the elements of all things whatsoever. But these four domains, music, speech, form, and color, furnish the four leading methods of expression of inherent meaning, and from this standpoint are of leading importance.

If we know the meaning of the colors and of the tones of the musical scale, we can represent music by color, not by arbitrary assignments, but by corresponding meaning. And this will be found to be of immense importance in teaching music.

A great poet says:

"To me the converging objects of the universe perpetually flow,
All are written to me, and I must find what the writing means."

It is because of this correspondence in meaning of the elements of all things that we are enabled to "find what the writing means." This correspondence of part to part, of the elements of one department to the elements of every other, of the mode and order of development in one to the mode and order of development in every other, this echo of likeness and meaning, throughout the universe, is called analogy. This analogy is, because it must be. The science of analogy is the science of sciences.

Through the knowledge of these inherent meanings and of this science of analogy, and by observing the course of development in those departments or domains of the universe which hav been largely developed, we can predict the course of development of the other domains. Music, as a domain of the universe, has been more largely developed by man than any other. Music is the key-note of the universe, regarding the universe as a grand harmonic composition. Music is the interpreter of the meaning of all things.

Tonic Sol-faists hav made another discovery of vast importance. They hav discovered the true order of the presentation of the subject of music to the mind of the learner, the true method of teaching music, and, by analogy, the true method of teaching every subject whatsoever. To teach the recognition of the tones of the scale by their inherent character is a great step, but the other is still more important. I mean the order in which the tones of the scale are taught; do, so, mi, re, ti, fa, la—1, 5, 3, 2, 7, 4, 6—and, by analogy with the meaning of the tones, all that that implies. Though progress is being constantly made, the educational methods in use in our schools are still comparativly crude and unscientific. You all know that the learning of Tonic Sol-fa develops an enthusiasm in the pupils, and that there is a rapidity of acquirement of the subject, such as does not take place in the learning of anything else whatsoever that is taught in our schools. Why is this? It is because the method of teaching Tonic Sol-fa is the right method, and the ordinary educational methods are wrong. If the methods used by the Tonic Sol-faists in teaching music were applied to the teaching of all else taught in our schools, everything taught would be interesting to learn and easy of acquirement, and an enthusiasm would be developed corresponding to that developed by Tonic Sol-fa. If this method has changed music from the dullest and dreariest subject to the most interesting one taught in our schools, what will its effect not be when applied to those subjects generally considered more interesting than music? When Tonic Sol-fa is generally taught in schools, teachers will begin to inquire why it develops such enthusiasm, and why music taught by its methods is so easily and thoroughly learned; and the time is coming when that method, as now used, and to be still further developed and and applied, will be the educational method. Thus you see that the introduction and spread of Tonic Sol-fa is the most important educational movement of the age—the introduction of the true educational method of the future.

The secret of success of Tonic Sol-fa is that it is in harmony with the universal laws of progress and development, and, being so, it has had a steady growth in the right direction. Its history shows that it has taken no step backward, but has slowly and surely grown to its present degree of perfection; and it is capable of still further development in the same line. It is not a mere temporary expedient that at some time in the future is to be set aside for something different, but whatever changes it may pass through they will be in harmony with the principles that underlie it, and the grand tree of the future will be one with the sapling of to-day. Being true in principle and devolopment, it is, in the nature of things, permanent, and must become universal. Not only will all who learn to sing be taught by its methods, but all will learn to sing and all will be taught by its methods.

The Tonic Sol-fa notation is primarily designed for writing music for the voice. Some object to it on that account, and assert that voices trained to sing in the true musical scale, instead of the tempered scale used by most instruments, sing out of harmony with instruments. Well, so much the worse for the instruments. That shows they are imperfect as compared with the voice. The human voice is the model instrument, combining drum, pipe, and lyre, and the problem is not how to lower the voice to the imperfect standard of our present musical instruments, but how to raise instruments to the more perfect standard of the human voice; and instruments which can only use the imperfect tempered scale will giv place in the future to those that use the true scale. The music of the future, written primarily for the voice, will surpass the music of the past, as does the voice, in solo and chorus, surpass all musical instruments.

Dr. Joseph Rodes Buchanan, the greatest psychologist of the day, says that a teacher with a pleasant voice, expressing high moral quality, will cultivate the moral character of her pupils, by the mere tones of her voice, without saying a word about morals, more than would a teacher with an unpleasant voice who should teach them all the moral maxims in the world. Mental culture comes chiefly through the eye; moral culture through the ear and the voice. The culture of the voice, and of the ear, then, is of primary importance. The best means of culture is singing, and Tonic Sol-fa is the way to learn singing. In this connection I desire to call your attention to Dr. Buchanan's book on "Moral Education." Every one of you should read it.

The science of analogy shows that the principles and laws of music are the principles and laws of the universe; that the inherent meanings of the elements of music are the inherent meanings of the elements of all things whatsoever; that the laws of musical harmony are the laws of harmony everywhere; and that the laws of development in music are the laws of development everywhere. The great poets hav felt the truth of this. Emerson, in many respects the greatest poet that ever lived, often expresses it in his poems, as in the following:

"For the world was built in order,
And the atoms march in tune;
Rhyme the pipe, and Time the warder,
Cannot forget the sun, the moon.
Orb and atom forth they prance,
When they hear from the far the rune
None so backward in the troop,
When the music and the dance
Reach his place and circumstance,
But knows the sun creating sound."

In "Woodnotes" he makes the pine-tree say:

"Hearken! Hearken!
If thou wouldst know the mystic song
Chanted when the sphere was young.
Aloft, abroad, the pæan swells;
O wise man! hear'st thou half it tells?
O wise man! hear'st thou the least part?
'Tis the chronicle of art.
To the open ear it sings
Sweet the genesis of things,
Of tendency through endless ages,
Of star-dust, and star-pilgrimages,
Of rounded worlds, of space and time,
Of the old flood's subsiding sl me,
Of chemic matter, force, and form.
Of poles and powers, cold, wet, and warm;
The rushing metamorphosis,
Dissolving all that fixture is,
Melts things that be to things that seem,
And solid nature to a dream.
Oh, listen to the undersong—
The ever old, the ever young;
And, far within those cadent pauses,
The chorus of the ancient Causes!
Delights the dreadful Destiny
To fling his voice into the tree,
And shock thy weak ear with a note
Breathed from the everlasting throat.
In music he repeats the pang
Whence the fair flock of nature sprang.
O mortal! thy ears are stones;
These echoes are laden with tones
Which only the pure can hear;
Thou canst not catch what they recite
Of Fate and Will, of Want and Right,
Of man to come, of human life,
Of Death and Fortune, Growth and Strife.

. . . . . .

Come learn with me the fatal song
Which knits the world in music strong.
Come lift thine eyes to lofty rhymes,
Of things with things, of times with times,
Primal chimes of sun and shade,
Of sound and echo, man and maid,
The land reflected in the flood,
Body with shadow still pursued.
For nature beats in perfect tune,
And rounds with rhyme her every rune,
Whether she work in land or sea,
Or hide underground her alchemy.
Thou canst not wave thy staff in air,
Or dip thy paddle in the lake,
But it carves the bow of beauty there,
And the ripples in rhymes the oar forsake.
The wood is wiser far than thou;
The wood and wave each other know.
Not unrelated, unaffied,
But to each thought and thing allied,
Is perfect nature's every part,
Rooted in the mighty heart.

The poet of the Bible, too, when he says, "The morning stars sang together."

In the future this truth will be generally known, and this knowledge will be the key to all other knowledge. There will be but one inclusiv science, of which all special sciences will be but twigs and branches, and that one science will be the science of the harmony of all things. The educational methods of the future will be the methods now used in teaching Tonic Sol-fa, perfected and adapted to teaching all other subjects; and a truly "royal road to knowledge" will be trodden by all. In the future, the culture of the singing and speaking voice, and so of the ear, will be the means of moral culture, and music will be considered the most important subject taught in the schools, the basis of all true education. Then the knowledge of music and the art of singing will be universal and will be the great means of harmony in society. Instead of the contests and horrors of war, there will be contests of cultivated musical voices, in peace and harmony, and the voice of the people will become more nearly than it now is the voice of God. In the future all arts, all sciences, all methods of education, physical, mental, moral, ethical, and spiritual, the organization of society, all the life of humanity, will be in harmony with music.

I do not intend to discourage you by showing you how far you are away from that grand future, but to cheer you on by showing you the glories in store for humanity. The world is now in a transition state, from the old to the new, and Tonic Sol-fa is part of the bridge on which it will pass over. You and all teachers and advocates of Tonic Sol-fa are doing a grand and glorious work. The principles of Tonic Sol-fa are right, its methods are right, and it only needs that the logic of its principles and methods should be still further applied to it in order that it may become the completely harmonious structure it is capable of being, and then it will be the prime model and guide for all teaching. Be sure that the Tonic Sol-fa movement is the greatest educational movement of the age, and go on, feeling that you hold in your hand the master key of the universe, and that it is only necessary for you to learn how to use it.

There is but one law of harmony in the universe, the law of musical harmony, and Tonic Sol-fa is its prophet. DAVID S. WHITE.

Remarkable Cure of Paralysis in One Week.

CINCINNATI, Dec. 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: As I feel greatly indebted to you for the benefit I hav received from your treatment, and the use of your Magnetic appliances, I can say without hesitation to those afflicted as I hav been that the effect was simply marvelous. Two weeks ago I was stricken with paralysis in my right arm and could not use it at all, but after wearing a suit of your MAGNETIC CLOTHING for one week, can use it quite as well as ever. I hav also been troubled with Dyspepsia and Kidney Complaint for a number of years, from which I hav suffered intensely, and, although doctoring all the time, never found but temporary relief. Since putting on your appliances I hav experienced great benefit, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav in the past two weeks, will soon be well. I would, therefore, recommend to those suffering as I hav your Magnetic appliances as the only means of effecting a sure cure. Yours respectfully,

WM. H. CLEMMER,
No. 80 Eastern avenue.

Remember that the same appliances which will effect a cure in a case of Paralysis will at the same time eradicate CATARRH or DYSPEPSIA in the same patient. We do not, like the Old School Physician, change medicins every day until, after dosing the patient almost to death, he may possibly strike something (if he is very skilful) that brings relief for the time being.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been suffering for two years with an Ovarian Tumor, and who had been told that nothing but the knife would save her life, and the chances were as 9 to 1 against recovery. In four months' time she is perfectly well, and has not taken a dose of medicin since putting on the appliances. Consult us when your physician tells you he can do nothing for you; it will pay you.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., November 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY, Dear Sir: About two years ago my health began to fail me; I became nervous, lost all desire for food, and, in fact, began to fail rapidly, so that I became alarmed and consulted several physicians of St. Louis, at which place I was then stopping, all of whom declared that I had an Ovarian Tumor, and that the only thing that would save my life would be the knife. About six months ago I grew rapidly worse, and had about made up my mind to take the only course that seemed left to me, and submit to an operation, when my attention was called to the Eureka Magnetic Appliances. As a drowning man will catch at a straw, so did I catch at this faint hope of a cure. Four months ago I purchased a suit of your appliances. From the very first I felt invigorated, the tumor, which had extended entirely across my abdomen, began to decrease, my pains became less from day to day, until now I am as well as I ever was in my life. Since putting on the appliances I hav not taken a single dose of medicin. My bowels, which before were constipated, are now regular. I would therefore cheerfully recommend them to anyone suffering as I hav, believing that they will do all and more than you claim for them. I remain,

Gratefully yours, MRS. MARY J. STEWART.

Remember that these appliances are not worn next the skin, but over the under-garment, and, unlike all other appliances in the market, they impart no shocks and leaves no sores.

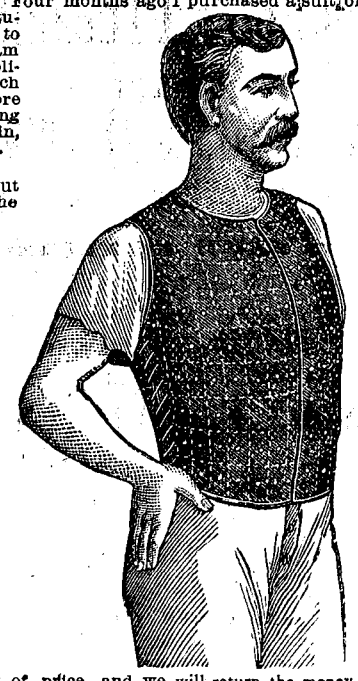
Neuralgia of the Heart of Six Years Standing Cured in Three Weeks.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., Dec. 11, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: After wearing one of your MAGNETIC VESTS for about three weeks, I was entirely cured of Neuralgia of the Heart and Side, which had been a source of misery to me for the last six years. I had tried numerous remedies before without benefit, but as soon as I put on the MAGNETIC VEST I got relief instantly. With unbounded gratitude, I remain

Yours respectfully,
H. A. BROWN.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been under drug treatment for eight years with nervous prostration and female weakness:



OSBORN, O., Dec. 15, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY: Your letter just received; also the Clothing on Tuesday last. Fitted perfectly. FELT BETTER FROM THE FIRST HOUR I HAD THEM ON. Am not joking, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav since Tuesday, will soon be well. Will report again soon. Respectfully yours, E. J. K.

This lady reports herself entirely cured in less than six weeks after putting on the garments, and, although in bed, unable to get out, when applied, she nevertheless was able to ride twenty miles in two days after the application. The lady's name can be had upon application at this office, by anyone desiring to communicate with her.

While our appliances are offered at less than one-third of what others are selling worthless appliances for, yet we will guarantee that the magnetic quality is a hundred fold superior to any other appliance ever offered the public, and will outlast the garments themselves. Every magnet is put through a particular process, and hav raised five times their own weight six months after being magnetized, while not a single appliance in the market will attract the smallest particle of iron, the majority of such worthless appliances having so-called magnets made of material no better than hoop-iron, and not capable of retaining magnetism for a moment. All of our garments are made from the very best material for the purpose, and will outlast any and all other garments now before the public. Every magnet is arranged in the garments upon scientific principles, and not haphazard as in all the others. We offer you therefore

Gems of Thought.

IT is a brave and good man who pursues the right course, and who performs his duty faithfully because of the superiority of good actions over evil actions, and he is cowardly and contemptible who only does the right that he may escape punishment. Do good because it is right, and shun evil because it is wrong.—D. M. Bennett.

COMPULSION is not, and never can be, conviction. They exclude each other. . . . What is one to believe of people? One hears so many contradictory stories about them. Exercise your digestiv functions; assimilate the nutrition; get rid of the deleterious. Believe all the good you can hear of your neighbor and forget all the bad. . . . To suppress the truth may now and then be our duty to others; not to utter a falsehood must always be our duty to ourselvs. . . . Our appetites were given to us to preserve and to propagate life. We abuse them for its destruction. . . . Be what you are. This is the first step toward becoming better than you are. . . . Would you touch a nettle without being stung by it? Take hold of it stoutly. Do the same by other annoyances, and few things will ever annoy you. . . . A man who strives earnestly and perseveringly to convince others, at least convinces us that he is convinced himself.—Guesses at Truth.

SCHILLER did not often speak of wholesome prejudices; he did not embrace the Catholic religion "because it was the grandest and most comfortable." Truth with him, or what seemed such, was an indispensable requisit; if he but suspected an opinion to be false, however dear it may hav been, he seems to hav examined it with rigid scrutiny, and if he found it guilty, to hav plucked it out and resolutely cast it forth. The sacrifice might cause him pain, permanent pain; real damage, he imagined, it could hardly cause him.—Carlyle.

EACH little sect or religion has, doubtless, some germ of the truth within it, which has rendered it subservient to the great purposes of fertilizing the world, but so long as the professors of either of them think they are favored children of the divine father, whom he regards with a complacency with which he does not view the rest of humanity, so long is the fulness of God's idea not attained by them.—Lessing's Education of the Human Race.

THERE is no doubt but a judgment may be formed of nature in general from looking at each nature in its most perfect specimens; and what is a more perfect specimen of a man than those are who look on themselvs as born for the assistance, the protection, and the preservation of others? Hercules has gone to heaven; he never would hav gone thither had he not, while among men, made that road for himself. These things are of old date and hav, besides, the sanction of universal religion—Cicero.

ALTHOUGH it would be a great luxury to me to obtain my opinions by contract, ready-made, from a professional man, and although I hav a constitutional kindly feeling to all sorts of good people which would make me happy to agree with all their beliefs, if that were possible, still I must hav an idea, now and then, as to the meaning of life; and though the only condition of peace in this world is to hav no ideas, or, at least, not express them, with reference to such subjects, I cannot afford to pay quite so much as that even for peace.—O. W. Holmes.

"WHY do drug your wine?" a merchant was asked. "Because nobody would drink it without." Is it not just so with truth? Bacon at least has declared that it is; and how many writers hav lived in the course of three thousand years, who hav not acted on this persuasion, more or less distinctly? Nay, how many men who hav not dealt in like manner even with their own hearts and minds?—Guesses at Truth.

INDISPUTABLY, the firm believers in the gospel [the Rig Veda, or the Koran] hav a great advantage over all others—for this simple reason, that if true, they will hav their reward hereafter; and if there be no hereafter they can be but with the Infidel in his eternal sleep. But a man's creed does not depend upon himself; who can say, I will believe this or that, and, least of all, that which he least can comprehend?—Byron.

A FOOL uttereth all his mind; but a wise man keepeth it in till afterward.—Proverbs, xxix, 11.

A LAWYER, too proud to allow his friends to suppose that he practices in divorce courts, advertises, "Misfits a specialty."

A HEALTH writer says, "Sleepless people should court the sun." Those who don't care much about sleep generally court the daughter.

"MY dear," said a wife to her rich but illiterate husband, "I want $500." "What fur?" he inquired. "Sealskin fur," she said, and she got it.

"BE you not unequally yoked," exclaimed a Philadelphia minister in a sermon on ill-considered marriages. This is good advice, but how are young people to know before marriage which is the best fighter?"

"NOW, darling, will you grant me one favor before I die?" "Yes, George, I will," she said, drooping her eyelashes and getting her lips in shape. "What is the favor I can grant you?" "Only a little song at the piano, love. I am afraid there is a dog outside waiting for me, and I want to scare him away."

"BASKET suppers" are a popular church revenue amusement in western Massachusetts villages just now. Each young lady prepares with her own hands a supper for two, and packs it in a basket, rolling a slip of paper bearing her name inside one of the napkins. Each gentleman buys a basket and shares the contents with the young lady whose name he finds within. Incidentally it may be noted that dyspepsia is rapidly becoming epidemic in western Massachusetts.

ELLA WHEELER IMITATED.

O love! My love! I could bust your wizen
In the howling craze of my mad desire,
I could tear you asunder from deck to mizzen,
And roast your soul in a raging fire.
I could yank your heart from your jumping bosom,
And drown out your life in a sea of bliss—
If I had a million lives I'd lose 'em
For a whooping whack at a fire-fringed kiss.
I could chew your ear till the flashing gristle
Collapsed like the crash of a wild cyclone.
I could shriek in glee like a railroad whistle,
And gnaw your chin to the gleaming bone!
I could swallow your breath as the toper swallows
The fiery flagon of rot-gut rye,
I could wallow in love as the hot hog wallows
In the pliant depths of the backyard sty.
I could snatch you bald in a holy minute,
And yell like a Yahoo to hear you squeal.
I could peel your hide from your head and pin it
With fiery spike to your bulging heel.
Oh, yes, I could hug you, and kiss you, and kill you,
And yet my mad passion I'd never quell,
You darling, delightful old liver pill, you,
I'd make you believe you landed in Tewksbury.

WHO is that little woman there,
With laughing eyes and dark brown hair,
And physiognomy so fair?
My wife.

Who's not as meek as she appears,
And doesn't believe one-half she hears,
And toward me entertains no fears?
My consort.

Who wakes me up on every morning,
About the time the day's a-dawning,
My protestations calmly scorning?
My spouse.

Who marks my clothes with India ink,
And darns my stockings quick as wink,
While I sit by and smoke and think?
My frau.

Who asks me every day for money,
With countenance demure and funny,
And calls me "pretty boy" and "honey?"
My little woman.

Who runs this house both night and day,
And over all exerts her sway;
Who's boss of this shanty, anyway?
My better half.

A CITIZEN who has an office on Monroe avenue, says the Detroit Free Press, has for the last three years been owing a grocery bill. The grocer's collector called on him over one hundred times to secure payment of the debt, but was always put off with some excuse or other. At one time it was death, another sickness, another time bad luck, and so it went on until it really seemed impossible for the debtor to invent any new pleas. The other day the grocer himself took the bill in his fist, and cornered the debtor in his office. "Yes, I know—very sorry—hand you the money a week from to-day," was the smiling excuse. "See here!" said the grocer, as he locked the door and pulled off his coat; "I've been figuring on this matter. This bill is for $15. I can giv you the worst licking a man ever received, and get off with a fine of $10. I'll then giv you a receipt for the other five and the account will be closed. Prepare to be pulverized!" "But suppose I lick you—then what?" queried the other. "Then there won't be any resort to the law, and you shall hav a receipt in full!" "That seems to be fair, and I'll do my best," said the debtor, and at it they went. The grocer expected to get away with him in about a minute, but he was a deceived man. It wasn't over three minutes before he was knocked over a chair and rendered hors de combat. "Is it a receipt in full?" asked the debtor as he sat astride the other and kept both hands fastened in his hair. "She is!" "And you'll pay me $2 in cash for the broken furniture?" "Yes." "Then you may get up, and I'll recommend you to a doctor who'll fix your broken collar-bone as good as new inside of a week." The grocer gave him a receipt for the account, and handed over $2 in cash, and later in the day, when telling the story in his store, he explained: "Gentlemen, I've sassed scores of citizens, abused dozens of hackmen, and been aching for three years past for a chance to pulverize some one. It's worth $17 to me to know that my grit giv out with the first round!"

A Southern Dakota editor advertises his Bible for sale. He has probably gone over to the other party.

During the hight of the flood, an Ohio woman prayed that the river might not go six feet higher, and it didn't.

In circles where he is best known, the last letter is dropped from the name of Rev. Snyder, the self-called newspaper interviewer.

Rev. Mr. Talmage says it has taken a million years to "evolute" him from an ape. There has been a very slight change for so long a time.

A minister out in Texas was arrested while riding a horse which he had stolen from a parishioner. He will hav a chance while in jail to evolve a discourse from the "Sermon on the Mount."

The recent rowdyism and paper-wad battles at Columbia College hav been well telegraphed over the country. It was Columbia College, wasn't it, which decided not to admit women students on the ground that it would lower the intellectual standard?

"How shall we treat the grandmother?" inquires our religious contemporary, the Independent. Don't treat the giddy thing at all if you can help it; but if she insists, it would be only a mark of respect due to age to let the old lady nominate her poison.

A lecture on "The Ten Commandments" was recently delivered in a western town, and the local paper spoke of it as a novel and brilliantly original code of morals, which will be likely to make a stir in the world when it becomes more widely known.

The Second Adventists hav set the 4th day of next November as the date for the end of the world. As this will be election day, it is hoped the final smash will hold off until in the evening, so we can at least make a rough guess at how the thing has gone.—Christian at Work.

A man who has just died in Bernardstown, Vt., provides in his will that his property shall be used "to oppose that horrid old monster of kingcraft called religion." One of his daughters stole money from him and ran away with a youth who boasted of his piety, and that was the cause of it.

The Philadelphia Record kindly gives this hint to a brother in distress: "If Rev. J. P. Newman has left in his cellar any of that good gin which he brought back some years ago from his inspection of consulates, he might distribute it with good results among the refractory members of his congregation."

This is from the Derry News: "Notice—Having a desire to use a few hundred dollars in the cause of Jesus of Nazareth, the Christ, I propose to exchange either city or country property for the same, at such figures as will enable the purchaser to realize 7 to 9 per cent on his investment. Address ———, Londonderry, N. H.

While Edward T. Hatch, who livs at Farmingdale, Me., was engaged in prayer one morning, the clothes of Mrs. Hatch, who was kneeling by the grate, took fire, and she was burnt to death. The paper which records the mournful event grimly heads the item, "Death came to her relief." If the prayer was like some which are inflicted on suffering humanity, there is reason in the remark.

A church committee at Genesee, Ill., hav been sitting in judgment on the actions of the Rev. Mr. Spurlock, and hav found him guilty of immorality. His victim or paramour, as the case may be, is the wife of a parishioner who moved in the "best society," whatever that may indicate, and has been unusually activ this winter in church matters. She is also a teacher in the Sunday-school. Mr. Spurlock claims that a conspiracy has been organized against him. The committee, however, are obdurate enough not to believe him.

"Do you think it wrong to patronize horse cars on Sunday, deacon?" asked Mrs. Goode. "Decidedly," replied the deacon, "decidedly wrong, Mrs. Goode; it's a desecration of the day, ma'am. I never take a horse car on Sunday, ma'am. I consider it wrong, decidedly wrong. I walk, ma'am, and I receive my reward in an approving conscience, not to speak of the fact that I hav saved five cents, ma'am."

The Catholic colonization in the United States is going forward with wonderful rapidity. An Italian colony "in the interior" is shortly to be organized, and committees are to be formed at Naples, Genoa, New York, Baltimore, and New Orleans, to assist poor emigrants. The archbishop of Naples has already established a committee. And yet Protestants, who claim to be patriots and upholders of the Constitution, see no danger in this, and waste their breath repelling the advance of Liberalism and of movements for the divorce of church and state.

A New York lady, under the date of Jan. 17th, writes from Tangiers, Africa: "This is the feast of Molech, when they present young children to the saints at the sanctuary of Tangiers. I hav watched the wild spectacle for five hours in fear of being shot, run down by the horses, or trampled under the feet of the mob and camels. Thirty-six tribes hav passed in procession, each with flags and each bringing a sheep or a bull to sacrifice. Men whirled their long guns in the air and caught them and fired without regard to life. The admiration I had previously felt for the Moors has merged into dread. They had a powder-play on horseback, shooting from galloping horses forced up a steep hill. Some Englishmen who were present were so much frightened that they took brandy."

The Independent is in slight doubt whether Salmi Morse's tragic death was a judgment of God or not. It says: "We should be arrogating omniscience were we to assert that God's purpose in allowing Salmi Morse to die a miserable suicide's death was to make him a warning against blasphemously travestying the crucifixion of our Lord. Yet we cannot but recall that he was the man who attempted to put a vulgar passion play on the boards of a New York theater." Perhaps also Mr. Morse sometimes went fishing on Sunday. Nothing but a violent death will satisfy the wrath of God on a man who goes fishing on Sunday. Murderers, however, often liv to a ripe old age unless abbreviated by the hangman's interference.

Orders hav been given to examin at St. Petersburg all passports of persons not well known living in thoroughfares through which the emperor is in the habit of passing, or is likely to pass, and to note those who occupy rooms with windows fronting the street. Police agents may be seen noting these particulars from the dvorniks, or house police. People well acquainted with the aspects of the streets of the capital hav remarked an unusual number of detectivs and spies meandering or skulking about since the return of the court. The imperial residence, the Annitchkin Palace, has a re-enforced guard at night. Besides the ordinary foot sentinels encircling it, and the guard of honor lodged in the entrance yard, may be seen a number of police officers at the gates and distributed round about, and also infantry detachments of three men pacing round the building on the foot path, and Cossack patrols in couples continually passing each other, making the same circuit.

The poet Whittier is not only troubled by autograph gatherers, but by preachers who want him to sign his name to poems which they themselvs hav written. And people who hav fallen from grace, it is said, are constantly seeking the poet's advice. The other day a forlorn-looking man went to the meter-loving Quaker and said: "Mr. Whittier, I believe I am going to hell. What do you think about it?" "Let me look at your tongue," said the poet. The man shoved out his tongue, and the poet, after turning it over and regarding it for a few moments, asked: "How long hast thee been impressed with the idea that thou art going to hell?" "Since day before yesterday, when I fell from grace." "How didst thee fall?" "You see, I was building an ash-hopper in the back-yard, mashed the nail off my finger, and swore until the streaks hung from the eaves of the house." "My friend," continued the poet, again taking hold of the fellow's tongue, "thee'cans't go to hell if thee wants to." Whether or not the man has gone, the associated press dispatches fail to say.

At a prayer-meeting in West Winsted, Conn., not long ago, one of the deacons delivered himself of a computation which is worth looking into. He said that the saving of one soul in Christ's day cost $24,000. When Christ cast out the legion of devils from the man who dwelt among the tombs they entered into a herd of two thousand hogs, and the hogs ran down into the sea and were choked. Assuming that each hog weighed 200 pounds, and that pork was $6 a hundred, the value of the hogs destroyed was $24,000. The deacon queried if the people before him would be willing to giv such a sum of money to save the soul of a member of the Episcopal church in the east village. Let us observe, says the Winsted Press, that if the hogs in question had belonged to Christ he would probably hav thought twice before he sent the devil into them, and saved his herd. We doubt not almost any member of the church would as readily sacrifice his neighbor's property to save a soul as A. Ward did his wife's relations to save his country.

The pope, in the matter of personal decoration, gets himself up regardless of expense. His gear is thus described by a visitor representing the Baltimore Sun: "The pope was seated. He wore a cashmere alb, made from the chosen lamb's wool on each St. Agnes's Day, fitting his body closely. Around his waist was a broad, richly-watered white silk sash, the falling ends terminating with gold bullion fringe. On his hands were white woolen knit mittens. From and around his neck hung a heavy gold chain, pendant to which was his only decoration—the cross, 'a bright, gold cross, that Jews might kiss and Infidels adore.' Thrown partly around him, and forming a strong Rubenistic background, was a rich scarlet glowing cloak of woolen fabric. This cloak was lined with purple, and its cape and edges trimmed with a tiny border of gold bullion lace. On his head was a little white skull-cap. His feet were incased in red slippers, with cross embroidered in gold thereon. These slippers are so made that they are really ankle-covering shoes, the upper parts being of white satin, lined with wool, and fitting closely. Thus a heavy expression is given to the feet."

Dr. A. E. Brehm, the German naturalist, lecturing in Chicago recently on the subject of "Monkeys" said that research into natural science had led him to place great reliance in the story of the Arabian sage who said that human beings were transformed into monkeys as a punishment for their sinfulness. He concluded from that that monkeys existed before the present human race. He held that the habits of the monkey deviated very little from the characteristics of man. For an illustration, he took his audience to the land of cynocephalus hamadryas, better known in English as the baboon. This class always traveled in herds and settled in one domain, under a competent leader, whose authority as a ruler was unlimited. In his judgment a monkey's appearance was repulsiv. The female, however, watched over its young with that tender regard indicativ of a mother's love. He had known female monkeys to die from grief at the loss of their young. He devoted an hour to a review of the different species of monkeys extant. His description was very interesting and edifying. The recital of his experience in trying, by way of experiment, to intoxicate a baboon, was irresistibly comical. The animal made a wry face at the first taste of liquor, but finally began to like it, and imbibed until it was in reality beastly drunk. Then it slept, and awoke with "a big head." The doctor thought that this experience would cure his monkeyship from any further desire to indulge. But not so. As soon as he sobered up he wanted more, just like a man.

About 2,500 mill operativs are out on strike at Fall River, Mass. The striking cigar-makers of this city continue to hold out. The Cigar Makers' Progressiv Union request those in sympathy with the strikers to refrain from purchasing the cigars made by Straiton & Storm.

The ladies of Ellenville, N. Y., who threatened to boycott the business men who did not vote the temperance ticket are jubilant, as a no-license excise commissioner has been elected. The fact that women generally are in favor of prohibition complicates the female suffrage question to a great degree.

A. S. Hatch, president of the Stock Exchange, appeared at Jerry McAuley's mission as a revival preacher last Sunday. This affords an opportunity to repeat Beecher's little pleasantry to the affect that there is a resemblance between the calling of ministers and that of stock gamblers—they both deal in "futures."

The National Homestead Association was formed in Pittsburgh, Pa., last Saturday night by a number of prominent labor leaders and professional men. The object and purposes are to prevent the centralization of ownership in land, to aid members to procure homes, and to secure to them an interest in the soil, to foster and cultivate a spirit of economy and saving among wealth producers, and to establish more harmonious relationship between capital and labor by a combination of interest.

CHAPTER XVIII.

A NIGHT'S JOURNEY.

Columbus determined to bother the bloodhounds as much as possible. While Harry hurried with the baby to the rendezvous, Columbus and Amy took the road to the north, and when they reached the stream he carried her down a hundred yards or so, and landed her on the northern bank; she then walked a short distance to another stream, and from thence was carried to where the others were waiting. It was nearly twelve o'clock when they began their perilous journey over the mountains. The road was steep, rough, and interminably winding. At the end of the first hour they had only advanced three miles, and then there came a tremendous thump, and one of the wheels was broken.

"Thunder!" said Cupples, "we're done for now. We shall have to camp out. I don't see how we're ever to get over these mountains."

"I don't," said the sergeant. "But we've got to and that's the end on't. Can't the wheel be mended?"

"No," said Cupples, "it's completely smashed. What a devil of a rut! It's like the bottomless pit."

"Tony Lumkins lives up here somewhere," said Harry. "Perhaps we can borrow a wheel of him."

"Or steal it," said the sergeant. "It'll take too much time to borrow it. I'll hurry along and see if I can find his place, and while I am about it, I guess I'll take two wheels, for the other one may break. The baby's a crying, Cupples; can't you take care of it? It'll keep you warm while we're waiting."

The sergeant hurried off; Cupples took the baby, and Harry and Amy talked.

"It'll be all right, Amy. Sometime I shall be able to earn my living, and then I'll run away. I'm about as much afraid of father as you are. He's terrible to me. I can't understand it. But the world is broad, and somewhere we can work together and be happy."

"I don't know that you ought to give up your home," said Amy. "How hard it must be! I'm afraid I can't make you happy. I can't repay you for all that you will lose; so many friends, riches, honor. What can I give you?"

"Give me?" said Harry. "Hope, life, something to work for, a home and independence. What am I now but a slave? I long to be a man; to be myself; to bear my own burden, and reap my own reward."

"O Harry! I hope you will be happy. I will do my best. But I seem so weak. Can I help make you what you ought to be in this great world that is so huge, so roaring, so full of evil; where so much strength, so much courage, is needed? Oh, I wish I were an angel of heaven that I might help, help, help."

"O Amy! there are angels to help. We shall find a paradise."

So these young hearts, communed together, not knowing of the sad and fearful discipline of life, and how far off their paradise was.

The sergeant soon returned with a couple of wheels. He put one on in place of that which was broken, and kept the other in reserve. Harry said he would make it all right with Tony, who probably wouldn't find out his loss for a month or two; having no horses, he needed no wheels. When he wanted tobacco he walked to town, and tobacco was about the only thing he did want. It was his meat, and his drink was a quart of whisky per day. Surely his wheels could not have been put to better use. We sometimes wonder why people live in such little uncomfortable cabins away up on the mountains, miles from anybody else. They probably live there for just such emergencies as this. That's the way of providence. If Tony Lumkins had not lived just where he did, what would have become of this fugitive band with the bloodhounds on their track in the early morning? He had been living for years on that mountain an apparently useless and ruinous life, that those wheels might be on hand at that particular moment. If his whole life had produced nothing but those instruments of locomotion out of his broken-down shed, when he was in his usual midnight stupor, he did not live in vain. He was a link in a chain that went shining on. Does one say that eternal wisdom might have furnished those wheels in some other way? We can only answer it did not. So far as mortal vision extends, we cannot affirm that Tony Lumkins lived for fifty years in this world for any other purpose than to have a couple of good wagon wheels on hand for Sergeant Jones to steal. That's predestination and saints' perseverance; and we defy theology to throw any more light upon the subject.

It was three o'clock when they reached the mountain-top. The way down the farther side was but little better than the road already passed over, and before long the second wheel had broken and been replaced. The banners of morning hailed them from the piney crests, and seemed to say, "Hasten, hasten; we bring joy and terror. We light your way; but our beams are a signal for the enemy."

"It won't be long," said Harry, in a low voice, to the sergeant, before the hounds will be upon our track. "We must get to the station at eight o'clock, and there's about seven miles yet to go."

"If the wagon don't break down, we are safe enough. But these roads are terrible," replied the sergeant.

Columbus had balked the hounds for about two hours, but at six oclock they were upon the track of the fugitives, and went bounding away. Talk of cheating a blood-hound. It can't be done. They seem to have a sixth sense, and can trace the slightest atom that the fugitives drop in the liquid air.

It was a race for life. Harry and the sergeant felt that they must put forth every effort.

The hounds felt it too. The "sweet thunder" of their baying crowded upon the morning wind. A "rare and regal prey" was before them. On they dashed.

"Three miles more," said Harry, "Good God! the wheels are breaking."

They seemed to slump all at once.

"Now, Harry, for a gallop," said the sergeant. "You take one horse and ride on with Amy. Can you go it horse-back, Cupples?"

"Never did such a thing in my life. But my feet are as sore as they can be, and my back might as well take its turn."

"Jump on this one, then, and take the baby, and go as fast as you can. Hold on tight. I'll go afoot."

It was a new sensation to Cupples to be mounted. But his blood was up and he was ready for anything.

He almost repented after riding a mile or so. The animal was not a first-class saddle-horse. His backbone was rather sharp, and had a most forcible way of hitting Cupples's back-bone at right-angles. It did seem sometimes as if it would split him in two. Cupples uttered a fervent prayer every time he came unwillingly down. There was no need of rocking the baby. It enjoyed a continual jerk.

"How much—further—have we got to go?" groaned Cupples volcanically.

"Only a mile," said Harry, "and we are in time for the train."

When they reached the lone station, no train was in sight. They hoisted the flag. A wide, desolate flat extended about them, with gloomy woods stretching far away. Not a dwelling was to be seen. The turnpike, like a huge snake, rolled by and off into the labyrinthine wilderness.

"Hold the baby, Harry," said Cupples. "It does seem as if my legs reached clear to my neck. I'm stiff as a board; and if it wasn't for the way I ache I should think I was a corpse."

"Have your pistols ready," exclaimed the sergeant, as he hastily approached; "I hear the baying of the hounds."

Listening intently, his quick ear had caught the terrible music faintly trembling on the almost motionless air.

CHAPTER XIX.

OFF.

Sergeant Jones put his ear to the rail and kept it there nearly a minute.

"The train's a-coming," said he. "But I don't know which is the farthest off, the train or the dogs, and I reckon the dogs are the liveliest of the two. It'll be a mighty close scratch any way."

"Nip and tuck," indeed. The train was not fast; the dogs were. They seemed to sniff the exciting contest; and their loud baying swept the wind with increasing vehemence, while the fugitives listened with terror. Only the baby smiled, as much as to say, "It's all right," happier in its ignorance than we with our troublesome knowledge which shakes us with fear when really there's no need of it.

The sergeant looked down the glistening track. There was a faint puff of smoke.

"Hurrah," said he, "I see it."

For a while the train seemed scarcely to move; while the dogs seemed right upon them—though they were still a mile away. But the train was moving, and the quick, sharp music of the rails smote the ear. Ah! what pleading hands were waiting for that iron monster. How every puff of smoke was eagerly scanned as it glistened in the air, and every quiver of the black, shining frame! It came thundering on with fiery eye and brazen wings, a very angel of God. With earthquaking benediction, it leaped by the platform where the little band were standing. It seemed as if it would never stop, and the last clash and clank of the wheels seemed to say, "Hurry up; we must be off again." Of course they hurried up, for they were more eager for flight than the iron-horse himself. The bell rang cheerily out, and its last vibrating note just dropped into the throat of the foremost of the hounds—and that was all they ever got of the flying conquerors.

Away! away! out of those dreary woods, from those dark mountains and savage dogs—never again to be caught in such agonizing toils—though trouble and suffering in many other ways might meet them.

"Good-bye, Amy," said Harry at Mount Junction; "I must hurry back to my studies. Father must not know that I left them. How I'll work to win a home for you. You are now safe with friends. Good-bye! Good-bye! all of you. Only a little while and we'll be together again."

"Only a little while!" How often do we say, "Only a little while;" and how often do we believe it? Blessed, blessed falsehood. How many a good-bye would have naught but bitter tears if we knew how long and how harsh the separation was to be.

Harry was on the verge of life. He knew not its unsounded deeps; it's wide currents drifting far apart. The fairy-land might sometime appear; but how different from the splendors of his youthful vision!

Away to the great bustling city of New Orleans; past gleaming villages and broad savannahs. It was a brilliant panorama to the inexperienced Cupples, who had not before been twenty miles from his birthplace. The ride along the river, with its variegated pictures on either side, furnished him with materials for many a long talk. Like greater men he repeated the same thing again and again, but in sublime unconsciousness of the fact. The twentieth time telling was as fresh to him as the first. When once more at home he put new bolts on his doors, and defied anybody to steal that baby again.

A Picture of New England Piety.

We know a refined, intelligent woman, living among the green hills of Vermont, whose life is typical of hundreds living in that vicinity and scores scattered throughout the far West, says the Hartford Times. She rises at five o'clock in the morning, chops wood, draws water, makes fires, prepares the meals for five stalwart "hired men," besides doing the family washing, ironing, scrubbing, churning, preserving, pickling, mending, and knitting. She beheads the chickens, feeds the hens and calves, and is occasionally called upon to accelerate the departure of pigs to that bourne from which no pig ever returns. Her work is never done. She fries doughnuts at 10 o'clock at night, and begins life on pie the next morning. Her only dissipations are prayer-meetings, funerals, and huckleberrying, varied by winter kettledrums, where the guests sew carpet rags, refreshed with cider, forfeits, and kisses. Her literature is limited to Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress," "Josiah Allen's Wife," and the Zion's Herald; her music to a fountain filled with blood, dismal sounds from the tombs, and invitations to anxious seats; her pictures to a plump prodigal son, a perpetual Samuel, a furious Cain, an amiable George Washington, Napoleon on his death-bed at St. Helena, a weeping willow and widow in a graveyard of hair, and a few glistening tintypes of freshly engaged couples, who, with hands clasped, hair oiled, and imitation watch-chains spread out to "show," stare rigidly into a future the counterpart of her own. Her bric-a-bac consists of wax-work, daguerreotypes, plaster dogs with green noses, yellow baskets, and crushed strawberry tails, and a shell box containing reward of merit cards, and pathetic remembrances of her vanished childish years—the only visible recognition of her goodness that the poor little woman ever had. Her dress is calico all the year round for week days, and black alpaca for Sundays. Her windows are covered with green paper shades, and the parlor floor with the envy and the awe of the neighborhood, a tapestry carpet overflowing with red and pink atrocities in yellow horns of plenry.

She is a woman after Rev. Morgan Dix's own heart. She stays at home. The glorious pictures of majestic mountains, the flashing cascades, the leafy woods, the splendor of blue skies, the soft white clouds, and sweet-smelling daisy fields are not for her, except in tantalizing glimpses, which only increase the thirst of her thirsting soul. She has no time to receive the sense of power and peace that comes from those stately mountains; no time to revel in the exquisit beauty of those waterfalls; no time to lie on the grass and watch the softly sailing clouds, or trace the truthful symbols and discover the wondrous revelations that nature givs to those who love and understand her.

Yet this woman's husband has made a little fortune of $30,000 in lumber, which is considered something colossal in those regions where wants are few and pleasures circumscribed. She has been brought up to believe that he was created a superior being. So has he. He is coarse, red-haired, freckled, pious, penurious, and asthmatic. He has had a change of heart, and one change of "meetin' clothes," in which he looks more hideous than he does in his overalls. His chief satisfaction is to chew tobacco, talk in class meeting, and to get a bargain. He never owes a penny, and never givs one. He can pray, and he thinks he can sing. It takes him thirty minutes every night and fifteen minutes every morning to tell the Lord of several mistakes in the universe, and to ask a few mild favors. One is to wreak eternal vengeance on the wicked by plunging them into everlasting fire, and another is a request for "power to wrestle with the stranger within his gates;" and, notwithstanding her promptly-paid board bills, to bring her to a sense of her own vile nature and hardened heart, created bad in the first place, only to be purified and saved by the acceptance of this man's peculiar theological beliefs. After singing, exhorting, and wheezing, he takes to snoring with an equal spirit and energy that makes him audible all through the night, and the sinner within his gates to look for a new boarding-house next morning. It does not occur to him to use his money to make his wife and their lives any happier; or that he can afford to bring a couple of strong servants into the house to perform the menial work of himself and his hired men. He means well. This superior being does not know any better. The circumstances of his narrow life and the inheritance of a narrow nature are accountable for his blind ignorance.

One day his wife returned from the village, after selling ninety cents' worth of eggs, produced by her own hens. She timidly asked if she sould keep the proceeds. He generously handed her fifteen cents, and pocketed the rest, with the grumble, "Wimmen folks is allus spendin'." He did not realize the meanness of the act, but when we saw it a line of Tennyson's seemed to spring suddenly into the air and enwrapped him in living words that said, "Half his little soul is dirt." But he does not know that, and never will—in this life. He cannot read the pitiful story stamped upon his wife's careworn face, with its habitual expression of unconscious self-abnegation and meek resignation. They never hav any pleasant walks, talks, jokes, read any books, or hav friendly companionship together. He never givs her ice cream, anniversary presents, unexpected praise, flowers, or kisses. When she dies she may hav a flower in her coffin, which will look strangely out of place, as none ever came into her married life.

Twice she made a feeble attempt to bring some cheerfulness into their home. She worked her husband a pair of slippers for Christmas, and placed a bunch of snowdrops on the table at Easter. He gruffly told her to "take 'em away, and not inkerage the scarlet woman by bringin' sich popish notions into the house." The country fences, barns, taverns, rocks, and landscape were once ablaze with flaming posters announcing the coming of a traveling circus and menagerie. She gazed on those pictured wonders; on the monkey parodies, pathetic camels, repulsiv serpents, leaping tigers, flying figures, complacent fat women, bushy-haired frauds, dissatisfied albinoes, pompous dwarfs, sunshiny giants, the sacred cow of Burmah, and the behemoth of scripture. Her very soul ached with an intense longing to behold these oriental animals from far-away tropical countries, from "Afric's burning sands," of which she had read in the Bible and in "Little Henry and his Beaver." Was it possible that those huge, ungainly elephants could stand on their heads, planks, and barrels, play tunes on hand-organs, and do other undreamed-of things, perfectly unnatural and unpleasant to an elephant?

Was it true that horses waltzed and dogs hung each other; that a woman could be shot from a cannon, and a tattooed man walk shiveringly about, clad only in his cashmere skin, and gauzy beings fly through hoops of fire over the backs of horses that had to make up their minds to stand it? It was wonderful—a fairy tale, a myth, perhaps. Everything was reversed, the toes of the rider, the clown in the ring, the ideas and trunks of the elephants. Seeing was believing, and she wanted—oh, how she wanted to go! It would be the one great pleasure, the one grand epoch of her dreary life. Only those who hav been forced to remain in the unvarying routine of hard work, care, and unending monotony can appreciate the happiness it would be could this downtrodden little Yankee woman go to the circus. She read on the brilliant posters that "people, press, and pulpit commended this great moral show, unparalleled in grandeur and magnificence, and that nothing was said, seen, or done that could offend the most moral and fastidious person."

To be sure, Zion's Herald had not advertised it, and she had not yet heard it indorsed by her own minister from his pulpit; but one minister differeth from another minister in opinions, and if even one attended the circus, surely she could. She had no money, and was afraid to ask for any, or to broach the subject to her husband, fearing his opposition. She remained awake at night, wondering if she was a wicked, designing woman for not mentioning her desire, and where she could obtain means to accomplish it. This was the first time she ever plotted, the first time she ever dared to strike out for herself. It showed how keen was the yearning for a little brightness to come into her cold and cheerless life. She knew it was useless to ask for any of the egg, butter, cheese, or milk money that she had earned.

She arose two hours earlier the next morning, did much of the housework, and while her husband was drinking molasses and water in the hay-field, she slipped away on a pretext and winged feet; and, under the burning August sun, with hands trembling and heart beating with hope and excitement, she picked five quarts of berries, that were sold at the hotel in S——. The next day, with the coveted money held tightly in her ungloved hand, she hurriedly climbed into the wagon of a neighbor who had called by her request to carry her with his wife and children to the circus, all joyful at the unusual holiday. How her heart beat! how her limbs shook! Once off and out of view of the hay-field, she would breathe freer. One taste of pleasure, and it was hers forever, no matter what happened afterward. They turned the corner, and a man appeared on the dusty road. It was her husband sent there by one of those malicious chances that sometimes "thwart the wills of men," and of women. He stopped them. Explanations followed.

"It is my money. I didn't take it from the house. I earned it yesterday," she faltered, holding up her toil-worn, thorn-scratched hand.

It was her only appeal, and it fell mute upon her quivering lips, as he sternly ordered her to "get down." She ought not to hav got down, and we are sorry to say that she did. But she is meek and good, and she "obeyed," with her eyes and heart full of tears.

He walked unrelentingly by her side to the house. He took her hardly-won bits of silver. He said they should go into the contribution-box next Sunday to atone for the heinous sin she had committed in wishing to enter unholy places. He entered the closed sanctuary of his parlor. He removed the tobacco quid from his mouth and placed it upon the mantel. Then he prayed. Kneeling in the center of the floor, on the biggest, yellowest, most unfaded "horn of plenty" that besprinkled the carpet, he asked the Lord, in nasal tones, to chasten the worldly spirit of his wife, to withhold her from the snares of temptation baited by the devil, and to keep her from the flesh pots of Egypt and Vermont. She never complains. She suffers vaguely, not fully comprehending the servil position she holds in her husband's house. We are glad she does not. In her case it would make no difference if she did understand it.

This is only one woman's life out of thousands, under varying conditions and circumstances, to be sure, but true just the same. Yet there are unthinking men and women who say that "justice and equality are not good for women; they hav all the privileges that are necessary."

A Sailor's Creed.

On a voyage across the Pacific there was an American sailor in our watch named Glover, who was a real rollicking tar, the soul of good nature, when he was not growling, and his yarns came nearer to the models of the sea-story-books than those of any sailor we had during the voyage. I became much interested in him, and one fine moonlight night, when we were on the lookout together, I endeavored to turn the conversation upon religious subjects, for I was curious to know if there were any serious thoughts concealed beneath his jovial speech. With some timidity, such as affects most people when they approach this subject, I said, "Glover, do you ever think about the future life?"

"Oh, yes," he replied, "I giv it a thought sometimes. We've all got to leave this world some time, and a sailor may go pretty sudden."

"What hope hav you got of being happy in the next world?" I asked.

"This is my hope," said Glover; "God is too good to let a sailor liv hard and die hard, and go to hell after all."

"But the Bible says that the wages of sin is death, and if you hav sinned there is no way to escape from hell, except by trusting in Christ as your savior."

"Of course I believe the Bible," said Glover, "but I don't know much about it, and can't understand it, and I kind of think it's meant for shore-folks. Sailors are different fish. When sailors die they go to Fiddler's Green. They say that when the first vessel was lost at sea, all the crew were drowned. When they got on their pins in the other world they saw heaven looming up ahead, and they pegged off, hot foot, to get into it. The lookout on the walls saw them coming along, shouting, singing, and dancing, and he called out to St. Peter, 'There's a crowd of folks coming that's different from anything we ever had here before.' St. Peter took a look at them, and was so scared by their capers he ran down with his keys and locked the gate. When the sailors got to the gate they knocked, and yelled, and shouted, 'Keeper, ahoy! let us in here!' But St. Peter called out, 'Go away! we don't hav any such people as you in here.' 'Well,' says they, 'if we can't get into heaven, let's go to hell; that's the next best place.' So off they marched to see if Old Nick would take them in. When the devil saw them he, too, was frightened, and said, 'It'll never do to let them chaps in here; they'd take charge of the place in a week.' The sailors knocked at the gate, but were told they couldn't come in. They swore they'd burst the door in, and they pushed so hard the devil put his back up against it and his tail stuck through between the iron gratings of the gate. The sailors thought that would do for a purchase to pull the gate open, and they caught hold of his tail and sung, 'Haul the bow-line,' while they pulled. They nearly jerked his tail out, and the devil roared for the cook to throw some hot water on them. They started on the run then, and when they were safe they said, 'If we can't get into either heaven or hell, we'll hav to shift for ourselvs.' So they hove to halfway between, and set up a camp that they called Fiddler's Green. All the sailors that hav died since hav joined them there."

"That will do for a yarn," said I, "but of course you don't believe such stuff."

"I don't know anything about it," said Glover, "and I never found anybody that did. But they say now that the devil is dead."

"Nonsense," I replied; "the Bible says he goes about like a roaring lion, seeking whom he may devour."

"This is how I heard it told," said Glover. "There was a sea cap'n once that made a bargain with the Old Nick that if he would stand by him all his life, the devil should hav him when he died. Nick kept his word, helped the cap'n through a lot of his scrapes. But when the cap'n got old he began to get sick of his bargain, and began to overhaul his reckoning to see if he couldn't get to windward somehow, or work Tom Cox's traverse up one hatchway and down the other. So he called the old boy, and says he, 'Nick, it's coming on an awful storm, and I've got to come to anchor and pay out the chain to the last link to make the ship hold on. Now,' says he, 'I want you to hold on to the end of the chain, and check it when I tell you.' There was really no bottom there, but he unshackled the chain from around the foremast, and gave the end to the Old Nick. Then he let go the anchor, and the chain flew out like lightning through a greased gridiron. 'Hold on hard,' says the cap'n, and Nick grabbed the chain as death sticks to a dead nigger; but in a second he was yanked around the windlass, and snaked out through the hawsepipe. Nobody has seen the devil since."

I found it was not of much use to talk theology to Glover. His careless, happy-go-lucky mind would not concern itself with matters beyond his comprehension, and he rested in the conviction that he was willing to "take his chance" with a merciful God.

Sailors are seldom Infidels. They reverence God and respect the Bible, though they are very ignorant of its contents, and know nothing of the doctrins men hav built upon it. I knew of a minister's son who spoke disrespectfully of the Bible in a ship's forecastle, and an old sailor gave him a thrashing for it. Sailors are wholly unsectarian; their creed is as broad as the ocean on which they sail; they shun both the baptism of the waves and the sprinkling of the sprays; they are more concerned about falling from aloft than about falling from grace, and think more about the destination of the voyage than about predestination.

The Free Land Question.

A great deal is being said in Liberal papers in favor of free land, and I presume there are many that think if the poor had all the good land they could work they would cease to be poor. I once thought so, but a dozen years' experience has done what a dozen hours ought to hav done for me. Here in Kansas are most likely half a million of people that hav been thus cared for by the nation. Every citizen over twenty-one years of age is allowed to purchase one hundred and sixty acres of land for fourteen dollars, and take their choice at that. The fact is, a vast number of people came and took land who would never hav owned any in the East, and it is within reasonable limits to say that three-fourths of them are, to use the mildest language, incapables—not vicious, not drunkards, not bad neighbors, not bad citizens, but simply incapable of conducting agricultural operations with profit; while the other fourth, with no better chance in any way, except what nature blessed them with in their mental and physical organizations, are prospering and in many instances are purchasing the lands of the incapables. And new emigrants that come too late to get land at government prices, purchase for a thousand dollars what the first occupant got for nearly nothing.

Now, what is needed of such reformers as friend Hacker, Mr. Cook, and some others, is to tell how to keep these people in possession of a home. If the law did not allow them to sell it, as now, after five years' occupancy, the land would become a nuisance to the capables, as the taxes would not be paid, roads worked, bridges built, schools supported, and the capables would hav so great a burden that they would in turn become incapables. It seems, then, if this is an argument, that it is not land the poor need, but capacity to work the land—mental capacity, I mean. I think it would be difficult to find a state or community on a large scale where that question has had a better chance of being tested than in this blood-bought Kansas. The land law has settled up the state and been of great service to the many and the world; but it has not given homes to the class of people that need them most. However, perhaps a partial evil is a universal good.

Perhaps some one will demand of me the cure of this evil of a homeless people. I regret that I can only, after much thinking, point you to friend Heywood, of the Word, and he will say, "Quit raising incapables, and commence to raise capables."

Cawker City, Kan. GEORGE W. CHAPMAN, M.D.

The Liberal Club.

There were high jinks at the meeting of the Manhattan Liberal Club on the evening of Friday the 7th. Mr. Charles Stuart Welles was the lecturer, the "New Marriage; or, Uniform Marriage Laws," being the subject which he proposed to treat of. A smile illuminated the faces of his hearers as he opened with the words, "I am the light of the world; he that followeth me shall not walk in darkness, but shall hav the light of life." This comforting assurance was followed by the explanation that the birth, life, teachings, and death of Christ were eminently regular, and symbolized in some mysterious way the true spiritual marriage. It was supplemented with a great deal more from the same source, and the audience grew fatigued and somewhat discouraged with the apparently unnecessary allusions to the great woman of bad character which John discourses about in Revelation. A young man who had brought his girl with him took her home and shortly returned alone, and Mr. Cohen suggested that a point of order would stick on the speaker. Adam and Eve, the lecturer went on to say, contracted an unfortunate marriage and thus brought trouble into the world. Considering that they were the only people on earth, and with no opportunities for a comparativ estimate of the merits of each other, it would seem that they might hav been excused for their bad taste in selecting a partner. It looks like Hobson's choice. This point, however, was ignored by Mr. Welles. The Bible was, he maintained, pre-eminently a treatis on marriage. Reluctantly leaving the subjects of adultery, abominations, and women of loose morals generally, whom, regardless of the presence of ladies, he spoke of in the coarse phraseology of scripture, the speaker came to what he called the argumentativ portion of his lecture. This was that whereas we hav laws providing for monogamic marriage, in practice we are polygamists. The law should either sanction polygamy or enforce monogamy. Running back once more to the matter of the celebrated frail sister of Bible fame, the scarlet woman, and the street-walker of Babylon, Mr. Welles caressed those worthies for a few moments, and then sat down, leaving a bewildered audience to wonder what it was all about.

Mr. Wakeman observed that it was a remarkable lecture. He wished that the second vice-president, Mr. Andrews, were there. He was better qualified than any other person to throw light upon what Mr. Welles had been trying to get through him. Others, however, would be permitted to go ahead and make as much out of it as was possible with the material at hand.

Mr. Cohen said the discourse was not what he expected to hear, but it was a remarkable lecture. Being a Hebrew himself, Mr. Cohen was interested in the curse upon the Jews. Judging from the prosperous condition of the Hebrews, so far as worldly goods were concerned, he estimated that they would manage to preserve their serenity, and would not allow the curse to make them seriously unhappy. The lecturer had made one clear statement to the effect that the marriage question should be treated intelligently. Mr. Cohen regrètted that Mr. Welles had not set an example by handling it that way himself.

Mr. Seering concurred in the general opinion that we had heard a remarkable lecture. The marriage question certainly had an economic basis, and it was to be regretted that Mr. Langerfelt had absented himself, as that gentleman was pre-eminently qualified to grapple with questions on that basis. Mr. Seering was influenced to make his remarks brief in order to giv room to Mr. Eccles, for whom there was a popular demand.

Mr. Eccles began by saying that it was the most remarkable lecture he had ever heard. He wished Mr. Welles had stated his position more definitly. He would like to ask the lecturer, before proceeding further, whether he was a Shaker or a Mormon. "Are you a Mormon?" said Mr. Eccles, addressing Mr. Welles. "You are a vagabond," said Mr. Welles, addressing Mr. Eccles. The speaker then continued, saying that by the survival of the fittest, monogamic marriage would be the final winding up of conjugal experiments.

Dr. Weeks corroborated the testimony of his predecessors, that the lecture had been a most remarkable one. Polygamy was a physical necessity to some men and women, and the doctor went on, in pretty broad language, to explain why. Time was called by an auditor. Dr. Weeks said if the auditor knew more about running that meeting than Mr. Wakeman did, he better take the chair.

Mr. Langerfelt, having come in, charged on the lecturer with great spirit. He had never heard such a remarkable lecture before. Here the young man who had taken his girl home and returned, applauded with such vigor that the campstool on which he was sitting collapsed. Mr. Langerfelt claimed the first knock-down. Remarking that he believed he had the floor, the young man arose and secured another seat. Business was then resumed.

Mr. Henry Stone, after saying that the lecture was a most remarkable one, asked the lecturer to explain what effect the curse passed upon the serpent had on that historic reptil's method of locomotion. The curse provided that the snake should crawl upon its belly. He would like to be informed how it could crawl in any other way.

It was now time for Mr. Welles to reply to his critics, but that gentleman was not to be found. He had disappeared. Mr. Furbish arose to say that he didn't think that was exactly fair. When he saw the lecturer's white choker he apprehended that he wouldn't face the music. It should be previously stipulated hereafter, with gentlemen with his cut of jib, that they should remain and see the thing through. It was their custom to shoot out through the door when they found it too warm for them. This was reprehensible and should be provided against. The lecture had been a remarkable performance.

Mr. Smith, omitting to allude to the remarkable character of the lecture, instanced the marriage aws of Peru, which provided that a man and woman could enter into the connubial state by mutual consent, and by sending to the constituted authorities a notice that they were about to assume new relations. Divorce could also be obtained by mutual application for it. The only improvement to be made upon this system, Mr. Smith thought, was to grant a divorce whenever either one of the married parties applied for it, and to levy a two per cent tax on all assets. Happy marriages could be secured by the man and wife settling down and living happily together.

Mr. Wakeman then notified the audience that they were released until next Friday night, when the Rev. Mr. Gallagher would speak on the "Mormon Question," and the visitors went away impressed with the belief that it is given to most people but once in a life-time to listen to such a remarkable lecture as Mr. Welles had presented before them. For uncontroled hilarity and humorous incident and remark, this meeting surpasses any within the memory of the oldest member. This stylographic pen may ne'er record its like again.

Introducing Mr. Livezey, of Catonsville.

An amusing person living in Maryland, named F. B. Livezey, has been busying himself for a year past in flooring Freethinkers—in his own mind. Mrs. Slenker was unwise enough to engage him in controversy in the columns of Light for Thinkers, and on that modicum of notice he has fed his vanity till he is inflated to the point of bursting. He is now employing his leisure moments in sending out the following circular. We receive it by courtesy of J. Allen Evans, of Buffalo, Wyoming Ter.:

INFIDEL MEN AND WOMEN.

A list of leading Infidel writers, authors, editors, and lecturers brought to grief, or confession, in the line of their profession, by F. B. Livezey, of Catonsville, Md.

Reader, you are at liberty to confront any of the above Infidels with my allegations of their inability to defend their forte with their chosen weapons of facts, reason, or commonsense; and if, behind my back, they giv the lie to my allegations, you may know that I hav the documents at hand for proof. True, in the list are a few who, after publicly inviting controversy with great pomposity or assurance, kept severely quiet in reply to my introductory antagonisms; but these slinking Goliahs rank lower than the ones that faced the shepherd's sling. Perhaps an exception should be made in the case of Ingersoll, as I did not forward him the several thousand dollars naturally expected for his utterances and pennings.

I proposed before the close of 1883, to publish a book containing the dialogs that had passed with the above Infidels, but, from various causes, I was deterred; still, it may yet be done, F. B. L.

February, 1884.

This ebullition reminds us of a story. A young fellow from the East was on a train crossing the Rockies. He wore a miner's blouse, top-boots, slouch hat, and leather belt, in which was slung a little revolver, carrying a ball of the smallest size. His garments sat upon him uncomfortably, and he was evidently a "tenderfoot" of the greenest variety. But he fondled his pistol ostentatiously, and was loud in his asseverations of what he would do if attacked by any one. In the same car, and seated in front of him, were a party of real miners—big-limbed, broad-chested, brown-bearded men, with voices like young volcanoes. They were dressed in the mining suits the stripling had imitated, and around their waists were belts holding each a pair of revolvers of the largest size. Hearing the valiant boasts of the boy behind them, and perhaps becoming a little tired of the noise, one of them rose up and said, "What d'ye got there to do all that killing with?" "This revolver," loudly answered the greenhorn. "Let's see it," said the miner, reaching out his hand, and taking the weapon, "Call that a pistol?" contemptuously asked the Hercules. Wall, if you was to shoot me with that and I should ever find it out, I'd lick you like thunder."

Probably the "leading Infidel writers, authors, editors, and lecturers," who had been "brought to grief" by Mr. Livezey feel as the miner did. And now that we hav called their attention to their downfall they may turn round and "lick him like thunder," and then again, perhaps, they mayn't, as it will be hard for them to realize their utter and final collapse.

We note with satisfaction that more "Investigator writers" hav been brought to grief than "TRUTH SEEKER writers." Even the veteran Horace himself has succumbed to the doughty Livezey, while we—but wait! in the long ago we remember that we received a communication from Catonsville. It was voluminous and nearly covered the bottom of the waste basket. The ear-marks of the crank were plain upon it, and while we were willing that the crank should whirl, we declined to turn the grindstone for him. So far as THE TRUTH SEEKER is concerned, he must turn on his own axis. For that waste basket act, he may catalog us among the "slinking Goliahs." Harrowing supposition! But on second thought that cannot be the case, for we never invited controversy with him. Our withers are, therefore, unwrung and we are free to commiserate our fallen brethren, and extend to them a helping hand, which we hereby do. If Brother Seaver wants the use of our copy of the Bible, or our "Lives of the Saints," including John Calvin, or "Book of Martyrs," which does not include John Calvin's victims, or our "Confession of Faith," or "Discipline," or any other of the books used in confuting, confounding, and sitting upon obstreperous Christians, who misquote their own creeds and mutilate their own histories in order to "bring to grief, or confession, leading Infidel writers, authors, editors, and lecturers," he can hav them with pleasure. We will hold up his hands and stand at his back, let Mr. Livezey do what he will.

But our opinion of the Maryland gentleman is that he is a nuisance, with no ideas worth the gathering, a retailer of other people's dreams and guesses, who substitutes abuse for argument, fancies for facts, and wishes to engage in controversy simply to get notoriety.

FOUR-FIFTHS of the excise moneys raised in this city are paid to Catholic "benevolent" institutions.

THE Freethinkers of Kokoma, Ind., sent the Ohio river flood sufferers $104.30, the proceeds of a ball held for their benefit.

THE Andover Review thinks that "familiarity with the tongues, patristic learning, acquaintance with the history of the church, and especially of Christian doctrin, general culture, and acumen, are not for a moment to be compared with the simple possession and use of the sacred text as a means of arriving at doctrinal truth." The view that "where ignorance is bliss 'tis folly to be wise" will hold good with the Christian world as long as ignorance brings with it belief as well as alleged happiness. As that will be forever, the immortality of this delusiv old saw is assured.

AT a private session of the Woman's Suffrage Association in Washington last Saturday morning, it was decided to hold conventions during the coming year under the auspices of the association in every state and territory not now organized for woman suffrage, and to endeavor to secure the adoption by the state and territorial legislatures of recommendations of the proposed sixteenth amendment to giv the freedom of the ballot to women. It was also decided to use all the resources at the command of the association to defeat any presidential candidate, by whatever party nominated, who is opposed to woman suffrage. The views of the several candidates on this question are to be obtained by the executiv officers of the association—Mrs. Stanton, Miss. Anthony, and Mrs. Sewall.

ON February 15th the Associated Press sent out a dispatch from Washington which tells in few words the story of a shameful religious intrigue. The dispatch reads:

"The secretary of the interior has decided to recommend that the nomination of Mitchell to be receiver at Duluth be withdrawn, and has called upon Hon. Knute Nelson to name some one for the appointment in his place. Mr. Nelson has recommended the appointment of E. G. Swanstrom, of Duluth. It was very doubtful whether the nomination of Mitchell could be confirmed. It is said that charges of fraud in connection with the pre-emption law were not seriously regarded as an objection, as they did not appear to be sustained; but the secretary of the interior says that his attention has been called to a series of articles published by Mitchell some years ago attacking Christianity and using most violent and indecent language. These articles were shown to senators, and they declared that Mitchell's nomination ought not to be confirmed. These articles were the cause of Mitchell's defeat, some four years ago, for a second term in the land office. Hayes was then president, and refused to send in Mitchell's name when these articles were shown him."

The Mr. Mitchell spoken of is R. C. Mitchell, editor of the Duluth Tribune. He is a heretic. A few years ago he published in his paper many articles reflecting upon the church, and showing Christianity to be a failure and founded on fraud and imposture. Finding that his outspoken course was injuring him, he ceased publishing his heretical opinions, although still holding them. But that is a matter for Mr. Mitchell to settle with his own conscience. It has no place in deciding upon the merits of his application for an office. If he had committed fraud in his conduct of a land office, that is proper to be considered by the interior secretary. But that charge appears to hav been trumped up by his religious opponents and not sustainable. Then the charge of heresy was urged against him. That was effectual. Since when a man's religious opinions are a qualification for office the secretary did not state. It may be that under the civil service rules the Presbyterianism or Methodism of a candidate will entitle him to a high mark, but if so the fact ought to be known. If political primaries are hereafter to be prayer-meetings, and a man's facility in showing the whites of his eyes and ability to make himself out the most miserable wretch on earth in order to illustrate the marvelous goodness of God in "saving" him, are to be counted superior to honesty and executiv ability, it will be well to adopt the God-in-the-Constitution amendment, hang a chime of bells in the capitol cupola, and call the nation to partake of the communion. The senatorial "cold tea" now passed around in "chinee" cups can be utilized for sacrificial wine.

THE Louisville, Ky., Christian Observer complalns that there is coldness between the brethren in that section. They do not patronize one another's mills; they order their papers through New York agencies; they go to Northern watering-places for their health. "What!" cries the Observer, "Is Christianity to be the cause of animosities and bitterness? Does the gospel hav an influence to restrain the natural outflow of amity and kindly feelings? Such will be, nay, such is, the arguing of worldly men wherever they see this sectional bitterness between Presbyterians. Surely this is reason enough to cause men to eschew it." Certainly. The Observer is away behind with the news, or it would hav said this before.

THE Rev. Mr. Wright (Congregationalist) is denounced as a fraud and adventurer, and good Christians are warned to eschew him. His actions justify the charge. He received a call to the pulpit of a church at Winooski, Vt., accepted the engagement, drew his salary in advance, and then got drunk and neglected his flock. When he did preach he used vulgar language in the pulpit, as he was in the habit of doing outside of it. His congregation dwindled from sixty-five to three. Ten out of the fourteen trustees requested him to resign. A glance at his history shows that this man had elsewhere begged money to transport his wife and children off to some distance, and then went on a riotous and immoral debauch, winding up in jail at Canton, where he was immured for three months. The career of this minister of the gospel is not essentially different from that of many others of his profession. It would, perhaps, be unjust to regard every preacher as a rascal until he has proved himself otherwise, but the prudence of such a course must commend itself to all.

A WRITER in the Christian Statesman givs from the leaves of his note-book the results of his interviews with several public men of St. Louis in regard to the proposed religious amendment to the Constitution of the United States. Ex-Governor B. Gratz Brown said: "I am opposed to any mixing of religion with politics, or the setting up of anything like a theocracy. Legislation must be confined to questions within the legitimate sphere of government. I cannot take part in any such convention." Dr. W. G. Eliot, president of Washington University, replied: "I cannot see that such an amendment would do any good. I think we hav no right to incorporate into our Constitution what would discriminate between Jew and gentile, Infidel and Christian." Dr. Goodell remarked, "I hav no time to talk on that subject." Dr. J. A. Wilson and Rev. J. R. Hill replied, "You cannot awaken an interest on that subject in St. Louis." . . . Gen. W. T. Sherman, who was very frank in stating his views, said: "The Constitution is good enough for me. Our country has prospered under it for over a hundred years; and it will continue to prosper, if we let the Constitution alone." But the pious editor of the Globe Democrat said emphatically, "Certainly, I am in favor of all such movements." And the editor has more influence over the people than all the rest.

THE Rev. De LaMatyr, Greenback orator and pulpit politician, made a speech the other day in a church in Denver, in which he undertook to defend Christianity against any and all assailants. Giving the pulpit a resounding whack, he announced the church as the author of all the good and the Freethinkers of all the evil. Then he shied his castor into the ring with these words:

"I challenge our citizens, who cheered the ribaldry of the clown at the opera house against the church, to show what schools Mr. Ingersoll and his friends hav established in this country. I wait a reply. What hav they done for education? Echo answers, What?"

Well, Gilbert, if you really want to know we will tell you. It is generally allowed that Stephen Girard did something to advance knowledge, and Peter Cooper's name has in times past been mentioned in connection with educational institutions. Charles Darwin, before he died, wrote some things that hav helped to educate a good many people, including a number of ministers. Herbert Spencer is not unknown to fame as a man whose labors with his pen hav contributed to educate the world. As an electrician and special scientist, Prof. John Tyndall has told many people what they did not know before, and Prof. Thomas Huxley has given the philosophical bent to more minds than you, Gilbert, will ever preach to if you liv a million years. The whole English, French, and German speaking world is being educated by scientific Infidels, and such questions as you hav asked, Mr. De LaMatyr, only show how ignorant and foolish you are.

A CORRESPONDENT of a Christian paper thus describes the auto-da-fe of thirteen hundred copies of King James's version of the Bible which were ordered burnt by the Spanish government: "The hour of the auto-da-fe came. The officers stood ready with shavings and matches. But where were the holy gospels? They were piled up in boxes, in the custom-house, beneath much larger boxes. It would take three days to clear away things so that the gospels could be reached. Meanwhile the superintendent of the buildings was in danger of losing his place. In due time the happy hour came. The chief paper, the Publicidad, exclaimed, 'The entrance is free for men and women of Barcelona.' It was barely ten o'clock in the morning before a great pile of straw, shavings, pieces of broken furniture, and other combustibles, lay ready for the work. Two officers brought out the boxes, the covers were knocked off, and there lay the beautiful books, nicely bound! The burning went too slowly, and so petroleum was poured upon them. It took one hour to make away with the pile. The custom-house officials were dressed in their gayest uniform, and greatly enjoyed the rare sport. Five hundred people looked on the strange scene." What a curious thing is this religion of the Nazarene! Every follower seems to be arrayed against every other follower, and the sword, the dungeon, and flame hav ever been their arguments. What stupendous folly to talk about such a religion being divine!

THE TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL AND FREETHINKERS' ALMANAC for 1884 is at hand, containing a great amount of useful information and interesting articles from the pens of prominent Freethinkers. It is especially interesting from a historical point of view, giving historical sketches of THE TRUTH SEEKER, various Freethinkers' associations, the National Liberal League, etc. We read with pleasure and profit Mr. Charles Stevens's article on "The Progress of Liberal Thought in Canada." The ANNUAL contains eighteen illustrations from D. M. Bennett's work, "A Truth Seeker Around the World." Two of these, to our opinion, are both superfluous and disingenuous, viz., "The Jewish Jehovah," and "That Old Serpent, which is the Devil and Satan." That the solid matter of the book is relieved by light reading in the form of a story is a good idea, and adds to the general interest of the work.—Radical Review.

The Review falls into error in crediting the pictures of Jehovah and his friend the devil to Mr. Bennett's "Around the World" volumes. Those two works of art were engraved for other purposes. They are faithful likenesses, we believe, of the two orthodox bugaboos, and were inserted in the ANNUAL for the purpose of making the Christians ashamed of their two deities. With chapter and verse before them they cannot deny the authenticity of the portraits. That we succeeded was shown conclusivly the other day when we called upon a Christian neighbor. He had a copy of the ANNUAL, and the two pictures were pasted together. He was ashamed of his God, and dare not look his devil in the face.

MR. KIRBY, of Doniphan, Kan., has another paper in this week's TRUTH SEEKER. He consumes space principally with speculations, upon the solution of which the highest authorities disagree. We are, therefore, willing to let that phase of it stand for what it is worth. But because Mr. Kirby does not understand how life originated he has no warrant for intruding his god upon the scene. For his existence he has advanced no evidence—not even the threadbare design argument. He has made some few assumptions, and seems to proceed upon the supposition that by ignoring everything previously said he can thrust his creator upon us and hav his ipse dixit taken as established fact. We warn him that such illogical proceeding is unworthy a scientific truth seeker. To settle his doubts as to the beginning of organic life we commend him to read Haeckel's "History of Creation," Darwin's "Origin of Species," Huxley's "Man's Place in Nature," and "Haeckel's Genesis of Man" by Lester F. Ward, and T. B. Wakeman's "Evolution or Creation?" A study of these will giv him more correct ideas than a perusal of his letter would indicate he now possesses. With his Spiritualistic ideas we hav no quarrel. On that subject we are truly Agnostic. Some of the phenomena we admit; the philosophy is as yet incomprehensible. We liv to learn. If Mr. Kirby knows it all, he is to be congratulated and may yet become our teacher. But as the case stands we tkink we can at least point out the way for him to acquire considerable knowledge.

MANY of the occupants of Christian pulpits in these days find themselvs in a tight place, says a Boston paper. They cannot keep their minds hermetically sealed against the truths that are everywhere afloat in the mental atmosphere; because of the standpoint they occupy, which commits them by its traditions and associations to the propagation of old creeds and articles of faith which no modern man can entertain, except by excluding from his mind the sunlight that illumines the intellectual world of to-day. But few hav the moral courage of Emerson, who, when he became convinced that Christian creeds were anacronisms in an age of reason and science, stepped down and out of the Christian pulpit. Here and there is a minister of advanced thought and frank speech who can retain his position without trouble, internal or external; but he is not recognized as a Christian. There was a time when clergymen did much of the deliberate thinking, and hence much of the reflectiv thought used to hav a clerical and Biblical coloring. Bishops Butler and Berkeley were thinkers; but they did all their thinking inside of the Thirty-Nine Articles, and so their ideas are incurably infected with ecclesiasticism and Hebrew and Christian superstition. But the great modern thinkers and scientists giv their reason carte blanche, to serve the interests of truth, irrespectiv of all creeds or canonized forms of gospels and so-called holy traditions. Science to-day is not at all anxious for pulpit sanction or indorsement. On the contrary, the pulpit is more in need of making its teachings appear to be in accord with science, to reach intelligent men. Not a few clergymen adorn their sermons and giv point to them by appropriating the ideas of the Freethinkers and scientists of the day, like the jackdaw that ornaments its nest with feathers and plumage that do not belong to it. But they usually pervert them to theological purposes. The temptation to do this is great; for the majority of the people are yet largely under the influence of the mythologies and theologies of the past, are suspicious of whatever plainly contradicts them, and can receive Liberal and scientific thought only in small doses, and when well mixed with superstition. But the difficulty is in satisfying the intelligent few, whose respect is valued, and not offending the larger number, whose support is needed.

THERE are dynamite and dagger Socialists in England as well as informers and assassins in Ireland. At a debate in which Mr. Bradlaugh participated recently, one of the revolutionary party, a Mr. Scheu, spoke warmly in favor of beginning a bloody warfare in Germany. Mrs. Besant was in the chair of the meeting, and as she listened to the threatening utterances of the Socialist, two things struck her forcibly. She could not help thinking that if Mr. Scheu meant what he said, his place, as a patriot, was in Germany. He mocked at Mr. Bradlaugh's care of individual life, yet he and the foreigners who, living in safety in England, "breathe out threatenings and slaughter," show a remarkable care for their own individual lives. "We must honor," says Mrs. Besant, "those who, finding oppression intolerable and deliverance hopeless save by the sword, throw themselvs forward to lead their brethren into strife for liberty, and risk all they ask others to risk; but we can but hav bitter contempt for those who, safe on English soil, urge others to face dangers they themselvs avoid, and play with the lives of others while careful of their own. The other thing that struck me was that the foreigners who seek English hospitality because they shrink from the peril of struggling for liberty in their own lands make but ill return when they seek to import into England the methods which may sometimes be inevitable under Russian, Austrian, or German tyranny. Secret societies and underground agitation are necessary in countries where free speech and press are unknown. Those who run away from the danger of sharing them in lands where there is no other form of progress possible, ought not to try and force on us the use of violence, while platform and press are ours. As Mr. Bradlaugh said on Sunday, were he a Russian in Russia, he would be a Revolutionist, because there no method of reform was permitted. But since Englishmen hav won for themselvs liberty of political discussion by tongue and pen, they need no teaching about the best way to further reform from foolish foreign Socialists, maddened by the oppression from which they hav fled, and fancying that England is as enslaved as their own fatherland. Let Mr. Scheu go back to Germany, and win for Germany something of the liberty we hav, before he comes to lecture us on the employment of barbarous methods of political conflict, which may be suitable for the backward political condition of his own country, but which we hav, fortunately, outgrown." What Mrs. Besant says of the inappropriateness of dynamite and dynamiters in England applies very well to those commodities in this country.

A KEENE, N. H., paper relates what it calls an "interesting event" which occurred in that little city. A local clergyman was the hero, and the eminently notorious Mr. Jo Cook played the role of heavy villain. It seems that the clergyman was interested in engaging Cook to deliver his lecture on "Seven Modern Wonders of the World," and had invited him to lead at the regular weekly prayer-meeting at his church, previous to the hour set for the commencement of the lecture. At the time agreed upon the preacher knocked at the door of Cook's room, but instead of being courteously received he was set upon by the man, who, in a towering rage, apparently disturbed in a nap, came out into the hall, and seizing the caller began to push about and otherwise lay violent hands upon him, at the same time using language unbecoming a gentleman. The disturbance made by the waltzers attracted the attention of a large number in the house, and the landlord, who was quietly eating his supper, at first supposed that Wheeler, the champion wrestler, and Fletcher, the butcher (two local hard cases), had met by chance, and were engaged in playing up for a grape-vine. He was among the first to arrive at the scene of action, but upon discovering two of his distinguished guests engaged in private business, he passed by on the other side, and returned to the dining-room. It is stated by the witnesses that such names as "barbarian," "Hottentot," "guerrilla," etc., were flung in by the contestants by way of emphasis. The preacher opened his meeting that night unassisted, and there was a large attendance, as notice had been given of the expected appearance of the celebrated Cook. At the proper time Cook was invited to lead in prayer, in which he complied with seeming reluctance. Then he was invited to entertain the audience with remarks. But instead of noticing the request he seized his hat and rushed out of the church, slamming the door behind him. His lecture was not largely attended. The local preacher has the sympathy of the community. To this may be added the testimony of a Boston correspondent of the Chicago Tribune, that "Cook's Monday morning preludes, questions, and lectures are not a great success this year. For some reason or other he has lost his boom, says nothing notable nor peculiar, doesn't misquote Herbert Spencer and John Stuart Mill with his former fluency, and falls far short of making a sensation. Tremont Temple is not crowded with eager listeners, and the galleries, in which free seats are granted to publicans and sinners, are not packed as the lecturer would like to hav them every Monday morning." Cook went up as a baloon; he will come down like the great gas-bag that he is.

Lectures and Meetings.

THE first quarterly congress for 1884 of the Liberals of the West will assemble at the Opera House, Liberal Mo., March 28th, and hold a four days' session. This meeting will be under the auspices and management of the Brotherhood of Humanitarians, whose invitation extends to all human beings now on earth. Delegations from many points in southern Kansas and Missouri have already signified their intention to be present. Liberals of every phase and shade are specially requested to come. Important steps for the establishment of a school, wherein an education can be obtained untainted by superstition, will be one feature to be considered by this congress. Eminent Humanitarian speakers will be in attendance. Frank Greene is the secretary.

The Great Ingersoll.

Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll was in Denver, Col., recently. An attaché of the Republican of that city reports he following incidents and conversation:

At an early hour last night a Republican reporter was politely shown to room 182 of the St. James, in which were gathered half a dozen gentlemen, one writing in shorthand, and all listening intently to the graceful, easy flow of language of a smooth-faced, portly gentleman, who discoursed readily on the subjects of politics and religion. The talker was Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll, known by reputation to everyone, from one end of the country to the other. Ex-United States Senator Stephen W. Dorsey was his right-hand man, suggesting points now and then, and enthusiastically indorsing what the colonel said. The writer was Mr. Baker, private secretary of "Colonel Bob."

The reporter was greeted cordially, and invited to take a seat at the table, which he did, and as soon as the business in hand was disposed of, began asking questions of the renowned Atheist; or, as he styled himself, "Pantheist." They were all answered readily, and with not the slightest hesitation, the colonel's memory of names and events being extremely good. A stenographic report of the interview is given below.

The first question asked was, "Who will be the Republican nominee for president?"

Colonel Ingersoll answered: "The correct answer to this question would make so many men unhappy that I hav concluded not to giv it."

The reporter then asked: "Has not the Democracy injured itself irretrievably by permitting the free trade element to rule it?"

"I do not think," was the reply, "that the Democratic party weakened itself by electing Carlisle speaker. I think him an excellent man, an exceedingly candid man, and one who will do what he believes ought to be done. I hav a very high opinion of Mr. Carlisle. I do not suppose any party in this country is really for free trade. I find that all writers upon the subject, no matter which side they are on, are on that side with certain exceptions. Adam Smith was in favor of free trade with a few exceptions, and those exceptions were in matters where he thought it was for England's interest not to hav free trade."

"Yes," remarked ex-Senator Dorsey, "and Richard Cobden was, also."

"The same may be said of all writers," continued the colonel. "So far as I can see, the free traders hav all the arguments, and the protectionists all the facts. The free trade theories are splendid, but they will not work out; the results are disastrous. We find by actual experiment that it is better to protect home industries. It was once said that protection created nothing but monopoly; the argument was that way, but the facts are not. Take for instance steel rails; when we bought them of England we paid $125 a ton. I believe there was a tariff of some $28 or $29 a ton—was it not, senator?"

"Twenty-nine dollars," answered Mr. Dorsey.

"And yet," pursued Colonel Ingersoll, "in spite of all the arguments going to show that protection would simply increase prices in America, would simply enrich the capitalist and impoverish the consumer, steel rails are now produced, I believe, right here in Colorado for $42 a ton.

"After all, it is a question of labor; a question of prices that shall be paid the laboring man; a question of what the laboring man shall eat—whether he shall eat meat or soup made from the bones. Very few people take into consideration the value of raw material and the value of labor. Take, for instance, your ton of steel rails, worth $42.. The iron in the earth is not worth 25 cents. The coal in the earth and the lime in the ledge together are not worth 25 cents. Now, then, of the $42, $41.50 is labor. There is not $2 worth of raw material in a locomotiv that sells for $15,000. By raw material I mean the material in the earth. There is not in a watch, the works of which will sell for $15, of raw material in the earth one-half cent. All the rest is labor. A ship, a man-of-war that costs $1,000,000—the raw material in the earth is not worth, in my judgment, $1,000. All the rest is labor. If there is any way to protect American labor I am in favor of it. If the present tariff does not do it, then I am in favor of changing to one that will. If the Democratic party takes a stand for free trade or anything like it, they will need protection; they will need protection at the polls; that is to say, they will meet only with defeat and disaster."

"What should be done with surplus revenue?" was then asked.

"My answer to that," said the colonel, "is, reduce internal revenue taxation until the present surplus is exhausted, and then endeavor so to arrange your tariff that you will not produce more than you need. I think the easiest question to grapple with on this earth is a surplus of money."

"That never bothers me to any great extent," sotto voce from Senator Dorsey.

The colonel did not seem to notice the remark, but continued:

"I do not believe in distributing it among the states. I do not think there could be a better certificate of the prosperity of our country than the fact that we are troubled with a surplus revenue; that we hav got the machinery for collecting taxes in such perfect order, so ingeniously contrived, that it can't be stopped; that it goes right on collecting money, whether we want it or not; and the wonderful thing about it is that nobody complains. If nothing else can be done with the surplus revenue, probably we had better pay some of our debts. I would suggest, as a last resort, to pay a few honest claims."

"Some Indian claims, for instance," remarked the senator. "It is a shame that, for forty years, they hav not been paid."

At the conclusion of these remarks of a political nature, the reporter branched off into religion with the following question;

"Are you getting nearer to or further away from God, Christianity, and the Bible?"

Colonel Ingersoll replied as follows:

"In the first place, as Mr. Locke so often remarked, we will define our terms. If by the word 'God' is meant a person, a being, who existed before the creation of the universe, and who controls all that is except himself, I do not believe in such a being; but if by the word 'God' is meant all that is, that is to say, the universe, including every atom and every star, then I am a believer. I suppose the word that would nearest describe me is 'Pantheist.' I cannot believe that a being existed from eternity, and who finally created this universe, after having wasted an eternity in idleness; but upon this subject I know just as little as anybody ever did or ever will, and, in my judgment, just as much. My intellectual horizon is somewhat limited, and, to tell you the truth, this is the only world that I was ever in. I am what might be called a representativ of a rural district, and, as a matter of fact, I know very little about my district. I believe it was Confucius who said, 'How should I know anything about another world who know so little of this?'"

"When I know so little of this," corrected Senator Dorsey.

"Yes," said the colonel, "'when I know so little of this.' The greatest intellects of the world hav endeavored to find words to express their conception of God, of the first cause, or of the science of being, but they hav never succeeded. I find in the old confession of faith, in the old catechism, for instance, this description: that God is a being without body, parts, or passions. I think it would trouble anybody to find a better definition of nothing. That describes a vacuum, that is to say, that describes the absence of everything. I find that theology is a subject that only the most ignorant are certain about, and that the more a man thinks, the less he knows.

"From the Bible God, I do not know that I am going farther and farther away. I hav been about as far as a man could go for many years. I do not believe in the God of the Old Testament.

"Now, as to the next branch of your question, Christianity. The question arises, 'What is Christianity?' I hav no objection to the morality taught as a part of Christianity, no objection to its charity, its forgivness, its kindness; no objection to its hope for this world and another, not the slightest, but all these things do not make Christianity. Mohammed taught certain doctrins that are good, but the good in the teaching of Mohammed is not Mohammedanism. When I speak of Christianity I speak of that which is distinctly Christian. For instance, the idea that the infinit God was born in Palestine, learned the carpenter's trade, disputed with the parsons of his time, excited the wrath of the theological bigots, and was finally crucified; that afterwards he was raised from the dead, and that if anybody believes this he will be saved, and if he fails to believe it, will be lost; in other words, that which is distinctly Christian in the Christian system is its supernaturalism, its miracles, its absurdity. Truth does not need to go in partnership with the supernatural. What Christ said is worthy the reason it contains. If a man raises the dead and then says twice two are five, that changes no rule in mathematics. If a multiplication table was divinely inspired, that does no good. The question is, is it correct? So I think that in the world of morals, we must prove that a thing is right or wrong by experience, by analogy, not by miracles. There is no fact in physical science that can be supernaturally demonstrated, neither is there any fact in the moral world that could be substantiated by miracles. Now, then, keeping in mind that by Christianity I mean the supernatural in that system, of course I am just as far away from it as I can ever get. For the man Christ I hav respect. He was a novelty in his day, and the ministers of his day cried out blasphemy, as they hav been crying ever since, against every person who has suggested a new thought or shown the worthlessness of an old one.

"Now, as to the third part of the question, the Bible people say that the Bible is inspired. Well, what does inspiration mean? Did God write it? No. But the men who did write it were guided by the holy spirit. Very well. Did they write exactly what the holy spirit wanted them to write? Well, religious people say yes. At the same time they admit that the gentlemen who were collecting, or taking down in shorthand, what was said had to use their own words. Now, we all know that the same words do not hav the same meaning to all people. It is impossible to convey the same thoughts to all minds by the same language, and it is for that reason that the Bible has produced so many sects, not only disagreeing with each other, but disagreeing among themselvs.

"We find, then, that it is utterly impossible for God (admitting that there is one) to convey the same thoughts by human language to all people. No two persons understand the same language alike. A man's understanding depends upon his experience, upon his capacity, upon the particular bent of his mind—in fact, upon the countless influences that hav made him what he is. Everything in nature tells everyone who sees it a story, but that story depends upon the capacity of the one to whom it is told. The sea says one thing to the ordinary man, and another thing to Shakspere. The stars hav not the same language for all people. The consequence is that no book can tell the same story to any two people. The Jewish scriptures are like other books, written by different men in different ages of the world, hundreds of years apart, filled with contradictions. They embody, I presume, fairly enough, the wisdom and ignorance, the reason and prejudice, of the times in which they were written. They are worth the good that is in them, and the question is whether we will take the good and throw the bad away. There are wise and foolish sayings. There are general and cruel passages, and you can find a text to suit almost any frame of mind; whether you wish to do an act of charity or murder a neighbor's babe, you will find a passage that will exactly fit the case. So that I can say that I am still for the reasonable, for the natural; and still am opposed to the absurd and supernatural."

Colonel Ingersoll was next asked, "Is there any better or more ennobling belief than Christianity; if so, what is it?" to which he answered:

"There are many good things, of course, in every religion, or they would not hav existed; plenty of good precepts in Christianity, but the thing that I object to more than all others, is the doctrin of eternal punishment, the idea of hell for the many, and heaven for the few. Take from Christianity the doctrin of eternal punishment, and I hav no particular objection to what is generally preached. If you will take that away, and all the supernatural connected with it, I hav no objection, but that doctrin of eternal punishment tends to harden the human heart. It has produced more misery than all the other doctrins of the world. It has shed more blood; it has made more martyrs. It has lighted the fires of persecution, and kept the sword of cruelty wet with heroic blood for at least a thousand years. There is no crime that that doctrin has not produced. I think it would be impossible for the imagination to conceive of a worse religion than orthodox Christianity—utterly impossible. A doctrin that divides this world, a doctrin that divides families, the doctrin that teaches the son that he can be happy, with his mother in perdition; the husband, that he can be happy in heaven while his wife suffers the agony of hell! This doctrin is infinit injustice, and tends to subvert all ideas of justice in the human heart. I think it would be impossible to conceive of a doctrin better calculated to make wild beasts of men than that; in fact, that doctrin was born of all the wild beast there is in man. It was born of infinit revenge.

"Think of preaching that you must believe that a certain being was the son of God, no matter whether your reason is convinced or not. Suppose we should meet, we will say on London bridge, a man clad in rags, and he should stop us and say, 'My friend, I wish to talk with you a moment. I am the rightful king of Great Britain,' and you should say to him, 'Well, my dinner is waiting; I hav no time to bother about who the king of England is,' and then he should meet another and insist on his stopping while he pulled out some papers to show that he was the rightful king of England, and the other man should say, 'I hav got business here, my friend; I am selling goods, and I hav no time to bother my head about who the king of England is. No doubt you are the king of England, but you don't look like the king of England.' And then suppose he stops another man, and makes the same statement to him, and the other man should laugh at him and say, 'I don't want to hear anything on this subject; you are crazy; you ought to go to some insane asylum, or put something on your head to keep you cool.' And suppose, after all, it should turn out that the man was king of England, and should afterwards make his claim good and be crowned in Westminster. What would we think of that king if he should hunt up the gentlemen that he met on London bridge and hav their heads cut off because they had not faith that he was the rightful heir? And what would we think of a God now who would damn a man eighteen hundred years after the event because he didn't believe that he was God at the time he was living in Jerusalem—not only damn the fellows that he met and who didn't believe in him, but gentlemen who lived eighteen hundred years afterwards, and who certainly could hav known nothing of the facts except from hearsay.

"The best religion, after all, is common sense—a religion for this world, one world at a time, a religion for to-day. We want a religion that will deal in question in which we are interested. How are we to do away with crime? How are we to do away pauperism? How are we to do away with the want and misery in every civilized country? England is a Christian nation, and yet about one in six in the city of London die in almshouses, asylums, prisons, hospitals, and jails. We, I suppose, are a civilized nation, and yet all the penitentiaries are crammed, there is want on every hand, and my opinion is that we had better turn our attention to this world.

"Christianity is charitable; Christianity spends a great deal of money, but I am somewhat doubtful as to the good that is accomplished. There ought to be some way to prevent crime; not simply to punish it. There ought to be some way to prevent pauperism; not simply to relieve temporarily a pauper. If the ministers and good people belonging to the churches would spend their time investigating the affairs of this world, and let the New Jerusalem take care of itself, I think it would be far better.

"The church is guilty of one great contradiction. The ministers are always talking about worldly people, and yet, were it not for worldly people, who would pay the salary? How could the church liv a minute unless somebody attended to the affairs of this world? The best religion, in my opinion, is common sense going along hand in hand with kindness, and not troubling ourselvs about another world until we get there. I am willing, for one, to wait and see what kind of a country it will be."

"Does the question of the inspiration of the scriptures affect the beauty and benefits of Christianity, here and hereafter?"

"A belief in the inspiration of the scriptures has done, in my judgment, vast harm. The Bible has been the breastwork for nearly everything wrong. The defenders of slavery relied on the Bible. The Bible was the real auction block on which every negro stood when he was sold. I never knew a minister to preach in favor of slavery that he didn't find his passage in the Bible. The Bible teaches persecution for opinion's sake. The Bible—that is, the Old Testament—upholds polygamy, and just to the extent that men, through the Bible, hav believed that slavery, religious persecution, wars of extermination, and polygamy were taught by God, just to that extent the Bible has done great harm. The idea of inspiration enslaves the human mind and debauches the human heart."

"Is not Christianity and a belief in God a check upon mankind in general, and thus a good thing in itself?"

"This again brings up the question of what you mean by Christianity; but, taking it for granted that you mean by Christianity the church, I answer that when the church had almost absolute authority, then the world was the worst.

"Now, as to the other part of the question, 'Is not a belief in God a check upon mankind in general?' That is owing to what kind of god the man believes in. When mankind believed in the God of the Old Testament, I think that belief was a bad thing; the tendency was bad. I think that John Calvin patterned after Jehovah as nearly as his health and strength would permit. Man makes God in his own image, and bad men are not apt to hav a very good God if they make him. I believe it is far better to hav a real belief in goodness, in kindness, in honesty, and in mankind than in any supernatural being whatever. I do not suppose it would do any harm for a man to believe in a real, good God—a God without revenge, a God that was not very particular in having a man believe a doctrin whether he could understand it or not. I do not believe that a belief of that kind would do any particular harm.

"There is a vast difference between the God of John Calvin and the God of Henry Ward Beecher, and a great difference between the God of Cardinal Pedro Gonzales de Mendoza and the God of Theodore Parker."

"Well, colonel, is the world growing better or worse?"

"I think better in some respects, and worse in others; but, on the whole, better. It is my opinion that while events, like the pendulum of a clock, go backward and forward, man, like the hands, goes forward. I think there is more reason and less religion, more charity and less creed. The church is improving. Ministers are ashamed to preach the old doctrins with the old fervor. There was a time when the pulpit controled the pews. It is so no longer. The pews know what they want, and if the minister doesn't furnish it, they discharge him and employ another. He is no longer an autocrat; he must bring to the market what his customers are willing to buy."

The reporter then startled Colonel Ingersoll with, "What are you going to do to be saved?"

He smiled and said:

"Well, I think I am safe, anyway. I suppose I hav a right to rely on what Matthew says, that if I will forgiv others, God will forgiv me. I suppose, if there is another world, I shall be treated very much as I treat others. I never expect to find perfect bliss anywhere; maybe I should tire of it if I should. What I hav endeavored to do has been to put out the fires of an ignorant and cruel hell; to do what I could to destroy that dogma; to destroy that doctrin that makes the cradle as terrible as the coffin."

The interview had now lasted an hour, and, thanking the colonel for his courtesy, the scribe left the room.

Is There a God?

A VIEW FROM NATURE'S STANDPOINT.

Does the universe giv proof of the existence of a God? Is human life derived from pre-existing life, or is existing life a link in an unbroken chain of life succession? Is the life of man the production of prior life-being? Is human life indebted to an act on the part of an intelligent being for its existence, without which human life would not (could not) hav been? Or is the existence of mankind an evolution of matter, independent of prior life?

We hav endeavored clearly to state the two theories—the God and the evolution theories. We are inclined to think there hav been extreme positions taken on both sides of this question.

We hold the position that life is eternal, or that life, being a law of matter, has always existed. Need we attempt to prove life a law of matter? The fact that life is, exists—it is self-evident that it is a law of matter. And the fact that life is a law of matter is demonstrated proof that it is co-eternal with matter. Matter being eternal, all its laws must be eternal; and life being one of matter's laws, it (life) must be eternal. And as there never was a time when matter did not exist, there never could be a time when life did not exist. The eternal existence of intelligent progressiv life may be, and is, mysterious; but of the other mysteries, beginning or eternity of life, the latter is the less mysterious. Like the boundlessness of space, the endlessness of time, and the eternity of matter, these may be and are mysterious; but it is easier to conceive such to be than it is to ascribe to them limitations. So with the eternity of life.

Matter is visible and invisible. Life-beings are composed of visible and invisible matter. It is reasonable to suppose that life-beings may be composed of invisible matter (as well as of the visible, or both), spiritual beings, commonly called. No demonstrated proof to the contrary. And surely we cannot charge our Liberal friends (the Spiritualists), with such an overwhelming amount of proof as they hav given, as being deceived, or worse, as being fraudulent.

Life being eternal, it is reasonable to suppose it has always existed, visible and invisible, in the vast universe of matter and space. Life is not uniform in the sense of duration; no, the known facts are to the contrary; some members of the human family liv but a few days, while others liv over one hundred years. "The fittest survive." And it is reasonable to suppose that some of these visible or invisible beings may be of such a nature and in such a condition that their existence is immortal, eternal. And then add to this the fixed manifest law of progression, and we hav beings visible and invisible, which may hav existed from all eternity under the law of perpetual progression. And as "the fittest survive," it is reasonable to suppose, of all which may hav eternally existed, and eternally progressed, that amongst them there is "the fittest"—fittest in wisdom, power, goodness, mercy, and justice; such we would call God.

But has such a being, God, had anything (necessarily) to do with the creation of man? Or is man the evolution of lifeless matter, strictly independent of any such pre-existing or prior life-being?

We now call attention to known facts, and ask the question, Whence came the present existing human life? Was it derived from pre-existing beings; or was it the spontaneous evolution of inanimate matter? The known fact is the former, from pre-existing beings. Here we hav no doubt. No, the present life is known to be derived from prior life. The son and the daughter are the offspring of father and mother; and this fact is known to be true as far in the past as the human mind can penetrate. Yes, life-beings do, and, as far as we can conceive, always hav, derived their life from prior life-beings. This same fact (life derived from life) we claim for the beginning of human life upon the earth. Human life or beings are of such a nature that, like the locomotiv, they giv proof of intelligent construction, adapted for a particular purpose. As the telegraph line and its instruments are, by intelligent man, constructed and adapted to communicate thought, and as the locomotiv (by man) is constructed and adapted for the track on which it rapidly carries its ponderous load, so human beings (physiologically) are constructed and adapted by the wisdom and power of some prior intelligent being—God—to exist, and fill the purpose of their maker, the end for which they exist.

The telegraph, the locomotiv, and the innumerable intelligent adapted constructions that man has produced upon the earth, are not, nor can be, the spontaneous evolution of lifeless matter, and much less can man, a being adapted to this earth's sphere (with the power to perpetuate his kind), be the result, or evolution of lifeless matter, independent of pre-existing intelligent life-being—God.

Protoplasm may be the remotest condition of human life, but the peculiar environment is equally necessary to the development of human existence. Can it be shown that such peculiar protoplasm and environment can be produced by any other law than that by which they are now produced? Or is there proof that such can be produced (or evolved) from inanimate or lifeless matter? The law of human existence is uniform from its origin; that is, one generation produces another. Is it reasonable that lifeless or inanimate matter originated the first man and woman, with their peculiar adapted construction and relation one to the other, with the power of reproduction of their kind? Is there proof of such beings as the result or evolution of inanimate matter? Wonderful lifeless matter! As much so is there proof of our factories and all their products as the result of natural evolution, or the result of lifeless matter.

Intelligent progressiv beings are the offspring of such. Inanimate formation may be the simple result of its own law, or may be the result of intelligent, reasoning, constructiv beings, adapted to a given end, as seen in all the arts of the present and past ages. Everywhere do we see nature's laws appropriated by man, construed and adapted for the bettering of his condition in this life. Equally true do we see construction and adaptation in animate beings, in their relations to the inanimate universe. Yes, everywhere do we see the marks of intelligent construction and adaptation of animated beings to the inanimate universe.

I will close the present article here, and will add a few quotations from one of nature's noble minds—Thomas Paine: "As, therefore, the creator made nothing in vain, so also must it be believed that he organized the structure of the universe in the most advantageous manner for the benefit of man "(Age of Reason, pp. 27, 28). "Every thing we behold carries in itself the eternal evidence that it did not make itself. Every man is an evidence to himself that he did not make himself. . . . Neither could any tree, plant, or animal make itself; and it is the conviction arising from this evidence that carries us on, as it were, by necessity, to the belief of a first cause eternally existing, of a nature totally different to any material existence we know of, and by the power of which all things exist; and this first cause man calls God" (Age of Reason, p. 27). "I believe in one God and no more, and I hope for happiness beyond this life" (Age of Reason, p. 1). "And difficult as it is for a man to conceive what a first cause is, he arrives at the belief of it from a tenfold greater difficulty of disbelieving it" (Age of Reason, p. 27).

Paine Historical Society.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Your last issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER contains glorious accounts of glorious sayings and doings in commemoration of the name of a glorious man on his late natal day, the 29th of January. Of all of nature's noblemen, Thomas Paine is my own most loved and esteemed. I rejoice exceedingly that each year redounds more and more to his honor, and swells the multitude of high-minded men and women who congregate to do him honor and to express their gratitude that he lived. I look forward to the time when a statue of him will adorn the parks and central marts of all of our principal cities. And right here I want to tell your readers that D. M. Bennett, our late noble hero, and myself together saw at Edward Truelove's place of business on High Holborn street, London, in the summer of 1880, the table upon which Thomas Paine wrote the "Rights of Man." It has on it an engraved silver plate, placed there by Paine's faithful friend, Clio Rickman, as a preservativ recognition. Mr. Bennett's notice of it may be seen on page 97 of his book of first European tour, "A Truth Seeker in Europe." But what I want to say here is, that upon a subsequent occasion I took my wife with me to Mr. Truelove's, for her to see the grand old table. And upon that occasion Mr. Truelove said to me that he had long felt that the Americans ought to hav the table, and, further, that he would be willing to part with it for a reasonable sum, if they would be willing to purchase and preserve it. And now, in consideration of the formation of this society in New York, I think it the thing for me to make this known to those who are to become the future guardians of Paine's tomb, as well as the collectors and husbanders of relics and reminiscences of that grandest apostle of human liberty. Then, I say, let us all chip in a mite toward its purchase, and place the table in their keeping. DR. T. S. ANDREWS.

The Monument.

When the last acknowledgment of the amount subscribed for the Bennett Monument was printed, there was on hand $1,366.62. We hav since received the following sums from the persons named:

Hy. McEvilla,	$1 00
W. H. Baxter,	1 00
John E. Krahmer,	1 00
Miss E. A. Gleason,	1 00
L. R. Webb,	5 00
Sol. Dyrenfurth,	25
James Tidhall,	50
Dr. T. M. Sams,	50
A. D. Cornwall,	90
L. D. Olney,	1 00
John McWhirt,	50

This, with the amount previously on hand, foots up to $1,379.27. We hav disbursed as follows:

For Monument,	$1,000 00
" Lettering two sides of monument,	134 00
" Medallion,	175 00
" Cartage of medallion,	5 25
	$1,314 25
Due Mr. Sheehan for lettering two sides, cap, and building the shed,	141 40
	$1,455 65
Cash received,	1,379 27
Balance needed,	$ 76 38

As is seen by the above, after turning over the $65.02 now on hand to Mr. Sheehan, there is a deficiency of $76.38. We hope this will be speedily made up, as no doubt it will be, now that the precise amount is known. The cost of medallion and lettering has somewhat exceeded the estimate given, but we also hav a larger medallion and more sentences than were first contemplated.

The monument is now completed. The medallion is in place, and the lettering cut and ready for the inspection of Mr. Bennett's friends. The memorial stands at the junction of Sylvan avenue and Osier path, in Greenwood Cemetery, about ten minutes' walk from the main entrance. It is distinguishable from the other monuments in the vicinity by its massiv proportions and severe plainness. The base consists of three stones varying in size from five feet six inches to three feet nine inches. The hight of the three is four feet six inches. Surmounting the base is a granit column six feet six inches high and three feet square where it rests on the base, tapering to two feet six inches. Upon this rests a cap, with polished faces, on the front of which are deeply engraved these words:

"ERECTED BY ONE THOUSAND FRIENDS."

Under this side of the cap is the medallion, 30x24 inches, standing out some four inches in relief. It is a faithful likeness, heroic size, with a laurel wreath around the head, and under it is a novel design representing the sword of persecution broken by the pen. Coiled around the sword is the serpent of superstition, also divided by the weapon of thought. The hilt of the sword is formed by the cross, and the ornamentation discloses a popish tiara, the whole symbolizing the forces of the church broken asunder by the forces of Freethought. The total hight of the monument is thirteen feet six inches.

Below the medallion is the following inscription:

D. M. BENNETT,
The founder of "The Truth Seeker,"
The Defender of Liberty, and its Martyr;
The Editor tireless and fearless:
The enemy of Superstition,
As of Ignorance, its Mother,
The Teacher of Multitudes.
The Friend faithful and kind,
The MAN honest and true,
RESTS HERE.
Though dead, he still speaks to us, and asks that we continue the work he left unfinished.

When the Innocent is convicted,
The Court is condemned.

On the second side of the monument, facing Osier path, are these words of Mr. Bennett:

"Demonstrated science may be regarded as the only true source of knowledge.

"What is called revelation is a snare, a delusion, a falsehood. Those who claim to speak for the gods simply speak their own thought.

"The gods do not speak; they are as dumb as the rocks, they are as speechless as the grave. With Nature it is not so. To know her is to know the truth, and to study her is to be wise."

The third side can also be read from the path, and the passer by will from its contents learn Mr. Bennett's position on the immortality problem. The quotation reads:

"The object of our lives should be to make this world as beautiful, and ourselves and our fellows as happy, as is in our power.

"I can hardly yield my consent that this is the last of our individuality; and I fondly think that Father and Mother Nature are able to accomplish the best, greatest, and most desirable of all problems—a continued individual existence. But I am borrowing no trouble about it."

The fourth side bears these sentences from the dead hero's works:

"I believe in the eternal powers and principles of Nature, in the superiority of good lives, in acts of kindness toward our fellow-beings, and in efforts to spread the light of truth over the dark spots of the earth.

"Each person must be responsible for the good or ill he does. Here is our duty, here is our allegiance, and not in the sky above us. We must make our heaven on the earth, and not in the air."

In selecting these quotations the committee was desirous of embodying in them as many as possible of the philosophical and humanitarian principles held by Mr. Bennett. The selections are widely diversified, yet each is pregnant with eloquent truth, with liberality and tolerance of thought. From them may be learned Mr. Bennett's opinion of science, of revelation, of continued individual existence, of the gods, of heaven, of his objects in life, and his reverence for nature. More could not be told in fewer sentences; we feel sure the selection will please his hosts of friends.

A few words as to the conduct of the cemetery authorities. It will be remembered that last summer the correspondent of an out-of-town daily wrote his paper that Mr. Bennett's friends proposed to put on the monument a quantity of ribald blasphemy. At that time the choice of inscriptions had not been made. Nevertheless the pious people all over the country began to write protests to the secretary of the Greenwood company, who notified us that the inscriptions must be submitted to him. The foregoing extracts were laid before him by Mr. Wicks, who was asked to leave them to be acted upon by the board of trustees of the cemetery. At the same time Mr. Wicks was given to understand that the board would not be likely to permit the selections to be engraved on the monument.

The board was very dilatory in meeting, and the work was delayed. Mr. Sheehan, the builder, called upon Mr. Perry, the secretary. Mr. Sheehan wished to go ahead with the work. He was told by Mr. Perry that he might engrave the first side, but that most of the matter intended for the others would not be allowed to be cut. The cemetery was Christian, and must not be desecrated in this way. Mr. Sheehan then placed the monument in position, leaving the sides smooth, and the matter of inscriptions to be settled between the committee and the cemetery authorities.

Finally the board of trustees met and "resolved" that in the matter of inscription on the monument of D. M. Bennett the board could not interfere. Notice was then given by the secretary that he would like to see some one representing the builders of the monument. This notice was sent to Mrs. Bennett's brother, but he, being sick, turned it over to us. We responded in person. The interview was brief but decided. Mr. Perry is a very nice gentleman, and a good Christian. He desired to compromise. He did not want anything more about the monument to get in the papers, and disliked to hav trouble in any way. He could not speak authoritativly for the board of trustees, who alone had jurisdiction in the matter—if we persisted in putting the heretical sentiments upon the stone—but in his opinion the board would, notwithstanding the resolution, interfere. The board had power to remove any monument or erase any inscription which a majority of its members might deem offensiv. In conclusion, Mr. Perry repeated his disinclination to quarrel, and asked if the committee would not back down and not bother the trustees. If we did not, the board would hav to interfere, although Mr. Perry could not say so authoritativly.

This was altogether too one-sided to suit us. The conciliatory olive branch shaded only one of the parties. The secretary might as well hav asked us to join his church. We argued the matter with the urbane secretary, pointing out that this was not a Christian country; our laws did not recognize Christ, whatever the judges might choose to say. We urged that Mrs. Bennett and Mr. Wicks owned the lot, which was their private property, and that so long as we complied with the rules as to the setting of the monument, and it came within all the mechanical requirements, we did not think the courts of New York would sustain the trustees in any efforts to prevent the cutting of the inscription on account of its heretical sentiments; and, while we could no more speak for the committee than he could for the trustees (as four more gentlemen were associated with us), yet, if we were to express our individual opinion, it would be to the effect that the inscription, just as he saw it, would go upon the monument. This terminated the interview.

We reported to the committee. None was disposed to retreat, and our four associates, Messrs. Foote, Ryan, Putnam, and Wakeman, instructed us, as the working member, to go ahead.

By this time it was mid-winter, and the stone cutters could not work in the cold. Mr. Sheehan built a shed around the monument, at an expense to the Fund of eight dollars, he contributing the material and the laborers their time to build it. We then gave Mr. Sheehan the copy of the inscription and instructed him to proceed, which he did, and the monument now stands completed, a credit to those who hav constructed it, an honor to those who hav contributed to its erection, and a fitting memorial to him whose sentiments it records.

We hav heard nothing further from Mr. Perry or the board of trustees. The monument is built; the heretical sentiments are engraved upon it; and there the committee proposes they shall stay. If the cemetery authorities want it blown from one end of the land to the other that they are bigots; if they desire to hav their authority questioned and their jurisdiction denied through every court in New York, they will proceed to meddle with the words cut in the granit marking Mr. Bennett's resting-place. They will, however, injure themselvs and Christianity much less by submitting to the inevitable.

Where Christianity Came From.

Rarely has a more valuable book been published than Felix Oswald's "Secret of the East."* It is a flash of mirrored sunlight into the dark well of Christian mythology, and exposes at the bottom the heap of festering corruption poisoning the waters which so large a portion of humanity has drunk through many malarial centuries.

Against Christianity Mr. Oswald finds seven objections to lie with a force unshaken by all the efforts of all the theologians who hav "expounded" its mysteries or "reconciled" with science its plain and and irreconcilable inconsistencies and contradictions. These objections he puts in answer to the claim of the church that the doctrin of the New Testament is "the leaven of the moral universe, the reforming agency that has redeemed the world from vice and barbarism." No one, he says, can overlook the facts that, 1. The rise of the Christian faith corresponds with the sunset of the great south-European civilization; 2. That the zenith of its power coincides with the midnight of medieval barbarism; 3. That the decline of its influence coincides with the sunrise of a north-European civilization; 4. That all the principal victories of Freedom and Science hav been achieved in spite of the church, and in the face of her open hostility; 5. That the exponents of the Christian dogmas persist in their hostility to the progress of all reform; 6. That the worst enemies of political and intellectual liberty were firm believers in the dogmas of the New Testament; 7. That among the contemporary nations of the Christian world the most skeptical are the most civilized, while the most orthodox are the most backward in freedom, industry, and general intelligence.

But, on the other hand, continues Mr. Oswald, if the creed of the Middle Ages was a pernicious superstition, how could its exponents succeed in fastening their yoke upon so many noble and manly nations? How were they able to suppress the healthier instincts of the human race, and perpetuate their power for nearly sixteen centuries? By what baneful magic could the worst enemies of human happiness maintain themselvs upon the throne of religion and morality?

It is to the solution of these enigmas that Mr. Oswald has applied himself, and with signal success—at least, he arrives at the most rational conclusion compatible with the belief in the sanity of the human race and the acknowledgment of the fact that the world has wallowed for centuries in the grossest superstition. It is, in a word, the almost universal prevalence of Pessimism, the genesis of which he finds in ascetic Buddhism, whose most perfect type is the "brooding Hindoo," who, twenty-four hundred years ago, "retired to the hills of Barabar to meditate upon the problem of life and the origin of evil." "The hope of earthly happiness, according to the theory of Buddha Sakyamuni, is a chimera, a phantom that lures us from error to error through endless toils, and robs even the grave of its peace." The "goal of peace can be reached only by total abstinence from earthly pleasures. All worldly blessings are curses in disguise, and he alone who has lifted the veil of that disguise has entered the path of salvation. To him self-denial becomes the highest wisdom, and self-abhorrence the supreme virtue."

It is from this false and pernicious philosophy that Christianity has sprung, elaborating and making more dismal the creed that can only flourish in a sickly soil, such as Christianity found in the decaying Roman empire, and in which it developed its first germs.

First settling conclusivly that as a continuation, or second part, it is impossible to regard the New Testament in connection with the Old, Mr. Oswald shows Jesus to hav been but the successor of Buddha. In Buddhism is found tha "root-dogma which forms the connecting link" between the different doctrins taught by the New Testament. "The prophet of Nazareth was" but "a Buddhistic emissary, and preached his gospel in the name of Buddha Sakyamuni," says Mr. Oswald. Whether this be literally true or not, the resemblance between the two, as all students of comparativ mythology are well aware, is too marvelously close for a doubt to exist that the fabricators of Jesus's career were well acquainted not only with the life of Buddha and his apostle, Krishna, but with the ethical part of Buddhism. Mr. Oswald makes this clear.

The dogmas of Christianity, says our author, "were propagated with the zeal and with the disinterestedness of the purest moral enthusiasm; and yet there is no doubt that they hav caused the human race more woe than all wars, all plagues, all famins, all poisons, and all contagious diseases, and the rage of all the hostil elements of nature taken together; for it can be demonstrated with the utmost certainty of historical evidence that the darkness of the Middle Ages, and the horrors and the misery of that terrible night were the direct consequences of the faith which attempted to practice the precepts of the New Testament, and that the repressed instincts of our better nature burst their dam when the faith of the Middle Ages dissolved into skepticism, and the conventional assent that stops short of practice."

"True friendship was unknown while the denunciator of natural affection passed for a divine revelator. 'He that hateth not his father, brother,' etc., 'cannot become my disciple.' 'For if you love those that love you, what reward hav you?' Hence the zeal of the wretched bigots who delivered up their friends to the knife of the holy Inquisition, and exulted in the suppression of their better instincts."

"The doctrins of the Galilean Buddhist hav burdened the record of human misery with thousands of devastating wars. Hav they ever added one milletseed to the sum of human happiness? Did the apostles of Nazareth ever speak one word in favor of industry, of rational education, the cause of health, the love and study of nature, of physical and intellectual culture? Not one. Has he promoted our progress in the paths of science and freedom? Not one step. The phantasms of his sickly anti-naturalism hav made the world neither better nor wiser. His doctrin in all its tendencies is wholly unearthly, and therefore wholly unavailing for any secular purpose."

As for the benefit that comes from Christianity per se, Mr. Oswald has difficulty in finding any. The Reformation, however, was of incalculable good to the world because it was practically a breaking loose from the doctrins of the "Galilean Buddhist." And so far as that was accomplished, the Reformation has improved our moral status—"so much indeed that the doctrin preached from the pulpits of our Protestant churches is not Christianity, but an eclectic Bible, mixed with at least fifty per cent of purely pagan ethics. Most Methodists know that some of Wesley's doctrins are out of date; few Calvinists would like to mention certain tenets of the Geneva witch-hunter; and neither Catholic nor Old Kirk Presbyterian can doubt that the unqualified dogmas of the New Testament would circumscribe the sphere of a modern apostle by limiting his influence to the audience of a lunatic asylum."

The cause of the spread of Christianity is found by Mr. Oswald to be that "the religion of anti-naturalism appealed to the pessimistic tendency of decrepitude, and thus recommended itself to the instincts of a decrepit generation." In other words, the rotting Roman empire found in Christianity a religion whose views of life were just gloomy and dark enough to suit its decaying vision. "Worn-out senualists consoled themselvs with the hope of a better hereafter. Cowards pleased themselvs in the idea of fulfilling the duty of meek submission to injustice and 'the powers that be.' Monastic drones denounced the worldliness of industrial enterprises. Physical indolence welcomed the discovery that 'bodily exercise profiteth but little.' Envious impotence insisted on the duty of self-abasement. Transgressors against the health laws of nature relied on the efficacy of prayer-cure. Stall-fed priests sneered at the lean philosopher who wasted his time upon laborious inquiries, while he might waxed fat on faith and the sacrifices of the pious. The demon dogma was a godsend to the spiritual poverty of the elect. The so-called scholars of the Galilean church, who could not encounter the pagan philosophers on their own ground, found it very convenient to postulate a spook for every occult phenomenon."

That is how Christianity came to be adopted in the Roman empire.

The conversion of Europe to ceremonial Christianity was effected by the sword. Its poisoned philosophy was injected into the people on a spear-point. It was absorbed gradually, as a drunkard goes from cider to alcohol. "The first Galilean missionaries came in Unitarian and optimistic disguises. . . . But moral epidemics can rarely be confined to their incipient stages, and there is a curious analogy between mental and physical poison habits. The opium-eater graduates from laudanum to morphine. The victims of mental poison habits, too, prove that their vice is progressiv. Visionaries advance from hobgoblins to the personal devil. Buddha began with the deserts of Nepaul and ended with Nirvana. The asceticism of the Nazarene led from celibacy to the cross. All southern Arians ended by becoming fanatical trinitarians and persecutors of Arianism; the stronger poison prevailed; moderate absurdity had no chance against absolute nonsense. Their missionary zeal, too, increased. From synods, it rose to riots, to heretic hunts, to Jew massacres, to civil wars, to international wars, and culminated in the intercontinental warfare of the crusades. Intolerance advanced from excommunications to excoriations, from the burning of heretical books to the burning of heretics."

That is the way Europe was converted.

Christianity has been an expensiv creed to the world. The dogmas of the church "hav cost the world three million square miles of lands, which once were the garden spots of this earth, but which hav been turned into deserts by the neglect of rational agriculture and the influence of a creed which labored to withdraw the attention of mankind from secular to post-mortem concernments. 'The fairest and fruitfullest provinces of the Roman empire,' says Prof. Marsh, 'precisely that portion of terrestrial surface, in short, which, about the commencement of the Christian era, was endowed with the greatest superiority of soil, climate, and position, which had been carried to the highest pitch of physical improvement, is now completely exhausted of its fertility. A territory larger than all Europe, the abundance of which sustained in bygone centuries a population scarcely inferior to that of the whole Christian world at the present day, has been entirely withdrawn from human use, or, at best, is thinly inhabited. . . . There are regions where the operation of causes, set in action by man, has brought the face of the earth to a desolation almost as complete as that of the moon; and, though within that brief space of time which we call "the historical period," they are known to hav been covered with luxuriant woods, verdant pastures, and fertil meadows, they are now too far deteriorated to be reclaimable by man, nor can they become again fitted for his use except through great geological changes, or other agencies, over which we hav no control. . . . Another era of equal improvidence would reduce this earth to such a condition of impoverished productivness as to threaten the depravation, barbarism, and, perhaps, even the extinction of the human species.'"

"Christianity has retarded the progress of the human race by at least fifteen hundred years. The fruits of science and social reform, which our descendants will reap in fifteen centuries hence, might be enjoyed at the present moment if the last sixty generations had not wasted their time in disputes about the interpretation of idiotic dogmas, and the attempt to gain the heaven of a future world by despising the blessings of the present."

The night of the Middle Ages lasted to the beginning of the sixteenth century. With the revival of rationalism at that time began the decadence of Christianity, and it is to this decadence the world owes its present civilization. We should like to quote Mr. Oswald's strong language on this and other points, but space prevents. The book ought to be read and circulated wherever there is a Christian. It cannot fail to do a world of good.

Chainey's Lecture on Ingersoll and His Teachings.

Arrangements hav been made whereby Chainey's Sunday evening lectures will be free to all. The object of these lectures is to break the way for the noblest and highest form of Liberal ideas. These ideas are representativ of what is called the "Modern Spirit." Indefinitly they pervade the thought and feeling of vast masses of people to-day. The old creeds hav forever lost their power. The new thought and purpose and broad ideals that are now latent in the scientific conception must be brought forth and made a living and defined and conscious element in the moral and intellectual advance of man. Hence the need, both in press and on the platform, of the constant expression of Liberal truths. Is it not the duty and privilege of those who hav been pioneers in overthrowing the errors of the past to help build up the future of humanity by the promulgation of those conceptions of nature and life which are so precious to us and so necessary to the happiness of the world? So these Sunday evening lectures—the beginning, we hope, of a great movement for the Liberal cause—should be amply sustained in every way by the Freethinkers of this city.

The subject for next Sunday evening's lecture is a most fruitful one, dealing as it does with a representativ man, who by force of genius and the requirements of the age occupies a pivotal position in the immense changes that are now passing over the world. No one can more fully express the power of Ingersoll than Chainey, both with eloquent words and comprehensiv thought. Let there be a generous effort to fill the house next Sunday evening. Let every Liberal make a personal effort to advertise the meeting. Besides the lecture there will be good music furnished for the occasion. Remember time and place—Sunday evening, eight o'clock, German Masonic Hall, 220 E. Fifteenth street (Liberal Club rooms).

Retribution to be Meted Out.

The perpetrators of the outrage upon the Corning, Ohio, druggist hav been arrested. The priest was held in eight hundred dollars bail, and his fanatical tools in larger sums. McDevitt, the victim, was found alive. He proposes to remain in Corning, dispensing drugs, and will prosecute all who contributed to his sufferings.

This is good news. The Catholics must be taught that the person of a priest is no more sacred than any one else, and that a spiritual dictator cannot in this country become a temporal authority and punish his enemies after the style of the Spanish Inquisition, with modifications suggested by the different climates.

No God of Mercy.

No doubt, everybody has heard of the great flood which is now sweeping everything before it along the Ohio and Mississippi valley; destroying millions of dollars' worth of property, and bringing poverty, want, sickness, sorrow, pain, and death to many a poor soul.

I not only wish to speak of this great disaster, but of some few others much worse, which hav visited man within the past half century or so.

This flood, bad as it is, is but a bubble to compare with some others that hav occurred within the past half century. Then there are other calamities much worse, which I wish to call the attention of the reader to. We read accounts of these things, but how soon they are forgotten, until we are reminded of them by having them brought upon ourselvs.

We will now review some of these floods. In 1813, by a flood in Silesia, 6,000 people lost their lives. In 1833, by a flood in Canton, China, 1,000 lives were lost. In 1842, at St. Domingo, 5,000 more. In 1872, by a flood in Syria, 1,500 more perished. In 1876, a storm wave, which swept over Bengal, drowned 90,000 persons. In 1879, by a flood in Hungary, about 6,000 persons were drowned, 16,000 cattle and horses, and 90,000 sheep, and about 12,000 houses were destroyed; the value of the property destroyed was more than $5,000,000. In 1877, the volcano Cotopax had an eruption that destroyed, by an upheaval of water, 1,000 persons. A flood on the Mississippi, last June, destroyed crops to the amount of $1,000,000. A flood in Italy, last September, destroyed many lives and a great amount of property.

I hav reviewed some of the big floods that hav swept down on the human race and destroyed more than 110,000 souls in the past seventy years; and yet I doubt if this number will any more than half cover the amount of lives destroyed by floods in this time. But this is nothing to be compared to the loss of life by earthquakes and volcanic eruptions. Let us review some of these for the past few years. In 1815, the volcano Tamboro, in the island of Sumbawa, destroyed all of its population of 12,000 except 26 persons.

In 1822	earthquake	in Aleppo	destroyed	30,000
" 1850	"	at Naples	"	6,000
" 1851	"	in Italy	"	14,000
" 1857	"	" "	"	22,000
" 1859	"	at Quito, Peru	"	5,000
" 1861	"	" Mandoza	"	7,000
" 1863	"	" Philippine Island	"	10,000
" 1868	"	in Peru	"	25,000
" 1879	"	" Persia	"	1,000
" 1881	"	" Scio	"	8,000
" 1883	"	" Island of Ischia	"	2,000
" 1883	"	at Asia Minor	"	57
and rendered 14,678 homeless.
" 1883	volcano	in Java	"	100,000.

Here are more than 242,000 lives lost by earthquakes and volcanoes that I hav accounts of in the past sixty-eight years, and it is quite likely I hav not collected more than half of them.

Now let us examin some of the disasters to human life by famin and pestilence. In 1876 cholera broke out in Bengal, after the great storm wave had destroyed 90,000 people, and took 75,000 more. In 1878–9, by famin and small-pox in Brazil, and in the surrounding country, about 800,000 people died. In 1880 by famin in Turkey, 2,000 died. In 1878 yellow fever in the South took 12,000. In India (some two years ago I think it was) 20,000 persons died of cholera while returning from a religious fair. In 1883 cholera in Egypt carried off 27,000. In India, a few years ago, more than 1,000,000 died of starvation; and in Asia, a few years ago, 5,000,000 people starved; committed murder and suicide, to prevent starvation. The famin was caused by the drouth, and the drouth by the general destruction of the forest. Here we find a destruction of 1,536,000 more.

Now let us look at some of the big fires that hav been burning people up. In 1863 by the burning of the Cathedral at Santiago, Chili, 2,500 lost their lives. In 1876, by the burning of Brooklyn theater, 285. In 1881, by the burning of a theater in Vienna, Austria, 1,000 more lost their lives.

Now if we were to review all the fires of the cities and of the prairies, and count up the loss of life in this way, it would amount to many thousands more. Many people lose their lives every year by cyclones and tornadoes. One that visited the East Indies in 1864 destroyed 60,000 lives; and another in 1876 destroyed 215,000 more.

Hundreds of vessels are lost at sea every year, and thousands of lives.

There are about 1,000 lives lost every year by railroad accidents in this country alone, and more than 1,000 murders are committed. On June 16, 1883, about 200 children were trampled to death in a hall, during a panic, in Sunderland, England.

Many millions of dollars are spent every year to support the armies and navies of the world, for the purpose of killing people.

In Peru two years ago, on the battle-field where the decisiv battle of the war was fought, might hav been seen twelve thousand dead soldiers, eight thousand of whom were left unburied, to rot on the top of the ground.

The historian Sully tells us that seventy-five thousand people were massacred on St. Bartholomew's Day in France by the Catholics, who were led by their priests.

The historian Burke estimates the number slain in battle and in other ways by man since the world began to be thirty-six millions.

Mr. A. R. Conklin lectured in New York city Dec. 17, 1883, and exhibited a stereoscopic view of a Mexican stone on which sixty thousand lives hav been sacrificed in religious rites.

Now, dear reader, I wish to know how you can look upon all this needless slaughter of human life and then tell me there is a good and wise God that governs and controls all things. If there be a God, he must be the worst kind of a fiend that can be imagined if he can prevent these things and will not. Look at the horrible crimes that are being committed every day; drunken and brutal husbands murder their wives and children. Some of the best men the world ever knew, such as Lincoln and Garfield, hav been murdered, and no God to stay the hand of the assassin, nor to save the life of Garfield when a whole nation prayed for his recovery. Look at the horrible crime of the murder of little Mabel Young in the church tower in God's own house by the religious fiend, Piper. And also Charles F. Freeman, of Pocasset, Mass., who took his little girl, only five years old, out of bed while asleep and plunged a knife into her heart, for the purpose of sacrificing her to the Lord, as he said.

Does God approve of these things, or is he deaf, dumb, and blind to all cries to him for help? It does look that way, as he never helps those that need his help the most. Look upon the vessel being dashed to pieces on the rocks, while men, women, and children are clinging to frozen rigging, praying to Almighty God for deliverance which never comes. Thousands of men are executed or banished to Siberia every year, there to die from starvation or cruel treatment at the hands of those heartless tyrants who hav them in charge—and for no crime except a clamor for their rights.

In England and Wales there are more than five thousand children under thirteen years of age employed in the coal mines, there to eke out a miserable life in poverty and ignorance while their employers revel in wealth and luxury on the lives of these poor children. And yet I am told there is a good God that watches the fall of every sparrow to the ground and tempers the wind to the shorn lamb. I am told he is the creator of all things, and that all are for some good.

Let us see. He has created the innocent little dove, and then the owl with eyes so he can see in the night to catch and devour him.

He has created the innocent little lamb, and then the ugly wolf to devour him. He has given us the domestic fowl, and then made the hawk and the fox to destroy them. He has given us the horse and cattle, and then made the lion, the tiger, and leopard to destroy them. He has made man, and then made beasts, serpents, reptils, and poisonous insects by the millions to kill and poison us to death. He has given us lands to cultivate, and then filled them with useless weeds, thistles, and thorns. He has given us fruit and vegetables, and then sends grasshoppers, bugs, and worms by the millions to destroy them.

A scientist estimates that the annual destruction to crops by insects will average $100,000,000. The governor of Minnesota a few years ago issued a proclamation for a day of fasting and prayer to rid the state of the grasshoppers, which were devastating everything, but it did not stop them.

God has made man, and then made the summers hot enough to burn him to death, and the winters cold enough to freeze him to death. He has made us to toil hard all day for a mere existence, and then given us the musketoes and bugs to eat us up while we sleep at night. He has made us, and then made more than two thousand diseases which we are subject to. He sends floods to drown us, cyclones to destroy us, and volcanoes and earthquakes to swallow us up by the millions, and givs us swamps filled with malaria to make us sick. He has created seventy thousand lazy, useless, idle, ignorant, superstitious priests and ministers, in this country alone, that we hav to support—not them alone, but their families, at a cost of some $200,000,000 a year. We hav had to pay for some $800,000,000 church property, the most of which goes untaxed, which makes the burden of the people so much the harder.

But my Christian friends ask, "What would you do with all the priests and ministers?" I would set them to work to earn an honest living. The churches I would convert into school-houses, colleges, and halls of science and art, and hav them free to all. The $200,000,000 that now go to support the church should pay for these things, which would educate every child, and giv him a knowledge of the world and himself, which would soon do away with crowned heads, lords and masters, poverty and crime, and place all men on an equal footing.

Under the name of religion men hav been kept in poverty and ignorance, and hav been murdered by the millions.

If we could blot out all Bibles, religions, and creeds, and teach only the practical knowledge of the world; if reason and common sense could take the place of ignorance and superstition, and man could learn to rely on self, instead of looking to God for help, much of the suffering of the world could be avoided. When man learns that everything that takes place comes from natural causes, and that no God has any control over it, he will be much better off.

The Tariff Question.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I hav been more amused than instructed by your reply to your Kansas correspondent on the effect of a tariff on the American farmer. For sixty years I hav been an earnest advocate of a protectiv tariff, and my main object has been the incalculable benefit it confers on agriculture—being one of that class myself at present, and having always had its interests more at heart than all other interests put together. Now, if I hav been so long under a delusion in this matter, as many others hav been in regard to traditional superstitions, I shall be very grateful to you for opening my eyes to a correct view of the subject. I regard you as a skilful eye-opener on many important matters; but on a tariff it is barely possible that you may need to hav your own eyes opened—more especially to the effect of a tariff in building up a vast and prosperous agriculture in these United States.

What the farmer most needs is a good, steady, and reliable market for all he has to sell. Thanks to the fostering influence of a protectiv tariff in planting around him near his own door millions of well-paid toilers who need ninety-two per cent of all he can raise, and who are able and willing to pay a fair price for it. The foreign market takes only eight per cent of our produce, and if we could count everything—veal, lamb, chickens, eggs, fresh brook, river, and lake fish, fresh ripe fruit of all kinds, fresh vegetables and flowers, to say nothing of the millions of cans of fresh milk consumed in our cities; yes, if we counted everything that could not be preserved with salt, or by any other means, so as to bear a long sea voyage, I am persuaded that less than one per cent of all our vast and varied productions are now sent abroad. Turkish and Russian wheat is to-day only a dollar a bushel in England—a beautiful market, indeed, for the farmers of this great and growing republic to depend on!

The smaller the number of farmers in any community compared to those engaged in other pursuits the better for the interests of agriculture. Here in Pennsylvania we hav only twenty-one per cent of our population engaged in farming. The other seventy-nine per cent furnish us the best market in the world for everything we are able to produce. This permanent home market has been fostered and built up by the beneficent operations of a wise system of protectiv duties on foreign imports. Of course every intelligent American farmer exclaims, "Blessed be the tariff, and palsied be the hand that would tear it down or impair its efficacy." And they will be heard at the ballot box.

In the state of New York only twenty per cent of your population are farmers, and in Massachusetts only nine per cent, which accounts for the general thrift of agriculture in those states. Can it be that the farmers in those states are so blind to their own welfare as to tear down the bridge over which they hav passed from poverty, while depending on a precarious foreign market, to their present condition of independence with the best market on this planet near at hand? No, sir; it cannot be. I hav too much faith in Yankee intelligence to believe that.

In eastern Pennsylvania I know of no free traders among the farmers, and hav no fears of ever meeting with one, be he Democrat or Republican. We think we understand our own interests too well for that. We are not quite docil enough to permit you to cut our throats with "a pocketknife brought over from Sheffield, England," while we can buy a better and a cheaper one made in this country, and hav the maker to consume such of our garden truck as cannot be sent to Sheffield, and also to assist us farmers in paying our taxes and in sustaining our district schools.

In looking around, the farmer here sees that nearly everything he needs is made by his home customers neater, better, and cheaper than the imported article. I might quote authorities and giv statistics to prove this, but I do not think it will be disputed, and I am reluctant to occupy very much of your space. Place all the farmers on one side of the globe and all the artisans on the other side, with the broad Atlantic between them. That would be free trade run to seed. How do you like it?

One word on a tariff for revenue alone, which would be the most unequal and unjust systems of taxation that could be devised. Under it a poor laboring man with a large family would pay ten times as much tax on some articles as a rich man with no children. It would smoke with iniquity and all manner of abominations. No; let us abolish all custom-houses, and depend on a fair, equal, and direct tax on all kinds of property, real and personal, or hold on to a tariff which has made us the greatest and most prosperous nation that ever existed.

Letters from Friends.

DURAND, ILL., Feb. 13, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed five dollars, for which you will giv me credit—your paper for another year, and a copy of your ALMANAC, and the balance use as you see fit.

Yours respectfully, DAVID P. CAMPBELL.

[Thanks, Brother Campbell. We will use the balance to send out extra TRUTH SEEKERS to such people as we may learn of who need enlightenment.—ED. T. S.]

CHARMING DALE, ARIZONA, Jan. 27, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I hav long been struggling against turbulent winds and waves of adversity, so that I am a long way in arrears for my paper, but I can now spare $5, which I inclose. I hav taken THE TRUTH SEEKER from the first copy published at Paris, Ill., and I appreciate its excellence and usefulness as few others can. To express fully my appreciation of its rise and progress, and its publishers, with its many contributors, would occupy more space than would be profitable. Every part has always been replete with powerful blows for the destruction of the most damaging myths and humbugs that ever infested the world. And in its late managers it has lost none of its original powers, but has added much refinement and great improvement to its brilliant pages.

S. C. ROGERS.

NEWPORT, ME., Feb. 26, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: In your issue of February 23d is an article on the prohibition question, by "S. R. S.," which I read with great interest, and then wrote on the margin of the paper opposit the article: "This letter is worth the cost of the paper a year."

And I heartily and truly thank you for printing that article. My only regret is that the author did not giv the full name. It is a production that any one ought to be proud of. To every word I respond an earnest amen.

The article by W. W. Hazard entitled "Prohibition Logic" is full of good sense, and so is John Warr's, and I am proud of such good, common-sense men, and hail them as brothers and true men in the grand work of regenerating the world—not on the John Calvin plan of force, but by the all-powerful weapons of reason and common sense.

I also wish to say that THE TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL is a beautiful production, and ought to be in tens of thousands of families. "Big Jack Small's" logic is unanswerable.

SEWARD MITCHELL.

EASTFORK, MON., Jan. 30, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: For fear of having my paper stopped, as my subscription is nearly up, I thought of writing and asking you to hav a little patience, as I would do without your paper no sooner than grub. I would remit at once if I could, and also send for a few books, but will not be able to do so before April, when I am going after supplies either to Buffalo, Wyoming, or Miles, Montana—the latter probably, as it is a little the nearest. I am engaged in building a new ranche for a cattle firm. The nearest post-office is Powderville, thirty-five miles from here. It is not a money-order office, and so I will hav to wait; but you can couut on me as a life subscriber. Although I am but a laboring-man, and cannot as well afford as a good many so-called Liberals to subscribe to the Monument Fund, still I am going to send you a couple of dollars for that purpose.

The Liberals should not hav too many irons in the fire at once for fear of getting some of them burnt. I am willing to assist the Liberal movement tooth and nail as much as I am able.

GUS. HOGAN.

CLEVELAND, O., Feb. 17, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Our League is constantly increasing in membership, and more interest is being felt in its meetings than at any time since our organization.

Mr. J. H. Burnham lectured here two weeks ago on the "Despotic Influence of Climate on Religion;" J. D. Mallonee, one week ago, on "The Soul and its Immortality," to large and appreciativ audiences. Mr. Mallonee is going to start soon on a lecture trip through Indiana, speaking at Elkhart the 24th, and at other places later. Mr. Mallonee is a young and talented advocate of the cause of Materialism, and in him it will find an able champion.

One of the indications of the advance of Freethought is the favorable comments on our lectures and meetings by the press of this city.

Representativs of our League attended the Linesville Paine Anniversary celebration, and report that they were highly entertained and edified by the brilliant speeches and the other exercises of the occasion.

May the day soon come when the people of America will giv the tribute of honor to the memory of that great man.

W. I. IRVINE.

LA CRESCENT, MINN., Feb. 19, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I hav received the last two numbers but not your bill; please send it. I cannot bear, for one moment, to needlessly "dead beat" it, or any one who tries as hard as you to turn things right.

Happy was I when I saw the first copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER; and happier would I hav been to-day had I made its acquaintance earlier. God-speed to your paper—not the Christian God-speed—but a genuin God-speed, not a fraudulent sentiment from an Almighty mover, no heaven controling impostor, but from a lover of "truth, what ever it be."

Happier will I be when westward the Freethought empire shall hav taken its weary way, and it is not professional death to a champion of truth and right to openly giv vent to his honest conviction. We need a few more Paines, Bennetts, Underwoods, Reynoldses, and Putnams throughout the country. We need a power to shake the cast-iron bond of faith in the trinity. Let us work and wait—mainly work—and we will hav our reward. It does me good to read the letters from all parts of the world, from those who love truth more than church fashion, and who are willing to assure us in our faith that we, the few scattering Infidels, though seemingly sown broadcast over this broad expanse, are not the only ones who do not bow down to the few who threaten us with professional death when we first express a thought antagonistic to their faith. Just continue to inspect the "unchangeable word of Constantine," and let the church suffer for any discrepencies. More anon, D. C. ALBERT.

ORLANDO, FLA., Jan. 6, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose $1 for THE TRUTH SEEKER. I regret allowing it to stop. I hav read and re-read, given away, and loaned to best advantage possible. There is no book, paper, or writing of any kind that I read in preference to THE TRUTH SEEKER. I am now a lifetime subscriber, and will use my influence for it. If the old Salvation Army rises up against it, I will fight them. I am disgusted with orthodoxy and superstition. I would rid my house of the old Bible, and everything pertaining to it, if it were not for my wife. I am in favor of woman's rights, so I must be Liberal. I will surely vote or fight (if necessary) to separate church and state. There are quite a number of Liberals here, but they appear rather cowardly (I don't blame them much), for orthodoxy is ruling to the extent that if a man speaks boldly he is threatened with insanity and the asylum.

A clerk in our post-office told me that a person who would take, read, and believe in THE TRUTH SEEKER ought to be sent to the asylum. I told him I was a fit subject. Can't you influence an able gentleman or lady to come among us and lecture? there is quite a field open here. There are many like myself very anxious to hav them, but financially too weak to offer much encouragement. I examined the literature sent me for children, and I do highly appreciate it. I distribute it among my friends with a view of getting up a Liberal sabbath-school; I believe we will organize a school. Wishing THE TRUTH SEEKER a large circulation, and the National Liberal League a grand success, I bid you take courage.

Respectfully yours, JAMES C. PARKER.

CHICAGO, ILL., January 1, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: It has been two years since I first had the pleasure of grasping the best of all papers published, THE TRUTH SEEKER. I am indeed thankful, for my children's benefit, that I hav learned to know how to guide them in the path of Freethought. Had I not been fortunate enough to be the possessor of this valuable paper, my mind would never hav been so far. I feel perfectly at home on any spot on this earth. I feel free to speak my sentiments to any church-member or pretending Christian, and do it conscientiously. I am a free man, and it is surprising to me to hear well-educated men talk and preach from the Bible, undertaking to prove the existence of a God, the creator of this earth out of nothing. If such skye poodles could giv proof of what they preach, we would gladly accept it. To go back of this God, I inquire from whence he came. They twist their "physiog" into as many different forms as a circus clown, and with a shrug of the shoulder answer, "Oh, we are not to question his time of existence, or from whence he came."

Such a class of contemptible drones, to be supported in luxury, to stand in the pulpits Sunday after Sunday hooting the same tune from the same book that has been pushed into the throats of superstitious fools for the past eighteen hundred years! Look at the corruption of our country, and then ask, What has religion done for us? Robert G. Ingersoll, D. M. Bennett, and hundreds of others, are worth to the people of the United States more than all the churches and preachers combined.

While I liv I shall endeavor to read THE TRUTH SEEKER. It is the Bible of our family. My wife is equally interested, also my children. Yours truly, PARKER WINEMAN.

ST. CATHARINE'S, CAN., Feb. 18, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I see in the February 2d number of THE TRUTH SEEKER a paragraph from Fresno, Cal., signed "George Paddington," taking exception to my declaration that alcoholic liquor is the greatest curse that ever befell the human race. I find on referring to the original that my expression is one of the greatest curses, etc., which would require no other proof than common observation to substantiate. The expression became exchanged, accidentally, I presume. Notwithstanding, the printed expression would be admissible from an orthodox standpoint.

I know not Mr. Paddington's object in referring to the matter, except it was for the purpose of making public his antipathy to the (so called) Christian churches, and to sound me upon that subject. If so, I can say, in short, that I require no assistance in giving my views upon orthodoxy; which are, that I hav no sympathy whatever with anything pertaining to it in any manner, and never had, from my cradle up; nor hav I the least fear of "Mother Grundy" in saying it.

As to the extent of the curse and misery that intoxicating liquors hav produced, and are producing, throughout the world, very few, in my opinion, are aware of it. From my reading and investigation I came to the conclusion, a long time ago, that nineteen-twentieths of all the wars yet produced on this earth, so-called Christianity is answerable for; and as I understand the operations and tactics of wars, so far back as we hav any account of them, they hav been manipulated almost wholly with intoxicating liquors; and I go still further with my opinion, which is, that the majority of the sacrifice of all human life, in any form whatsoever, so far back as alcohol was first produced and used as a beverage, has been done under the influence of intoxicating liquors; therefore, I, as an individual, hav a right to believe that spirituous liquors hav directly produced more real misery and degradation even than orthodox superstition.

But be that as it may, I see no call for controversy in the matter. The cursed curse exists, and, as I said before, all the moralizing and legislation that can be produced will not remove it so long as it is allowed to be manufactured in any form that will intoxicate. But who can devise a way to prohibit its mannfacture, short of positiv prohibition? I can't. The only thing I can see is to leave it alone. The excessiv use of it may serve in a degree to prevent over-population of a class that might be dispensed with without any injury to the respectable portion of mankind. I hold views adverse to the procreation of human beings regardless of numbers, and that any legislation that would stipulate the number, under penalty, to each parent in accordance with the means they hav for feeding, clothing, and educating their progeny, to become when arrived at maturity ornaments in society, instead of, when in excess, beggars, murderers, thieves, robbers, and criminals of all kinds, as is more or less the case all over the world, would be wise.

I am quite aware that many will think that such views upon human procreation are very peculiar and would be restrictiv of human liberty, but, when properly considered, I ask, What earthly right has your neighbor or mine, without any visible means of support, to bring forth and turn upon the streets human beings to come up of themselvs and always be a curse to every one they may come in contact with? We would not submit to over-production in other species; then why in the human? "Progress and improvement in all things" is my motto. Respectfully, C. B. THOMPSON.

QUARTZBURG, IDAHO TER., Feb. 4, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I hope you will remember the offer our truth loving neighbor, A. G. Church, has made in regard to establishing a Freethought institute, and call the attention of other Liberals to the importance and advantage it would be to our cause if the Liberals would establish a savings bank, and elect R. G. Ingersoll or some other honest man to the presidency of the same. It seems to me that one leading bank of that kind would be just what the friends of progress need; through it from time to time we could learn our strength (money is power). Surely there are Freethinkers enough in America to make it a grand success, if their attentions were once called to the importance of the matter. If the proper steps are taken by a few leaders, thousands will flock to their support.

You able writers should show up to the masses of Liberals that it is for each and everyone's self-interest to place their power in a position where it can be used to the greatest advantage. Surely they can very easily be made to see that no great work can be accomplished without co-operation; and also that they must build and support schools and colleges, where the truth can be promulgated.

And there should be a charitable institute in every state in the union, where our Freethought warriors can sit in safety, and hurl the shot of truth into the ranks of our enemies, as long as they are able to wield a pen; or until the enemy is converted from their superstitious nonsense. Since Dr. J. L. York made his lecturing tour through this section, we notice that the hypocritical gospel pedlers hav but little to say to any one except their dupes. Quite likely they are afraid that we Liberals will induce him to come again, and thus destroy their business entirely. The Liberals of this coast are proud of J. L York, and hope his voice will be heard all over the land. He says he intends to make a tour of all the territories this year, and will be glad to hear from any Freethinkers that wish his services. May all truth lovers giv him hearty support, and I will pledge my word that they will never regret it.

GALESBURG, ILL., Feb. 15, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Brother A. Wood has closed his inquiry, "Has a man an immortal soul?" Whether a man is a soul, or has a soul, we will not discuss. The Greek will tell you a man, a horse, or a mule is a soul; and the revivalist will tell you if you don't join his church you will lose your soul.

I presume, from what Brother Wood says, he means, Has a man another existence after his corporeal body is dead? This he denies, and has written considerable in order to refute the idea, and to answer or reply to all his points would be too lengthy; therefore, I will confine my remarks to a few points in his closing argument. He finds fault with what Paul says on the subject, and quotes him thus: "When he says every seed has its own body; then, 'Thou sowest not that body that shall bear grain, it may chance of wheat or some other grain.'" Brother Wood says this is too obscure and general to say just what he did mean; but that if he says there is a chance for wheat to bear oats or any other grain, "I refuse to stand sponsor to the declaration. I deny that any God ever changed one grain into another or sowed one body natural and raised a spiritual body out of it."

As for Paul, this is not a correct quotation. A Freethinker should not misquote an author, notwithstanding his views may be wrong, but use him as he is, not change him and then use him; neither should a Freethinker advocate a position that makes it necessary to misquote or misrepresent in order to sustain it.

Brother Wood denies man is dual or double in his existence. I will first say Paul's illustration was a correct one. Brother Wood commences with Paul's qualification to what he had expressed, and to me it relieves the embarrassment of not knowing what he meant. My position is that not only man (who is compound in his make-up), but all existing things are dual, commencing with the origin of existence—spirit and matter (which are eternal in their duration). Matter constitutes substance, spirit constitutes life, and life constitutes motion; and the life of a thing is an essential part; so is the corporeal and physical part equally necessary in physical existence—the same as is reproduction the dual of male and female. In a stalk of corn the dual is the same. There is a dual is in every seed and kernel by which it reproduces its like. The life of each seed or kernel leaves the kernel or shell, concentrating its force or power through the stalk, forming a new body, the origin of which lay incased in the kernel, and (as Paul says) dies and passes into the earth, and a new body is the result arising from the life in the kernel. As everything has a life suited to its nature and condition which is an essential of its existence; and as for the life of man, to leave a mortal body and enters a spiritual body, which lay in embryo, is no more a miracle than the growing of a grass-blade, a rose-blossom, or to change a grub to a butterfly.

Here I will call Brother Wood's attention to an article not long since written by myself upon the question, "Does the the grave end all?" published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, where he will find (notwithstanding he has labored hard to prove man is not superior to an animal) man is set forth in his proper place—the crown, the ultimate, and the heir to all the existing kingdoms; a creature of education and progress. Not so with the animal. A pig knows as much as a hog. Not so with an infant. It only knows what it learns. A horse, a dog, and the beaver knew just as much a thousand years ago as now, while man has advanced in knowledge and understanding. This is a part and portion of his being; and all we ask of Brother Wood, Brother Walker, and other limitarians, is that they giv their consent that man shall enjoy all those rights and privileges which he is heir to.

I now ask, Why do Materialists and Spiritualists call each fools and knaves when on this question? They should treat each other with brotherly kindness. There is but little difference between them. There is an excuse for such conduct among the sects that believe in a jealous God; it is a natural result. But such treatment should not exist among us. What would a Spiritualist gain should he exchange his anticipation of future happiness for the expectation of annihilation, worthless when reached, if true? And what would a Materialist lose should he exchange his expectation of nothing for the anticipation of future happiness, worth all on earth when reached, if true? The anticipation of man's condition being made better is a want in nature, and to tell a man this want will be supplied when all sensation ceases to exist is an insult to his good sense. ISAAC PADEN.

MR. EDITOR: My object in writing this is for the benefit of anyone who feels inclined to profit thereby. There is a good field here for a good physician, but I don't think any but a first-class, progressiv one would hav any business locating here. Anyone wanting any further information can address me, and I will be glad to tell them what I know regarding the above. W. J. SKIDMORE.

WAVERLY, N. Y., Feb. 25, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: In the death of Mr. Charles Dickson, on the 1st inst., the Liberals hav lost a true friend, and THE TRUTH SEEKER a willing supporter. He was a stanch Liberal, outspoken and honest in his opinion, and not afraid to express his sentiments, no matter who was by. He was in love with THE TRUTH SEEKER, and has told me that he intended to take it as long as he lived, and he did. He leaves a wife and daughter in good circumstances. If I was capable I would write up a little notice for your readers, but as writing is out of my line of business I shall not try. NEWEL WEST.

RICHFIELD, MICH., Feb. 21, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I see by the tab on my cherished and most valuable paper, THE TRUTH SEEKER, that it is time for me to remit. There are superstitious people here as in all other places. The sky-pilots, or divines, as they are pleased to call themselvs, are getting up quite a sensation, inducing all the idiots to believe or be damned. For my part, I cannot see how any sensible or intelligent person can read the Bible without being entirely convinced of its plain contradictions, but the worship of that old bloody and obscene book, that no child should ever be allowed to read, let alone be taught to worship, continues!

With many good wishes, I am a friend to the cause you advocate, MRS. ROSA HALE.

BUCYRUS, OHIO, Feb. 15, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find twenty-five cents, for which send me THE TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL. I moved here about a year ago. It is a great place for churches and church-going people! But a close observer soon finds in their folds a good many sheep in wolve's clothing. Our sanctified Methodist minister lately accomplished a great miracle. A short time ago he inspired by his earnest, fervent prayers, one of the sisters of his flock to such a degree that she made him a donation of a $1,000 bond to pay his debts and help him along in his good works. But when, soon after, her husband got wind of it, she repented it, and the good shepherd was compelled to refund the money. I find but very few Liberals here, and THE TRUTH SEEKER is a real blessing to me. I could not get along without it. C. NUESSLE.

PROVIDENCE, Feb. 17, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I hav read many articles in THE TRUTH SEEKER bearing on the solution of the universe, and also hav had numerous discussions on the same.

I believe most scientists agree that matter in motion is an eternal fact. Then why look for a cause beyond this fact? Can an eternal fact hav a cause? I don't see the necessity of it. A cause must be before the effect which it causes, although in many instances a cause occurs so nearly simultaneous with the effect the difference is imperceptible.

It is claimed by some that matter of itself is innate, unless there is life to cause it to move, and this life is only to be found in certain substances called germs or germ-cells; that men are evolved from such germs.

I may not hav a correct idea of what matter means, but to my mind matter includes everything that exists, however coarse or fine, visible or invisible. If the life-germ is composed of substance, however intangible, it is something, and therefore belongs to matter, and may be considered a condensed form of the same eternal fact—matter in motion.

I think it is the total incapacity of man to comprehend eternity that causes him to look for a cause for an eternal fact. Hence arises the theory of a great and infinit intelligence in the universe bearing a sort of parental relation to man.

If we had the telescopic power of mind to read and understand the universe, I believe we would discover endless intelligences, each manifold greater than the next inferior. But then, what relation would these bear to our intelligences any more than ours' do to those below us? What man would claim parental relation to all the ants, or bedbugs, or cockroaches, or other vermin? W. P. BLYTHE.

CLARK STATION, CAL., Feb. 7, 284.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $6.50, which you will use as directed.

Now, Mac, what do you think? to-morrow I leave here for Mariposa on snow-shoes. The snow right here in the valley is seven feet deep. Five miles from here on the summit it is fifteen feet. Pretty good undertaking for a man 61 years old. I hav put off going for two reasons; one, for two men to get money to subscribe for your paper, and the other to hav it stop snowing. As soon as the roads are open I will do all I can for you and the paper. Not long since two of us went to a Methodist preacher to buy each of us a load of barley, both having six-horse teams; and it being customary to feed men while on the farm, and we having to sew the sacks, dinner being announced, he asked a blessing running thus: "Heavenly father, nourish a portion of this food to the use of our bodies. I am in a hurry, and I know you are. Amen." He did not want to keep us over night. WM. R. VANCAMPEN.

ROCHESTER, N. H., Feb. 15, E.M. 284.

MR. EDITOR: Within please find one dollar, for which you will please send me one dozen copies "False Claims" and a FREETHINKERS' ALMANAC.

Sunday would be no day of rest for me without the glorious old TRUTH SEEKER, although I hav read it but two years. It is a matter of necessity with me. I think it is to be regretted very much that it is not more extensivly circulated throughout New England. I can assure you there is a vast amount of Freethought timber here; it only wants a little stimulus, a little more popularity, and it will thin out our churchgoers most wonderfully. Even now there are churches without priest or congregation, and I hope to liv to see more of them. I am going to try and do more in the future than I hav in the past for the old banner. The "False Claims" I want for distribution among the hardshells. I think it the grandest production for missionary work that I ever read. It givs old orthodoxy something to chew upon, even if they are not honest enough to acknowledge it. Wishing you and THE TRUTH SEEKER all happiness and prosperity, I remain

Yours for Freethought and reform, E. J. F.

DELAWARE, OHIO, Feb. 29, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: It is but a short time since I first knew that there was such a grand and noble paper as THE TRUTH SEEKER. I am not one of your subscribers, but intend to be. I am a Freethinker from the top of my head to the sole of my foot. I am now fifty-four years of age, and of all that I hav ever read concerning religion, yours suits me far the best. In my estimation it is true; and what can excel the truth? Your paper is nobly named. In my youth I started out in search of truth by joining the Methodist Episcopal church, and tried with all my might, mind, and strength to believe the Christian religion, but could not. I soon discovered that the Bible was untrue, and did not harmonize with the laws of nature, which are without any doubt immutable. We read in the Bible, it is not by bread alone that man shall liv. If faith is meant in this scripture to fill the place of bread. I think faith is to much like cheap boarding. Perhaps it would be well enough to state what cheap boarding consists of. Cheap boarding is to eat nothing for breakfast, warm it up for dinner, go to bed before supper, and there will be a little left for the next day. I know several Freethinkers in our city, and will do all I can to circulate your reading matter, and hope by so doing to promote your most noble and grand cause of truth and justice. It is manna to all who are in search of right and true light. You may expect to hear from me again.

Yours truly, S. E. PADDOCK.

FRANKLIN CITY, Feb. 26, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Being a constant reader of your valuable paper for the past three months, I cannot speak too highly of the great TRUTH SEEKER. I will endeavor, in my humble way, to drop you a few scattering thoughts. I attended the revival meeting at the Baptist church of this town, conducted by Dr. Graves. He preached from the text, "And Adam and Eve sewed fig-leaves together and made aprons of them." He began by saying that the aprons were a failure, and that everything that man ever attempted was a failure. According to Dr. Graves, the printing-press that enables him to publish his senseless sermons, and the locomotiv that conveys him and his senseless book to and fro—his book is entitled, "From Heaven to Earth"—are failures. The telegraph that enables him in twenty-four hours after their delivery to read here the account of the frightful sermons on hell by Hell's fire Spurgeon in England is a failure. The telephone that enables him to communicate verbally with his most reverend brethren as to the best place next to conduct a revival of fear, of superstition, and bigotry; the sewing machine that enables him to buy his broadcloth one-third cheaper than if it had never been invented are failures. Finally, he and his brothers in the cause, and their efforts to convert the world to the Christian religion, all are failures. But he did not mention the last failure. According to Dr. Graves, man has accomplished nothing. I think the great Ingersoll spoke thus in regard to what man has accomplished: "Is it nothing to fill with light, with discovery, with science? Is it nothing to grope our way into the dreary prisons, the damp and dripping dungeons, the dark and silent cells, where the souls of men are chained to floors of stone; to greet them like a ray of light, like the song of a bird, the murmur of a stream; to see the dull eyes open and grow slowly bright, to feel yourself grasped by the shrunken and unused hands, and hear yourself thanked by a strange and hollow voice?" Sublime man!

I hav not been in this town long. One of my new friends has subscribed for THE TRUTH SEEKER. There are others to follow. I will write you again.

Yours for the truth. THOMAS V. WILLIAMS.

MALONE, IOWA.

MR. EDITOR: It was Thomas Paine that said, while working in the interests of humanity, "I avoid all rewards." That is the position Prohibitionists occupy; the human family is the stake. We leave the emoluments to our opponents. The manufacturers and vendors of intoxicating liquors, their aiders and apologists, follow their calling for the money there is in it, the same as slaves were bought, and bred, worked, driven, and sold. No one pretends to say that to take the waving treasure of our beautiful fields and convert it into whisky is right. Cheeky as the opponents of prohibition are, they are unwilling to advise the snatching of bread from the children of washerwomen, whose husbands are on the road to delirium, except in a roundabout way.

"S. R. S." says, "I would rather liv in hell than in a country run by preachers and Prohibitionists." Now it does not strike me in that way at all. Shall I begrudge the preachers the privilege of being right once in their lives. If I see a preacher walking leisurely along the towpath, must I jump into the canal and drown myself? Can we break the force of priestcraft by putting our heads to soak in whisky? Prohibition for humanity's sake is carrying out the Darwinian theory of the survival of the fittest, and leaving a people fit to survive. Watery-eyed, one-suspender men are not suitable adornments for the great American republic. Besides, it is to be feared that when they sober up with shattered brain they would do as "S. R. S.'s" Kansas man, join the church and build up priestcraft. I hav a fine steel engraving of the Continental Congress in the altitude of listening while Jefferson reads the Declaration of Independence. I would respectfully inform "S. R. S." that these men were called Tories and traitors. The friends of humanity hav always had a struggle on their hands, and so far as our country is concerned they never yet hav failed.

LEAVENWORTH, KAN., Feb. 10, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Every number of THE TRUTH SEEKER tells us that "one of the best ways to help along the cause of Freethought is to circulate THE TRUTH SEEKER." And we believe it, for surely no one can read it long and not be convinced of the rottenness of theology. But we find a great difficulty in the way of circulating it, as the church has so prejudiced the minds of the people against everything but its precious self, and considers it sacrilege to read such papers. Even novels, save Sunday-school books, are forbidden by most Christian parents, and said Sunday-school novels are calculated to keep the vail of superstition so closely drawn that not a ray of light can penetrate beneath its musty folds. After a child has been catechized, and attends Sabbath-school and family worship from infancy to maturity, it is with difficulty it can be induced to read any Freethought papers, or even giv ear to anything of the kind.

I giv a little of my experience in spreading the light. A few days since, I went into the office of an old friend with whom I had had a previous discussion on land-monopoly to show him the editorial on "Public Lands," in THE TRUTH SEEKER of February 2d. On looking over the page on which the article commences, he saw too much before commencing to read, and handed the paper back with a look of disgust. On asking him what was the matter, he replied that he didn't propose to read anything in such a paper as that. I told him the article was good, and would interest him, and was nothing concerning religion. "Oh, well," said he, "I hav heard of THE TRUTH SEEKER before, and want nothing to do with it." This called some remark from another party present (there being three others), which led to a discussion of religion, and the gray-haired follower of Christ presumed of course that I would admit there was a God who created all things, which I refused to do, until he produced some evidence to prove it. This he proceeded to do, by the design argument, and after asking us several questions, and running back to the foundation God on which the whole rotten theological fabric rests, stopped for me to say I was convinced.

Then, it being my turn, I meekly asked, Who made God? Holy horror! such an idiotic question! To ask who made the Deity! I was decided a fool at once, and told so many times with accompanying language that would make an Infidel blush to repeat, and during the short time it took to get out of the pious den, I had harder things said of me, and was abused more, than ever before or than I ever wish to be again.

Now, what we want to do is to get at the children; and my plan is this: For the Liberal press to get up business cards such as are used for advertising. But instead of a fancy chromo on one side, hav the picture of the leaders of Freethought and science, and those of religious leaders too, if desired, with a short biography of them, giving birth, death, belief, etc. Then let all who will (and all Liberals should) hav their business advertisment on the other side, make them attractiv to children, who will beg for them, and read them, which will set them to thinking, and older folks as well. And when once they begin to think, the game is up with the church. Few children ever hear the Bible or the God idea questioned. Nearly all hav heard of Thomas Paine, Ingersoll and others—how bad they were, what a horible death Paine died; of his recantation, etc., but few ever hear of his noble work at Valley Forge, or know that 'twas he that first wrote "The Free and Independent States of America." The church is busy scattering tracts to blacken his character, and that of all Liberals as well. Is it not, therefore, time we did something to checkmate them? Some may object to this plan on account of it hurting their business; but we apprehend no danger from that quarter. Besides, it would be the means of getting acquainted, and poor priest-ridden dupes would find out that all Infidels were not rogues and thieves. When we remember what Bennett and others hav suffered, surely we will not flinch at this; besides, if we are afraid to show our colors, let us take them in and go and join the church.

Children's Corner.

Edited by Miss Susan H. Wixon, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"His life is long whose work is well,
And be his station low or high,
He who the most good works can tell,
Livs longest though he soonest die."

Jenny's Question.

What good can I, such a little girl
Do in this world below—
This world, with mighty rush and whirl,
Where streams of goodness flow?

My hands so very little be,
My form so very slight,
In this big world, it seems to me,
I'm nothing but a mite.

By wisest minds in all the land,
Great things seem understood.
Amid the great, the learned band,
Can I do any good?

KATY'S ANSWER.

Yes, you can love this world so bright,
And everybody in it;
And thus grow pure for heaven's light,
And, as an angel, win it.

Though your voice is low and weak,
Still it can others bless;
Words of love you e'er can speak,
With smiles of tenderness,

In loving all, this truth is clear,
And cannot be denied—
Perfect love casts out all fear,
When we with love abide.

Then, tenderly should every one
Love each the other well—
Love all the world till life is done.
And here we no more dwell.

And love will make the weakest strong,
When it is freely given;
'Twill wash away all sin and wrong,
And make this earth a heaven.

Wilkes Barre.

I want to say something to the girls and boys of The Truth Seeker that will interest them, and at the same time giv them an idea of the coal regions in which I liv.

Wilkes Barre, Pa., is located in the Wyoming valley, famous for its Indian massacre, its beautiful scenery, and its gracefully flowing Susquehanna river; but owing to the mining of coal, much of its natural beauty has been destroyed.

The mining of coal is the principal industry, and very great sums of money are spent in fitting up the extensiv pumping-engins and shafts, used to hoist out this concentrated sunlight of millions of years ago; for as you will see, it was the sun's light that produced the vegetation from which the coal was formed.

While the sun was shining in that early time, the earth's crust was comparativly thin, and could not cool off at night as it now does, and this produced a prolific growth of plants and trees, which piled up to a great thickness for hundreds of thousands of years; and, at last, a great pressure of gas from within the earth caused the surface to giv way, and down it sank for about five hundred feet, as the rocks will show. This cavity again filled up with dirt and sand, until it became solid enough to produce a soil and other growths of plants, etc., and after a time, a very long time, down it went again, a few hundred feet more. Then another growth was formed, and down it went again; so that three distinct formations of coal were made, and went down in the era of the world called the carboniferous.

This has been learned by observation of the earth's rocks, and by mining out her treasures for our use, and this is called geology, which has been learned mostly within the last fifty years

The great pressure of so much material upon the bottom vegetable matter, and other chemical operations, hav converted it into hard coal, the lowest formation being the hardest and best. And this shows also that it must hav been the thickest; the middle being the next best, and somewhat thinner, and the last formation is the thinnest of all and also the poorest coal.

In many places branches of trees are taken out which hav been undisturbed, and are turned into solid coal, sometimes running through sand-rock just as the limb was encircled by the floating sand that filled up around it, and which was afterwards pressed into solid rock.

There is a large tree stump in our courthouse which was taken from the mines near the city, of solid coal and slate, which is a proof of the truth of geology, and the way the earth was formed.

To get this coal out of the beds, there are roadways in the earth for each vein or formation of coal, some fifty feet, some three hundred, and so on up to a thousand feet deep, which go to the bottom layer, and these roadways extend for many miles underground. A man who understands them can travel for ten or twelve miles or more, without coming to the surface. After the coal is mined out, especially from the upper veins, it causes much of the surface to giv way, and sink down, carrying houses and whatever is above along with it, so that often large portions of a mining district will let down, and ruin the houses. This cannot take place in Wilkes Barre, because the city charter provides that no coal can be removed. The city owns it clear down to China!

Having given you some idea of the coal country, I will now tell you a story. About two years ago, close to our city, a portion of this undermined district gave way, taking a house with it, in which a poor woman and her baby were snugly sleeping; but of course such a terrific noise and disturbance soon woke them up. The house went down about fifty feet, and the earth caved in all around it, so that nothing but the chimney hole and a part of the roof remained above the sunken surface. The side of the house was crushed in, but not the side next the bed. The poor woman and her baby had no means of getting out, and had to remain there under ground until discovered by accident, as this was an old working and no other houses very near it.

A man who chanced that way fancied he heard a baby cry, and thought also he heard some talk. He turned round and round, and finally imagined he must be getting "looney," for he thought the sound must be in the air above him. He went on, and finally came upon a round spot sunken down, and discovered the peak of a house sticking out of it, and also heard the peculiar cry of a baby, and a mother's soothing words, and mumbled prayers. The man hollered out, "Who's there?" "The good Lord bless you, it's mysel' and my darlint, and I cannot get out of this, to be sure," was answered.

The man ran after an ax and a ladder, and left the woman praying ten times as loud as before to get out. When he came, the news soon spreading, a great many people gathered, and the man, with his ladder and ax, made himself a hero in five minutes by cutting a hole through the roof of the house. He first got the baby out and laid it one side, and then dragged the woman to the top also, amidst the shouts and hurrahs of the party outside upon the bank. The woman was so overjoyed at being rescued from her perilous position, that, not knowing how else to repay her deliverer, and true to her woman's instinct, she flung her arms around the man's neck, and, with tears from her eyes, and kisses from her lips, thanked him, while the spectators looked on and enjoyed the scene from above the pit. She then took up the child and showered kisses upon her "darlint."

They secured her furniture through the house-top, and took up a collection for her on the spot. And for a long time it was a curiosity to visit the old house and the hole in the roof by which Mrs. Lafferty and her "darlint" made their escape. Perry.

Our Puzzle Box.

A METAGRAM.

A constellation hung on high,
My glory gilds the southern sky
With six bright stars of golden flame.
Six letters spell my proper name;
Three syllables are all I claim,
To right and left pronounced the same.
My first and last will form a word
To name a late extinct large bird.
My first and second thus combined,
A woman's name we always find.
These syllables are dear to song,
For they to music's scale belong—
The fabled music of the spheres
Made real to human hearts and ears.
Unwritten now on music's staff,
My name divided half and half,
The first denotes a beetle black,
With priestly robe upon his back;
*Mantis religiosa e'en
Could not appear so ghostly mean;
With straining eyes and droning wings,
The monster seems to think he sings.
And thus he greatly makes my second:
But he's a humbug, I hav reckoned.

Irwin, Iowa. J. K. P. Baker.

Mantis* (Greek, prophet), a Linnæan genus of voracious insects, remarkable for their slender, grotesque forms. One species (m. religiosa) has a pair of legs in front resembling a person's hands when folded in prayer, and is often called the "praying prophet" (Webster). It is the Christian scientist who has thus caricatured his religion by ascribing devotional sentiments to even insects, because they cross their little legs. This universality (!) of the religious sentiment according to priestly logic proves the existence of their God, and so they call on "all creatures here below" to "praise God, fro whom all blessings flow." At once "all creation" falls on its knees and the little mantis meekly folds his arms in prayer.

ANSWERS TO PUZZLES IN CHILDREN'S CORNER, MARCH 1ST.

1. CONSTANTINOPLE.
2. THE TRUTH SEEKER.
3. THOMAS PAINE.

Correspondence.

Harrisburg, March, 2, 1884.

Miss Wixon: I'm eleven years old; I am learning grammar, arithmetic, geography, spelling, reading, music, and I'm learning in a book called Nature; it tells you about flowers, fruit, seeds, etc., and tells how great God is, which I do not take much stock in. My playmates are all something around my age, and are all nice boys.

Yours respectfully, Herman S. Tausig.

P.S.—The orient city, Constantinople.

H. S. T.

Woodstown, N. J., March 3, 1884.

Respected Miss Wixon: I hav solved the puzzles before and will send you the answers of two and hav one to be solved. We take The Truth Seeker and I read the Children's Corner every week, and I saw that it said all communications for this corner should be sent to you. For February 23d, the cross-word was George Washington; and March 1st, the cross-word, by R. O. Bert, was Constantinople. If you think this one is fit to be printed please put it in; if not, it is all right. I never made anything of this kind up before, and I thought this would be my first, and maybe my last. We hav been taking your paper for some time and I always found it interesting.

Yours respectfully, Hattie Otinger.

P.S.—I am twelve years old, and I thought it was a very good one. H. O.

—Artie is very inquisitiv. He is a baby boy just learning to spell. He says if I-O spells Io, then P-O spells Pe-o. Oh, these children! But, after all, there is a spark of wisdom in this childish prattle, for our spelling is an awful thing! J. K. P. B.

THIRD EDITION.

BIBLE MYTHS

AND THEIR

Parallels in Other Religions.

Being a Comparison of the Old and New Testament Myths and Miracles with those of heathen nations of Antiquity, Considering also their Origin and Meaning. With numerous illustrations.

The object of the work is to point out the myths with which the Old and New Testaments abound; to show that they were held in common with other nations; and then trace them to their evident origin and explain their meaning.

"It has long been acknowledged by the most eminent biblical students that the Hebrew scriptures contain a large mythical element; but, so far as we know, the present is the first complete and scholarly atttempt to trace these myths to their source, and ascertain their original signification."—Boston Courier.

"Never before has there been given a volume to the reading world that shows the research for the origin of these myths as does this one just published by J. W. Bouton, of New York."—Boston Times.

"It is unquestionably true that the results of a rationalistic study of the Christian scriptures are nowhere else so accessible as they are now made in the work before us.—N. Y. Sun.

Poetry.

Immortality.

My soul, where art thou going? he asked the failing breath.
What meaneth this undoing which mankind say is death?
What mean the sad sensations which strangely whirl my brain,
And tend toward oblivion? Shall I not liv again?
Say, soul, what is destruction? What is this vision strange?
Can dark annihilation pass universal range?
"Dust thou art," O man, at birth, "to dust thou shalt return;"
"Ashes to ashes," "earth to earth," is all what we can learn.
The earth receives those ashes; thy vapors shall again
Meet where the lightning flashes, converting them to rain,
Which, weeping o'er death's portals, shed circles of renown,
Displaying tears immortal within heaven's crystal crown.
The sun ray which is holding the glories of that wreath,
Is seen again unfolding them upon the mountain heath;
Thy withered brain shall nourish earth's everlasting womb,
And yield a plume to flourish sweet petals o'er thy tomb.
Thy every thought immortalized, because with beauty given,
In purity recrystallized, adorns the dome of heaven;
So matter is eternal, myself it doth embrace,
Though not a single molecule be found in its old place.
Dissolved into atomic weight, I then may cease to think,
But cannot lose the life innate while I'm creation's link.
Electrize with the essence which doth all things pervade,
And forces to existence whatever is decayed.
My elements, evolving from decomposing slime,
Are found again resolving the universe sublime.
"O grave, where is thy victory? O death, where is thy sting?"
The grave is but a bed to me, and death my waiting wing.
Mentation may be ended, yet I shall surely liv,
My atoms all reblended as providence will giv.
It may be in the sunbeam my gases shall ascend,
May be to the poppy then my blood its tints shall lend;
Absorbed into the flower, or riding in the breeze,
Or caught up in the shower to roll in distant seas.
Then free from creeds upon it my rising breath shall sing
The whirlwind's solemn sonnet on nature's airy wing.
With duty to humanity, I do not fear the sod,
But trust my lasting destiny to nature's unknown God.
And now my pulse is ceasing, and hands and feet grew cold,
And death my colors fleecing prepares me for the mold.
My sun is seeming beamless, and sinking in the west,
To lands where sleep is dreamless, and all is perfect rest.
The world is growing dimmer, and fading from my sight,
And but a flickering glimmer shows now a rayless light.
But one last link unbroken my friend still holds to thee,
Though words cannot be spoken beneath this upas-tree.
I love, and hope, and fear; my friend, it is for you,
Accepted this farewell tear. Adieu, beloved, adieu.

Catechism for Liberals.

Q. Who made the world?

A. God, it is supposed, fashioned it.

Q. Who is God?

A. A supreme being, unknown to all but the clergy.

Q. What is man?

A. One of God's creatures, composed of a body and soul, and made to God's likeness.

Q. How can we be made to God's likeness when we are red, white, and black in color, and our features and size vary in proportion?

A. It is not for the wise to know; the church is to determin.

Q. For what end did God make us?

A. To work and toil here on earth and support the so-called ministers of the gospel and our rulers in general.

Q. How can we know God upon earth?

A. By going to church Sundays and holidays, and contributing our dollars and cents to the cravings of our aristocratic clergy.

Q. What does the apostles' creed contain?

A. The superfluous heresies of the past, now called theology.

Q. Does God know all things?

A. No. He only knows those things that are profitable to his clergy.

Q. Can God do all things.

A. Yes, when you pay him according to the premium on gold.

Q. Had God a beginning?

A. No man can tell but the clergy, who will guess at it to satisfy you.

Q. What do you mean by the mysteries of religion?

A. The unscrupulous power that the crafty clergy has deluded the people with since the early age of Christianity, and a rivet of kingcraft.

Q. What means the unity of God?

A. That there is but one God; and there cannot be more gods than one (Ephesians iv, 6).

Q. Then all Christian theology must be wrong.

A. Certainly not, while the clergy can get the people to believe its absurdities.

Q. How many persons are there in God?

A. Three divine persons, namely, the autocrat, the aristocrat, and the aberrant.

Q. Did one of the three divine persons become man?

A. There was no need to become man according to Eph. iv, 6, if it was not to delude.

Q. Who is the Holy Ghost?

A. The third person that conceived the second person, according to theological science.

Q. Why did the devil tempt our first parents to eat of the tree of life in the midst of paradise?

A. That he might giv a living to all cunning and crafty men too idle to earn their bread by the sweat of their brow.

Q. Why did God make hell?

A. No Atheist knows; it is only an opinion of the Christian clergy that their penitents might be terrified into subjection.

Q. Can anyone come out of hell?

A. Yes, when you pave the way with greenbacks, that the stubble might be removed.

Q. What is original sin?

A. The first link of slavery the clergy has endowed us with, that their power and profits might prosper.

Q. Where are true Christians to be found?

A. At the gold ring, or money exchange, robbing their fellow-man of the fruits of his labor.

Q. Are we justified by faith alone, without good works?

A. No. If your faith were as pure as salt it profits you nothing without supporting the clergy in all things, spiritual and temporal, in luxury and ease.

Q. How is the church holy?

A. In its corruptions and usury laws, in swindling the superstitious by granting indulgences and dispensations to all those that hav money to loan.

Q. Can the church err in what it teaches?

A. No; for it always leaves a loophole to get out of, by telling us to obey the church—i. e., our pastors.

Q. What must we do that we might be saved?

A. Support the politicians and the clergy in idleness and comfort, that they might become the rulers and bondholders of the land of the free.

Q. What is the duty of citizens?

A. To avoid whisky rings in politics, ecclesiastical donations, and never take bribes to sell the birthright of their fellow-patriots at elections.

Q. What ought to be done to delinquent Christians?

A. Enlarge the penitentiaries to receive them.

Q. Repeat the Ten Commandments.

A. 1. I am the Lord thy God; thou shalt hav no bondholder but me.

2. Thou shalt not take the name of the president of these United States in the gold ring.

3. Get married and do all christenings on the Sabbath day that the clergy might hav more time to rest, and concoct plans for the future.

4. Support your father and mother by honest industry.

5. Avoid taking that which you cannot reach.

6. Deal not in that which you hav no license for, or a revenue stamp to secure you.

7. Don't rob the exchequer; nor take bribes in contracts.

8. Never tell lies of your neighbor if he should differ with you in opinion.

9. Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's goose.

10. Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's greenbacks, nor his bonds, nor his income tax.

One other command I giv you, that you love the poor for my sake, and the rich for your own sake; for it is in holy writ, "The hire of the laborers who hav reaped down your fields, which is of you kept back by fraud, crieth; and the cries of them which hav reaped are entered into the ears of the Lord of Sabbaoth" (James v, 4). Faith without works is dead, and wicked rich men warned. The patriots of '76 are conversing with the patriots of 284. They say: "If ye fulfil the royal law according to scripture, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself" (James ii, 8). Who are they that do not believe all the church teaches? Patriots and Progressionists; they abandoned fraud and fiction.

Q. Who are the secessionists?

A. All those that preach reform by putting the God of kings into our Constitution, that the sons and daughters of freedom suffered martyrdom to abolish, and giv to mankind a government of the people.

Q. What will become of secessionists in the day of tribulation?

A. They will be tried before the tribunal of the people for the sale of their lands to foreign aristocrats, and for the poverty and misery they hav brought on the people, and be rewarded according to their crime.

Q. Who is Benedict Arnold?

A. A vain, deceitful man, fond of royal display and luxury at the expense of the people. When his fortune and pay did not meet his extravagance, he sold his country, and his honor, with all the patriots therein, for the paltry sum of one thousand three hundred pounds per annum of English gold.

Q. What became of Benedict Arnold when he died?

A. He went to the Christian heaven, where bondholders, bond robbers, land robbers, president assassins, and all believers in the divine right of kings go to enjoy their future with the angels in the paradise gained by fraud.

Q. Who is George Washington?

A. The God of our republic, the deliverer of mankind from kingcraft and priestcraft, all over this land; he who reprimanded the arch-traitor, saying: "The shadow of a fault tarnishes the luster of our finest achievements."

Q. Where is George Washington?

A. He is everywhere—in the hearts of the people, all over the globe. His name and memory will be cherished at the North pole.

Q. Who are the Liberals?

A. They are the forerunners of civil and religious freedom, the beacon-lights of civilization.

Q. What do the expounders of divine authority say of them?

A. That they are the enthusiasts of this age, and warn the Young Mens' Christian Association to beware of them.

Q. Who is the Young Men's Christian Association?

A. They are the would-be aristocracy of this age, who borrowed their orthodox ovation from John Williams, in the year of Christianity 1848.

Q. Who is John Williams?

A. He is the offspring of Welsh parents, who worked in a grocery store in London, England, and wishes to offer prayers and fasting to the sacred memory of George III.

Q. Who is George III.?

A. He was king of England by divine right, and defender of the faith by church right, and struggled to impose his divine authority over the American people.

Q. Are there any supreme heads on earth to the Young Mens' Christian Association?

A. Yes; Cook, Colgate, and Comstock—the divinity of Christian church charlatans, imitating the Hindoo trinity of the unknown gods, Brahma, Vishnu, and Siva.

Q, Where will all those Christian people go?

A. To the Christian heaven, to sit by the side of nothing, for Atheists to laugh at for their folly and ignorance.

Q. What does the Apostle Paul say of apostates?

A. That it is impossible for them to be renewed to their former glory without a great deal of scrip.

Q. Are we not strictly forbidden to worship images?

A. Yes; but we cannot disobey our rulers when it is on our curreney, that we might know our oppressor.

Q. To how many commandments may the Ten Commandments be reduced?

A. To these two principal commandments: Support the clergy, and then the state, with all your toil and sweat, and go in rags, as tramps do, that they might despise you, and be attentiv to the polls on election day.

Q. What do you mean by fast days?

A. Days we are allowed to use hog's lard on all occasions.

Q. What do you mean by national thanksgiving?

A. A national day authorized by the president of the United States that the clergy might hav business suspended to get acquainted with their neighbors' turkey and spring chickens.

Q. What do you think of those who, at their prayers, think not of God, nor of what they say?

A. They are to be pitied for having too many government bonds, and for striving to cheat in their income tax, that the burden might be greater on tho productiv classes.

Q. What must we do to remove this evil?

A. Repudiate the debt; it has long since been paid; giv the government lands to the people, and not to railroad monopolies and foreign lords; tax all church property as well as peasant homes, and make taxation on bonds as well as on mechanical enterprise. Equal taxation is the voice of the people.

Q. What do you mean by the last day?

A. The day of general judgment, when all the clergy will condemn you for the little support you contributed to their welfare and ease.

Q. What will they say to you on that memorable day?

A. Depart from me, ye progressionists and patriots; you hav disturbed my peace and comfort in this life by making others as wise as yourselvs.

Q. What will they say to the bondholders?

A. Come, ye beloved and benevolent old friends; you always legislated for our interest and state power, that we might keep the people in religious slavery; while you fleeced them in state and national legislation, we hav kept them in ignorance, where they ought to be, while we became the lords of the land. In making your dying will and testimony don't forget us, the shepherds of the most high, who are anxiously waiting to take all you will giv that you might in your folly go on your way rejoicing.

Q. Where is heaven for these righteous sinners?

A. When the clergy come back from their long search to find it, they will reveal it to you for your charity toward them.

My generous opinions on Christianity in general, I hope, will not be blighted by prejudice in the future without searching thoroughly, and penetrating closely into the most remote corner of your conscience.

M. H. Blackford, an American Atheist.

TESTIMONIALS:

Read the following testimonials, and be convinced that our claims are correct in every particular and that your ailments can be eradicated without the aid of MEDICIN. THESE APPLIANCES ARE THE ACME OF PERFECTION:

Remarkable Cure of Paralysis in One Week.

CINCINNATI, Dec. 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: As I feel greatly indebted to you for the benefit I hav received from your treatment, and the use of your Magnetic appliances, I can say without hesitation to those afflicted as I hav been that the effect was simply marvelous. Two weeks ago I was stricken with paralysis in my right arm and could not use it at all, but after wearing a suit of your MAGNETIC CLOTHING for one week, can use it quite as well as ever. I hav also been troubled with Dyspepsia and Kidney Complaint for a number of years, from which I hav suffered intensely, and, although doctoring all the time, never found but temporary relief. Since putting on your appliances I hav experienced great benefit, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav in the past two weeks, will soon be well. I would, therefore, recommend to those suffering as I hav your Magnetic appliances as the only means of effecting a sure cure.
Yours respectfully,
WM. H. CLEMMER,
No. 80 Eastern avenue.

Neuralgia of the Heart of Six Years Standing Cured in Three Weeks.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., Dec. 11, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: After wearing one of your MAGNETIC VESTS for about three weeks, I was entirely cured of Neuralgia of the Heart and Side, which had been a source of misery to me for the last six years. I had tried numerous remedies before without benefit, but as soon as I put on the MAGNETIC VEST I got relief instantly. With unbounded gratitude, I remain
Yours respectfully,
H. A. BROWN.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been under drug treatment for eight years with nervous prostration and female weakness:

OSBORN, O., Dec. 15, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY: Your letter just received; also the Clothing on Tuesday last. Fitted perfectly. FELT BETTER FROM THE FIRST HOUR I HAD THEM ON. Am not joking, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav since Tuesday, will soon be well. Will report again soon. Respectfully yours, E. J. K.

This lady reports herself entirely cured in less than six weeks after putting on the garments, and, although in bed, unable to get out, when applied, she nevertheless was able to ride twenty miles in two days after the application. The lady's name can be had upon application at this office, by any one desiring to communicate with her.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been suffering for two years with an Ovarian Tumor, and who had been told that nothing but the knife would save her life, and the chances were as 9 to 1 against recovery. In four months' time she is perfectly well, and has not taken a dose of medicin since putting on the appliances. Consult us when your physician tells you he can do nothing for you; it will pay you.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., November 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY, Dear Sir: About two years ago my health began to fail me; I became nervous, lost all desire for food, and, in fact, began to fail rapidly, so that I became alarmed and consulted several physicians of St. Louis, at which place I was then stopping, all of whom declared that I had an Ovarian Tumor, and that the only thing that would save my life would be the knife. About six months ago I grew rapidly worse, and had about made up my mind to take the only course that seemed left to me, and submit to an operation, when my attention was called to the Eureka Magnetic Appliances. As a drowning man will catch at a straw, so did I catch at this faint hope of a cure. Four months ago I purchased a suit of your appliances. From the very first I felt invigorated, the tumor, which had extended entirely across my abdomen, began to decrease, my pains became less from day to day, until now I am as well as I ever was in my life. Since putting on the appliances I hav not taken a single dose of medicin. My bowels, which before were constipated, are now regular. I would therefore cheerfully recommend them to anyone suffering as I hav, believing that they will do all and more than you claim for them. I remain,
Gratefully yours, MRS. MARY J. STEWART.

Remember that these appliances are not worn next the skin, but over the under-garment, and, unlike all other appliances in the market, they impart no shocks and leaves no sores.

Any of the above garments sent to any address upon receipt of price, and we will return the money if they are not as represented in every respect. If you are uncertain as to what would best suit your case send us word stating symptoms, and we will advise you what would be best suited to treat you. While our appliances are offered at less than one-third of what others are selling worthless appliances for, yet we will guarantee that the magnetic quality is a hundred fold superior to any other appliance ever offered the public, and will outlast the garments themselvs. Every magnet is put through a particular process, and hav raised five times their own weight six months after being magnetized, while not a single appliance in the market will attract the smallest particle of iron, the majority of such worthless appliances having so-called magnets made of material no better than hoop-iron, and not capable of retaining magnetism for a moment. All of our garments are made from the very best material for the purpose, and will outlast any and all other garments now before the public. Every magnet is arranged in the garments upon scientific principles, and not haphazard as in all the others. We offer you therefore

The Only Scientific Magnetic Appliance Ever Constructed.

And challenge comparison with any of the so-called magnetic garments now offered under that head. At the same time the application of labor-saving machinery in our manufacture enables us to offer them about

ONE-THIRD THE PRICE HERETOFORE CHARGED,

So that we can say with truth, None are so poor that they cannot procure them, being but a trifle higher than ordinary clothing.

Remember that we are offering you the cheapest and best magnetic appliances in the market, and if upon receiving the garments they do not meet your expectation, return them at our expense and we will refund your money.

Odds and Ends.

THE religious press—hugging a Sunday-school teacher.

WHY was Noah the best financier the world ever saw? Because he kept up a floating company when all the rest of the world was in liquidation.

THIS is the way a mother down East described her daughter's courtship: "He 'posed and 'suaded, she nayed and 'fused; last she 'sented, then he 'gaged her."

A SEWING-MACHINE agent was recently attacked by a fierce catamount, near Milford. Strange as it may appear, the catamount escaped without being stuck with one of the machines.

"WHERE shall we find our Sunday-school teachers?" asks a religious exchange. Well, many of our sweet girl Sunday-school teachers may be found sitting on sofas with nice young men any time after 8 o'clock P.M.

"Do you ever observe how very devotional Deacon Buffam is?" asked a pious lady of her husband. "Yes, my dear, the deacon is very devotional. He always keeps his head bowed in prayer till the contribution-box has passed."

A MEMBER of the Phonetic Club writes us to "drop the final ue in words so ending, and spell dialog, epilog, etc." We are willing to drop the ue to a limited extent, but when the language club asks us to spell glue gl, we protest,

WOMAN is so built that she but seldom can throw straight. Providence, it is truly said, orders everything for the best, and after a husband has seen one tin cup sail harmlessly by his head he can run before she can snatch up another.

THE Rev. Dr. Deems says the Old Testament is true, word for word, from beginning to end, and that if he didn't believe it he would leave the pulpit. The reverend doctor would be a good man to meet when you return from a fishing excursion.

"YES," said Mrs. Liberal, "I hate those Straiters, they are so awfully bigoted; but they needn't be so stuck up about their religion. The Liberal faith is gaining fast, and it won't be many years, I guess, before we can be as bigoted as they are."

A BEAR stole a Mormon baby last week and carried it off into the woods, but when it was discovered that it was a girl baby he immediately carried it back home again. He knew the Mormons would need her in their business in the sweet by and by.

"How I pity the poor such a night as this!" said Blande, as he sat in his comfortable apartment. "Then why," asked Bluff, "don't you put on your coat and go out and see if you cannot render assistance to some of them?" "Ah," replied Blande, "then I shouldn't be so comfortable as I am now, and I might forget the poor and begin to pity myself. That would be selfish, you know."

ONE Sunday morning a minister of the gospel had his attention called to a number of boys who were in search of a lost ball with which they had been playing football. After lecturing to them for awhile about the wickedness of playing on that day, he said, "Now boys, let me assure you that it is useless you searching for that ball any more, for Satan has it now in his possession." Whereupon one of the lads remarked, "Why, he'd no business to touch it; he's not a member in our club."

ELDER TOOLE arose at the last meeting of the Lime Kiln Club and observed that information had reached his ears to the effect that the world was to come to an end on the second of May of the present year. He desired to ask if the president was aware that such a calamity was to take place. "De president am fully aware," replied Brother Gardner. "An' what am we gwine to do about it?" "We will wait and see. If dar am am any sich enterprise on han' dis club wants to be counted in. I wouldn't advise any of you gem'len, howeber, to let your rents slip past in hopes to beat your landlords."

"You had been drinking again last night, John," is what Crimsonbeak got fired at him when he met his wife at the breakfast table the other morning. "I must admit that I had," replied the husband, meekly. "You know as well as I do that liquor is your worst enemy." "So I do." "Why don't you giv it up, then?" "It wouldn't be scriptural, ma'am." "What!" screamed Mrs. Crimsonbeak, horrorstricken at her husband's remark. "I said it wouldn't be scriptural," repeated Crimsonbeak, rather decidedly. "Don't the scriptures teach us to love our enemies?" and Crimsonbeak smacked his lips at the very thought of it.

WAS IT A BOY OR A GIRL?

Mrs. Mulcahy: "Good marnin'." Mrs. O'Hollihan: "Good marnin', Mrs. Mulcahy." Mrs. Mulcahy: "An' how's the ould man, Mrs. O'Hollihan?" Mrs. O'Hollihan; "Och, purty wull, thankee, Mrs. Mulcahy, but dhrunk agin lasht night, though." Mrs. Mulcahy: "Och, dear, dear. The poor man!" Mrs. O'Hollihan: "Did you hear the news about the incraise in Mrs. McCarthy's family, Mrs. Mulcahy?" Mrs. Mulcahy: "Oi did not. Waz it a bye or a gurrull?" Mrs. O'Hollihan: "'Twas nayther." Mrs. Mulcahy: "Nayther?" Mrs. O'Hollihan: "Nayther; twaz twins!" Mrs. Mulcahy: "Wull, wull, wull!"

THE late anecdote in the December Drawer illustrating the colored brother's idea of the difference between meum and teum reminds a reader of a conversation on the same topic with an old acquaintance, Uncle Sy. "Did you ever find anything of value, Uncle Sy?" I asked, after telling him about finding a pearl ring that morning. "Yeh, sah; I foun' a pus' once, wid ten dollars in it." "Did you? Well, what did you do with it? You didn't keep it, of course?" "Yeh, sah; I did dat berry ting. I'se strickly honest; I wouldn't take no man's pus'. I lef' it where he could get it; but I took de money out fust. You see, he done los' de money—'twarn't his'n no more. I done find it; it was my money den. But de pus was his'n, an' long as I liv I ain't gwine to take no man's pus'."

Notes and Clippings.

THERE is an overproduction of clerical charlatans who preach lies for money.—John Swinton.

KNOWLEDGE alone kills religion; faith alone has no protection from superstition.—Christian Advocate (Methodist).

THE czar's physician has advised him to take more outdoor exercise, as his close confinement is liable to kill him. This is mighty hard on the poor czar, for now he is between two fires. If he goes out he is liable to be blown to pieces by dynamite, and if he stays in the house he will die anyhow.

THE melancholy discovery is made that "gosh" is the worst kind of swearing. Eliot, in his Indian Bible, uses "osh" (my father) for the Almighty, and the early missionaries employed "gosh" (your father). It is said the Indians at once adopted the latter word for the uses of profanity.

ALBERT ROBINSON, who is described as a very quiet, retiring man, is now chained to the floor of a cell in the county jail in San Antonio, Texas. He had been considerably enthused with the religion taught by a party of Sanctificationists, preaching in that city, with the above result. He is a raving religious maniac.

THREE different religious newspapers publish Jo Cook's Monday talks unabridged, each with the statement that the lectures are revised by Cook himself. These assurances are supererogatory. The frequency with which "laughter," "applause," and "sensation" are interjected in the printed reports is a sufficient indication that the author handles the manuscript.

JOHN McGINNIS, of Philadelphia, was a Catholic. Elizabeth McGinnis, his wife, was a Protestant. To settle the religious difficulties in which they found themselvs entangled, McGinnis treated his wife with such brutality that she was obliged to leave him. He then shot her, seriously wounding her, and killed her mother. On Friday, the 4th inst., McGinnis was hanged.

THE United States treasurer has just discovered that the supply of one-dollar and two-dollar bills is nearly exhausted, and they are scarce. It is strange how long it sometimes takes an official to find out what hundreds of other people hav known for years. Yes, Mr. Treasurer, the one-dollar and two-dollar bills are scarce, and there is no great abundance of bills of a higher denomination.

A BOSTON young lady who was on a visit to New York remarked to a citizen of that place that there was "no intellectuality in New York." Upon being asked why she visited such a city, she replied, "For intellectual rest." Whereupon the wicked New Yorker remarked, "I am glad to get your explanation of your apparent lack of intellect." And now the Boston lady won't even look at the gentleman.

JOHN L. SULLIVAN having vanquished Robinson without much difficulty, should now go into training to meet his fellow-townsman, the Rev. Jo Cook, who has evinced such marked pugilistic tendencies recently. The Rev. Jo has two stout arms and a powerful tongue.—Chicago Tribune. It is generally believed that Sullivan's weakest point is his wind. He is, therefore, hereby warned that he is no match for Cook.

THIS is the way that the editor of the Presbyterian Banner, warranted orthodox, writes to his paper from Boston: "It is good cause for alarm among Congregationalists when the 'Old South' abandons orthodoxy; when Andover Theological Seminary avows a 'new departure;' when Professor Ladd, of Yale College, publishes a work the effect of which, so far as it goes, is to destroy all confidence in the scriptures; and when Dr. McLane, late of Steubenville, is called to one of the leading Congregational churches of New Haven, though repudiating altogether the orthodox view of the atonement."

ANDREW JACKSON, a Seneca Indian, living on the reserve near White Cloud, Kansas, being able to write a little, and having borrowed two and a half dollars of another Indian, John Halftown, gave his note for the money, with interest, as follows: "Me, Andrew Jackson, day after to-morrow six months will pay to John Halftown may be three or four days, $3 or $4 dollars—no fetch paper no git money by dam." Signed Andrew Jackson.

A CLERGYMAN in Durham, England, some short time since, taught an old man in his parish to read, and found him an apt pupil. After his lessons were finished he was not able to call for some time, and when he did only found the wife at home. "How is John?" said he. "How does he get on with his reading?" "Oh, nicely, sir." "Ah, I suppose he'll read his Bible very comfortably now." "Bible, sir? Bless you, he was out of the Bible and into the newspapers long ago."

THE commission which was appointed at the instance of the National Congregational Council, held in St. Louis, 1880, has concluded its work and made its report. This report is in the form of a new creed in twelve paragraphs, the last of which affirms as follows: "We believe in a final judgment, the issues of which are everlasting punishment and everlasting life." This is signed by twenty-two doctors of divinity. We trust that the younger persons among the number may liv to be ashamed of it.

A CONTROVERSY has arisen among the members of the Dutch Reformed church in New Jersey over the burial of a negro woman in a part of a cemetery set apart for white people. It has been generally supposed that the grave was a common leveler of class distinctions, and that one person was as good as another under ground, even to "the politic worm." What, inquires the Chicago Tribune, will the members of the Dutch Reformed church of New Jersey do when they get to heaven, where there are no reserved seats?

A SEWING MACHINE was recently won in a church lottery in this city by a reverend archbishop. About the same time several candy dealers were arrested for violating the lottery law by selling prize packages of candy. The victims of Comstock's "candy-pulling" should join the church, and make sewing machines the only prizes in their lotteries. Then, by judiciously allowing the proper persons to win the prizes, Comstock would perhaps put on his leather spectacles when he went in search of them.—Sewing Machine Journal.

THE Little Rock (Ark.) Gazette prints the following as a veritable letter of Andrew Jackson, and says it is a fair sample of his private correspondence: "I was glad to hear from you and to know that the good Lord, in his divine mercy, had thus far spared you. May he ever bless us and damn our enemies. We must all lean on the cross for support, for man is weak. Did you ever see such a damned scoundrel as John Q. Adams? I am pleased to hear that you hav professed religion and joined the church. This more effectually elevates you above the damned whigs."

DURING the great Advent revival some years ago, the time for the ascension of the believers in that religion was set for a certain day in the spring. The greater part of the inhabitants of a little village in Maine had made all preparations to be taken bodily up to heaven; they had disposed of all their worldly goods by gifts to neighbors and friends that were unbelievers, and assembled the night before, dressed in flowing robes, on a hill known as "Scoodic mountain," so as to be the first to be taken. The elder, from loss of sleep, and also a greater part of his followers, fell into a sound sleep. Thinking to protect the elder from the cold blasts of the exposed place, several friends piled limbs of trees and brush around him. Along towards morning, just before light, some one, thinking to hav a fire to keep warm, set fire to the elder's protection. The flames quickly surrounded him, and, awakened by the sparks and flames from a sound sleep, he shouted, "In hell, just as I expected!"

THE Helena, Montana, Independent says: "Father Imoda, who came among the Blackfeet in 1869, has many interesting reminiscences of the red man in that early day. He found polygamy one of the hardest heresies to eradicate among them. The successful hunter usually wanted more than one wife to skin the slaughtered game, tan the hides, and preserve the meat. The scarcity of game of late years has greatly aided the church in rooting out polygamy, and the young men are generally contenting themselvs with one wife."

HERE is a social item from a Winnipeg paper: "A meeting of Sunday-school teachers was held a few evenings ago at an up-town book store, and a very enjoyable evening was spent. The meeting opened with prayers and singing, after which the guests partook of coffee and cake. Dancing followed, and then the party settled down to a quiet game of eucher and whist. After the night was far spent and the dawn was at hand Mr. Richardson proposed that they should all unite in singing a hymn, 'Sun of My Soul, Thou Savior Dear.' This was done, and the guests departed, well pleased with the night's entertainment. Everybody's taste was considered, which is the only sure way of having a real good time of it."

A "SPECTATOR," writing to a religious paper, reports that he lately went to a Brooklyn church, and says that he and his family had to wait in the vestibule till the pew-holders were seated, and then they were distributed around, he in one pew, his wife in another, and the two boys in the gallery. He thinks that since the churches sell reserved seats for the season, they should sell them for the single Sunday. He would hav been very glad if he could hav sent up the Saturday before and hired reserved seats for himself and his household for that Sunday morning service. "Why not?" he asks. It is hard to say why not, except that in the case of churches like that of Talmage a theatrical license would be required. By selling the pews for the season this issue is dodged.

ATTENTION is called by the New York Graphic to the fact that when the verdict in the Guiteau case was announced the prisoner leaped from his chair and shouted, "God will punish you for this," and then pronounced a prophecy of vengeance upon his prosecutors, their witnesses, and the jury. Corkhill, the district attorney, has lost his office, and is looking for something to do. One of his associate counsel took to drinking soon after the trial, and is now a common drunkard. Two of the jurymen are dead; two more hav failed in business, and another is hopelessly insane. Three of the medical experts who testified to his sanity are dead, and a fourth has become insane. And now it is announced that J. W. Tilden, the chemist who discovered the poison in the bouquet Mrs. Scoville sent to her brother the morning of his execution, has gone crazy, and been committed to the Government asylum for treatment.

THE pastorship of the church of Notre Dam (Catholic), in Chicago, is the subject of unchristian remark, and givs the wicked an opportunity to scoff. The Rev. G. Cote has been removed. There has existed in the congregation for years past a dissatisfied and not overscrupulous element that, it is claimed, has done everything under heaven to hav Father Cote removed. He has frequently received threatening letters from anonymous individuals, who declared that they would notify the archbishop of some scandalous conduct on Father Cote's part. They went further, and even sent a batch of this anonymous literature to the archbishop, but his grace paid no attention to the matter. Finally, the malcontents of the parish came out and declared themselvs, after having spread most damaging stories, reflecting upon Father Cote's priestly character, among the congregation, and requested him to resign, but he refused to do so. Some of the people finally managed to influence the ecclesiastic authorities against the priest, and Father Bergerson succeeds Father Cote as pastor of Notre Dame parish. A favorit remark with the founder of THE TRUTH SEEKER was, "How these Christians love one another!" This seems to be an appropriate occasion to repeat that observation.

THE attendance at the Rutgers Presbyterian church of this city is falling off so rapidly that the members are talking seriously of selling out. The pastor is anxious to resign.

THE Rev. John Lyon, of Bridgeport, Conn., is missing. He went to Hartford one day last week and has not returned. It is feared that he has become demented and wandered off.

THE exports of domestic cattle, hogs, beef, pork, and dairy products from the United States during February amounted to $6,960,475, as against $9,792,040 during the corresponding month of 1883.

THE daily newspapers which pay cash for their news are endeavoring to get a newspaper copyright bill through Congress to prevent other papers from copying the news under eight hours from publication.

AT the meeting of the "Joe Brady Emergency Club," in this city last Sunday, it was claimed by the orators that the knife, poison, and dynamite were lawful means of warfare. Anything to kill off the British, they said.

THE trouble in Parson Newman's church is not yet wrestled out satisfactorily. Newman preached a sensational sermon last Sunday on slanderers and foreigners, condemning both without stint. The anti-Newman party were largely absent.

OUR Irish citizens turned out in great numbers on the 17th to celebrate St. Patrick's day. The ceremonies consisted of parading the streets in high hats and green regalia, with occasional deflections from the line of march made necessary by the evident determination of the participators to patronize impartially every liquor saloon in the city. St. Patrick may well be proud.

MR. BRADLAUGH, while delivering a lecture at Bridgewater, one night last week, against perpetual pensions, was attacked by roughs and driven from the platform by showers of rotten eggs, fruit, and fireworks. The roughs afterward attacked and wrecked the chairman's house. In the matter of the action brought against him for having voted in the House of Commons, Mr. Bradlaugh has pleaded not guilty.

Chapter XX.

THE FIRST SHOT.

The years roll by. The golden fruit comes, and the bitter frost; the summer and the winter and the happy spring.

The city of E—— is throbbing to its center. Every man, woman, and child is looking on the glittering stream of soldiery as with tossing banners it surges through the principal thoroughfares. The sounds of battle are in the air—of a mighty contest.

It is a gorgeous spectacle, and the pulses leap like fire to the music and the tread of swift battalion. Many an old acquaintance do we see in the newly recruited ranks. The summons has been made, and they are marching down to Dixie.

I suppose the most resplendent figure in all those gilded troops was the chaplain, the Rev. George Adolphus Hapgood. He did look radiant indeed, as if he already had the golden harp in his hand, and was marching through the streets of the New Jerusalem. His brass buttons answered back the glitter of the sun, as if to say, We are greater than thou. He wore a cockade hat, and its feathers floated brilliantly, yet with Christian meekness, upon the air. No doubt he would make a brave warrior in the rear column, and pray mightily for the soldiers and prey mightily for himself. The latter is the only kind of preying that he himself personally believed in.

And there was our good Doctor Dobson. How happy he looked—and weighing over two hundred at least. It seemed as if he should have a double quantity of horse-flesh to carry his patriotic body. He was determined, if not to die, at least to bleed for his country's sake.

And Stubbs was colonel now, smoking his pipe and carrying a pocket edition of Shakspere, and murmuring, "Now for the big wars that make ambition virtue."

Orderly Sergeant Jones was marching in Company A, and Cupples, high private in the rear rank, was valiantly holding the musket upon his aching shoulders, and swearing a little bit to keep his spirits up, for to keep "time, time, time," was not an exercise of which he was particularly fond.

Sheriff McGuffum, of course, didn't join the ranks; but he was ready to do his level best at shouting, and this he did to-day with pre-eminent success. Indeed, he was obliged before night to soothe his self-sacrificing throat with a volcanic inruption of whisky.

So wild and mighty was the excitement that even the tomb of the stately house of the Binneys seemed to stir with life, and a bit of rag, red white and blue, floated from one of their upper windows.

And now the band pours forth the animating strains, "Away Down South in Dixie," while the troops approach the wharf. The great steamboat is ready to receive them. The feeling of the vast masses seems to grow more intense as they clap their hands, wave their handkerchiefs, and send their kisses on the trembling air. Slowly the companies file on board; then the ranks break, and the real farewell begins. Husbands and wives, brothers and sisters, fathers and daughters mingle together, and passionate cries and sobs and tender admonitions are heard. There are claspings of hands as if they could never be separated; lips touch lips in clinging fondness; tears come, and smiles flash over them to be lost again in the rushing light of other tears. Soon the great bell sounds, and the last word must now be said, the last look of love-lighted eyes be rendered, the last prayer be uttered, the last touch be given.

A thousand eyes follow the boat as it slowly drops into the middle of the stream, and floats with the tide. The setting sun flings its million-shafted light upon the fluttering penants, the draping flags, and the starry folds that sweep the breeze from the topmost staff. Immense volumes of smoke roll forth, the slow thunder of the wheels is heard as they strike the flowing waters. Mingled with this bursts again the martial music. The men bend over the railing and scan the shore with glistening eyes, and wave long adieus. The shore seems alive at every point with moving signals. The masses of sunlight illuminate the city with many-colored fires, and the multitude, swaying like an ocean, seem ready to break, and like a cataract chase with tumbling splendors the receding freight. The river flows on, the great iron arms play, the sun hastens to its setting, night advances with its million torches, and beneath the vast gulf of separation rolls. The soldiers are gone, the smoke-stack has faded from view, and aching hearts go home and wonder when the end will be.

At early evening the boat stops at the little town of H——, on the Kentucky shore. The troops disembark and prepare for a night's encampment. It is a new task to most of them, but they work with willing hands. Only he who has participated can understand the zest with which one begins to build the tented city. It seems like magic—as if from the very dust bloom forth the habitations of men.

The camp-fires blaze. The men are hungry with a royal hunger that could spice the plainest dinner and make it fit for a king. The coffee is put on, and the hard-tack boxes brought to the front, and their contents distributed with entire justice—two to every man. I believe that hard-tack is about the only thing that one gets his full share of in this world. Thank heaven, the rich can't eat it, or else they would monopolize that, and the poor man would have to go farther and fare worse.

A jolly time the boys hav. They are ready for any fate. With wise recklessness they drown sorrow in joy. It is no use to fret, and they laugh as if all were sunshine—as if they were going home and not to battle and to death.

No coffee was ever made quite so nice as that which was made in the army. Somehow it seemed to hav the concentrated essence of outdoor life. It's the richest wine that man ever drank. Even army contractors seemed to lose their power when it came to coffee, and with a good conscience furnished the pure article. But they made it up with a vengeance on commissary whisky, which was always sure to kill at forty rods.

"How's this Cupples?" said Sergeant Jones. "Do you feel homesick already?"

"That musket was heavy," said Cupples; "I'd just as leave fight, but I don't like such artillery."

"You'll get used to it."

"We can get used to anything; but I think by the time I get used to this backache I shall die."

"For all that you'll have to stand guard to-night. Your name is among the first, and for picket duty, too."

"O Lord!" said Cupples; "that's too much. I begin to think that soldiering is confounded hard. I thought it was going to be easy-like. This beats me."

"No knowing what you'll meet. The enemy may come down on you in the middle of the night. You must keep a sharp lookout."

"I don't see how I can. I'm so sleepy now that I could take a nap on an iceberg."

"Take an extra pint of coffee. To-morrow you can sleep all day; but to-night you must be as keen as a briar."

"Fall in, guard!" the cry resounded, and Cupples took his place in the ranks, and the names were called. Just then the officer of the day came up, and the Rev. George Adolphus Hapgood. The latter thought it was a good chance to make a little speech, and show how patriotic he was when there was no danger to himself.

"Brothers and sisters," he began, and then corrected himself, remembering that he was not at the accustomed prayer-meeting.

"Boys, this is a great occasion. I hope you will improve it. In the midst of life we are in death. We know not what a day may bring forth—nor the night either—so we must be circumspect and put on the whole armor of God. The wicked flee when no man pursueth; but our redeemer liveth, and if we put our trust in him we shall certainly come out with flying colors. Be ye, therefore, watchful, and in the midst of the most trying circumstances don't forget that long as the lamp holds out to burn, the vilest sinner may return."

"Not until the guard relieves him. If he does he'll be shot for desertion," cried the sergeant, as the chaplain rode away with his flying cockade, conscious that he had made one of the very best speeches of his life. I won't dispute but what he had, only it shows upon what pabulum our fashionable churches are now supported. It didn't go down with the soldier-boy, however, one bit.

"I wish he had to hold my musket," said Cupples, "I'm sick of preachin'. What good does it do? It don't cure my aching back, and I'm sure it won't keep me awake. It never did, not even in church."

It was no use to grumble, and Cupples had to shoulder his musket and march away. He hadn't the slightest idea where he was going or what he was to do. He simply did as he was told. The troop went a couple of miles to a rickety old barn. Fortunately, Cupples was on the second relief and so he had two hours' good sleep, which he made the most of—while he also rested his back on the soft side of a pine board. It needed a tremendous amount of shaking by the corporal of the guard to rouse him when his turn came; but finally he was able to stand upright and grasp his musket, answer to his name, receive the countersign, and relieve guard. It was a dreamy sort of an affair until he was left all alone, when he became thoroughly awake and felt the responsibility of his position.

He was to guard the army of the republic. Who knew what might happen—what enemy might be prowling or creeping about, what direful blow might be hovering in the air? He was on the alert. He watched every motion and tried to catch every sound. It was near midnight, and the stillness was intense, save the music of an occasional breeze that, in the unaccustomed darkness, was very much like the voice of a ghost.

Cupples was afraid; but he grasped his musket firmly, and determined that under no consideration would he run away. He dared not utter a sound. He could not walk, for his instructions were to keep in one place and do nothing but watch, and this was about the hardest thing that Cupples ever did. His imagination began to kindle, and wavering shapes seemed to come and go, and he was constantly bringing his gun to charge and was on the point of crying, "Who goes there?" when his good sense told him that it was nothing but a shadow, and he settled back to sentinel stolidity with the feeling that, after all, nothing would happen and he would go back to the camp-fire without having achieved a particle of glory, for all of which he would be profoundly grateful—for he cared much more for a whole skin than for honorable scars. His two hours were almost up, and he was beginning to congratulate himself that he had safely passed the first ordeal of army life, when he did really hear a sound. He listened, and was convinced that it was outside of the line of pickets and might be the footstep of an approaching enemy. Whatever it was, it betokened a slow and cautious movement. Cupples was in hopes that the sound would pass away; but it increased momentarily, and his heart throbbed like a trip-hammer. Was he really to meet a midnight foe; was he really to fire off that huge musket and shed blood; or, worse still, was he himself to be taken off? It was an awful situation. How his cowardly legs did want to take leave of absence; but Cupples put his lips firmly together and just clung to his musket and kept a sharp look-out, his eyes blazing almost like coals of fire as he peered into the gloomy forest that skirted the left of the encampment. He was sure he could see a moving body; but as yet the darkness was undistinguishable, and it was probably an optical illusion. Five minutes passed and nothing more occurred, and his courage recuperated wonderfully—when again the sound reverberated more close and more decided, and his courage went at once below the freezing point. There was no longer a doubt but that somebody was secretly approaching the outpost. It might be a whole army, and upon Cupples rested the reponsibility of giving the alarm. "O Mariar," said he to himself, "that I must be the first one to bleed and die! It's altogether too sudden. However, I'll fire—hit or miss, some damage will be done."

The ominous sound increased steadily, his ear detected the direction, he watched intently, and soon beyond peradventure the darkness of the forest broke into an advancing object. With one tremendous throb, Cupples cried out:

"Who goes there?"

No answer came, and the object seemed to be leaping upon him, when aiming with both his eyes and pulling the trigger with all his fingers, his gun went off with a thundering sound and flung him violently back, while he poured forth volley after volley of summons, "Corporal of the guard! Corporal of the guard!" But he never flinched one iota from his post.

The whole camp was instantly in commotion. The corporal was by his side in a moment. The guard fell in, the long roll began to sound. The alarm spread from company to company. There was rousing in hot haste. A battle seemed to be imminent. The whole brigade was under arms.

"I don't know whether I killed him or not," said Cupples to the officer of the guard, "but I fired right there."

"You did nobly," said the officer. "I make you corporal on the spot."

"I was scared though," said Cupples.

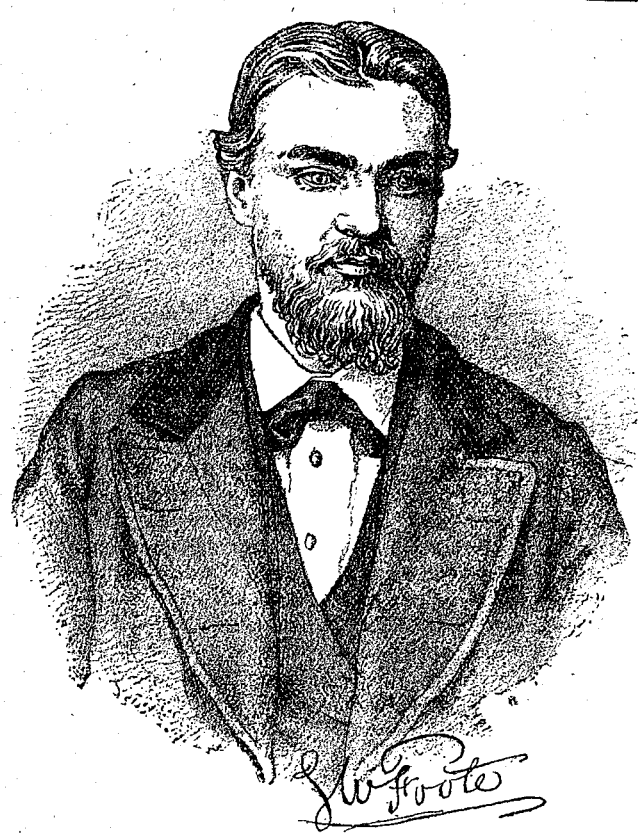
"No matter for that so long as you didn't run. Forward, and let's see what's the matter. Careful though, for the enemy may be in full force."

The torches flared in the darkness, and the picket line went cautiously on. They did not really expect to find a dead enemy, for Cupples declared that this was the first time he had ever fired off a musket, and no doubt the enemy had escaped.

"If I did hit him though, he's dead," said Cupples, "for the shot like to have killed me. It seemed to go off in all directions."

They went about ten rods into the forest, and lo and behold! the shot of Cupples had done noble execution; the first shot of the war had been successful. Before the astonished gaze of the advancing company, there lay stark dead an enormous porker, one of the finest hogs ever raised in Kentucky.

There was a tremendous shout, and Cupples was heartily congratulated. "You shall hav the best ham that hogs afford," said the officer of the guard.



"We'll hav a barbecue altogether," said Cupples, "and invite the whole camp. I go in for union. I wish it would be hogs all the way through. It would be easy fighting and first-rate living."

"Fall in for pork, men," said the officer. "Giv the alarm for a royal dinner to-morrow noon. No danger of a retreat this time. We shall conquer hog's head, feet, and all."

"Maria and Bessie will be here," said Cupples, "and we'll dine together on the first shot of the war. We'll take it as a good omen. All's well that ends well, and what's better than roast pork?"

W. J. RAMSEY,

Sentenced, as proprietor of the Freethinker, to nine months' imprisonment in Holloway Jail. His release occurred on Saturday, Nov. 24, 1883, a full account of which was published in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Dec. 22, 1883.

HENRY A. KEMP,

Sentenced, as publisher of the Freethinker, to three months' imprisonment in Holloway Jail.

The Dungeon's Door Swings Open.

AND GEORGE WILLIAM FOOTE WALKS FORTH A FREE MAN.

On Monday morning, February 25th, the latest victim of Christian tyranny was liberated from twelve months' incarceration in Holloway jail for the fictitious offense of blasphemy. Long before eight o'clock in the morning, a crowd had begun to gather outside the great gates of the prison, which was presently largely augmented by the arrival of brakes from all parts of London, filled with men and women eager to sympathize with the man who had spent twelve months of the prime of his life within the gloomy recesses of a Christian prison.

At eight o'clock two carriages drove up to the great gates of the prison amid tremendous cheering; the first containing Mr. Charles Bradlaugh, M.P., Mrs. Besant, and the Misses Bradlaugh; the second, Mrs. Foote, Mr. Angell (father-in-law of Mr. Foote), Dr. Edward Aveling, and the Rev. Mr. Sharman (a gentleman who not long since was minister of a Unitarian congregation at Plymouth, but who left the pulpit that he might devote himself entirely to the agitation for the repeal of the blasphemy laws). The policemen who guarded the gates leading to the courtyard of the prison had evidently received orders to admit Mr. Bradlaugh and his friends, and they were allowed to drive up to the doors of the prison at once, when Mr. Bradlaugh, Mrs. Foote, and Mrs. Besant alighted and entered the prison together.

Everybody was then on the tiptoe of expectation, and the scene was one well worthy of remembrance. Three roads meet outside the prison-gates, and this afforded an exceptionally fine opportunity for an imposing demonstration. The ground rises gradually on one side, and on the highest point immediately facing the door by which Mr. Foote emerged, the wagonets were arranged in a long semicircle. From the wagonets to the great gates of the prison, the ground was packed with people, many of them, apparently, of easy circumstances, and there being a large number of ladies present, who entered into the proceedings with great enthusiasm. One of the wagonets displayed the memorable words used by Mr. Foote when sentenced by Mr. Justice North—"I thank you, my lord; it is worthy of your creed." On another were the words, "G. W. Foote, the Freethought martyr."

All eyes were now fixed with strained expectation on the great doors of the jail, and a few minutes after eight o'clock the doors of the prison slowly opened, as though reluctant to disgorge their prey, and Mr. and Mrs. Foote appeared, accompanied by Mr. Bradlaugh and Mrs. Besant. Then arose a mighty burst of cheering, waving of hats and handkerchiefs; the whole of those assembled doffing their hats as the carriages drove out of the prison gates, recognizing in Mr. Foote the man who would rather endure the torture of twelve months' incarceration than cringe to a creed which he knew to be the barrier against moral, intellectual, and social progress.

A long procession was formed immediately after the carriages issued from the gates, and the procession, taking all the prominent streets in its way, drove to the Hall of Science, where a breakfast, to which some hundreds sat down, had been provided to celebrate the return of Mr. Foote to the outer world. At the conclusion of the breakfast, Mr. Bradlaugh, who was in the chair, addressing Mr. Foote, said:

Mr. Foote, we meet informally this morning to welcome you on your release from an imprisonment which, if it had been only for one week, we should hav considered petty persecution, but which, being for twelve months, we hold to be infamous in its harshness and severity. This morning our greeting is informal. On the 12th of March we shall formally testify, to you and your co-prisoners, our view of the whole persecution and imprisonment. But though the greeting to-day is informal, it is none the less hearty, real, and thorough. The cheers which commenced to greet you when Holloway jail doors first opened were the first words of the judgment of reversal of the highest court of appeal that civilized nations know—the court of public opinion, which thus reverses, annuls, and destroys the sentence passed upon you by Mr. Justice North. The friends who gathered at Holloway were numerous enough, I hope, to delight you, and are numerous enough here to show their earnestness; but they are only the few who represent the scores of thousands who in every part of England permit me to be their mouthpiece to-day. Since you hav been here you hav received from them, by letter and by telegram, testimonies to speak for themselvs. But during the last twelve months, I hav stood face to face with very many hundreds of thousands of your countrymen, and wherever your name has been mentioned there has been hearty, earnest, complete sympathy with you in your suffering, and desire for your release. You come out of Holloway jail this morning enrolled in the martyr-list, which in old times was headed by Bruno, Vanini, and Lezcynski—men who had none of that of which you hav this morning as recompense and reimbursement for their pain; for about their cinders none gathered save those who were hostil. You come out enrolled in the list which in our own century has written upon it the names of Richard Carlile, Robert Taylor, Henry Hetherington, Matilda Roalfe, James Watson, and scores of other brave and enduring Freethinkers, who all endured as you hav endured, but had not the pride to be greeted as you are greeted; for then opinion was so strong against them that it required daring to meet the prisoner on his release. To-day public opinion is working for you every hour, and your friends who meet you are proud to be able to do it. We meet to honor you for your brave and able defense of Freethought on your three trials; we meet to bear testimony to the great moral courage you hav shown; we meet to wish you health and strength in the future which is now open to you as it is to few men; we meet to assure you that the whole Freethought party throughout England looks to you to maintain the position which you fought for before Mr. Justice North, and which you won before Lord Coleridge. And I may tell you that when I and my colleague, Mrs. Besant, represented England at the International Freethought Conference at Amsterdam, we were charged most earnestly by the representativs of many nations to tender to you, as I do tender to you to-day, their warm sympathy with you in your struggle and suffering, and to express not only to you, but to the English people, as I do now express, their indignant protest against the severity of an imprisonment which at the present time is without parallel for such an offense in any civilized community in the world.

The Rev. W. Sharman, who was received with cheers, said:

Ladies and gentlemen, I rise simply for the purpose of conveying to Mr. Foote the assurance that his imprisonment shall not be a fruitless one. We mean that, as he is the latest, he shall also be the last, victim. We mean that the iniquitous state of the law which condemned him to twelve months' imprisonment shall soon be changed so that such an imprisonment shall be an impossibility. I wish to remind Mr. Foote that in this movement for the abolition of the blasphemy laws—a movement with which his name will always be chiefly associated—there are many workers to be found in the ranks of the faith that has been disgraced by his persecution. I specially mention the great services rendered by Mr. Stewart Headlam, by Canon Shuttleworth, and also by Mr. Verinder and those associated with him in the Guild of St. Matthew. I will not presume to stand between you and Mr. Foote another moment; but I will simply repeat my assurance of sympathy, and my determination to press on in the work we hav undertaken, so that Judge North, and any other judge like him, shall hav no opportunity of again disgracing English justice.

Mr. Foote, whose rising was the sign for great cheering, said:

Friends—for I think I may call you so who hav assembled to giv me such a hearty and enthusiastic greeting this morning—I perceive that my friends, Mr. Bradlaugh and the Rev. W. Sharman, are in excellent form. They hav not had the disadvantage I hav labored under of being out of practice for twelve months. The prison rule is silence. Fortunately, nowadays, the silence is not perpetual as it was in old times, and when a man is outside the prison walls there is no law that I am acquainted with to gag him. I hav looked forward to meeting my friends and the lovers of Freethought and justice from the very moment I entered those subterranean apartments which lie beneath the dock of the Old Bailey. I heard then the roar through the thickness of the walls and the earth of an indignant crowd of my fellow-countrymen outside and to-day I am privileged to hear more than their indignation; I am privileged to hear the voice of their acknowledgment that when I stood before a judge who so far forgot the dignity of the bench as to act as counsel for the prosecution, I did not altogether disgrace the cause which I had the honor then to represent. If I were to consult my own feelings instead of the calendar, I should say I had been in jail twelve years instead of twelve months. To the ordinary criminal confinement is painful; to a man accustomed to such an activ bodily and intellectual life as I enjoyed, such confinement was simply horrid. But still, Freethinkers, as Mr. Bradlaugh's enemies hav found, take a deal of killing, and I am happy to say that, although naturally my imprisonment has somewhat reduced my dimensions, I am still not unwell, and I mean, with a due regard to my health, to plunge at once into the work which Mr. Justice North—or perhaps I should say Judge North—took me, and from which Jailer Harcourt has ever since kept me.

I hav been for twelve months locked up, day and night, in a brick vault about twice the size of a grave, and nearly as somber. It is quite a treat to see daylight. My time has not been altogether wasted, it is true; so far as the prison light permitted, I hav read a good many books. I hav made use of my time for study ever since the commissioners allowed me to hav books; and, so far as I could, I hav done justice to what victuals were provided me. There is a deal of monotony, you know, in having exactly the same thing for breakfast every day, exactly the same thing for dinner, and exactly the same thing for tea—especially tea—for I can assure you that until I drank the very excellent cup of tea provided for me here this morning, I did not know how bad prison tea was. Now, I hav been imprisoned in a felon's cell for twelve months without having committed a crime. I hav deliberately never injured man, woman, or child. And permit me to say that if the law of a country will imprison men who are guilty of no real crime, it is not the alleged criminal, but the law, which must bear the disgrace. During the whole of that time I hav been able to ponder the glorious truth that England is a free country. My friends, you frequently hear this boasted of on platforms, especially before a general election; but it is not quite true. Mr. Bradlaugh, although for the fourth time, as I am happy to hear, elected by the same constituency to the same Parliament, cannot get inside because, as I heard one of the rough, uneducated prisoners say in Holloway jail, the men in the House of Commons—to use his very expressiv words—"is like a lot o' kids." Well, it is idle to talk about a free country so long as Mr. Bradlaugh cannot take the seat to which he is entitled. It is idle to talk of a free country when we hav Mr. Truelove here this morning, who suffered four months of horrible imprisonment for a man of his age, for simply giving publicity to ideas which every man should hav the right to publish. Nay, it was not very long before that that Mr. Bradlaugh and Mrs. Besant were both within the very shadow of the walls of a jail, and only secured exemption from imprisonment by a very happy legal technicality, which did not in my case arise, because, profiting by their fault in drawing up the indictment against Mr. Bradlaugh, they took care to make mine all correct. And I say, too, it is nonsense to talk about England being a free country while men and women such as I see before me now, and such as I saw outside Holloway Jail, hav to welcome a prisoner from imprisonment for no crime. I hav pondered that truth for twelve months, and I can assure you it is profoundly impressed on my mind, Shall we as Freethinkers and Radicals, and justice-loving English people, submit to this? I, for one, fresh from the horrors of a Christian jail, say No! Now let me say a word or two—and only a word or two—about the trials and their results. One grand result was the recognition by the Lord Chief Justice of England of the fact that Freethinkers are entitled to courtesy. Unfortunately another judge—whose name would scarcely be known except it had figured in connection with the blasphemy trials—had shown an opposit example; but Lord Coleridge told the jury, and showed by his own example in court, that Freethinkers were entitled to courtesy, and what is more, that they were entitled to justice. I do not, however, wish anyone to understand that I consider freedom of thought is in any safer position because of the judgment of Lord Coleridge. It was a very humane decision; but it was one which makes it possible for any unscrupulous judge in the future to play fast and loose with the principle of persecution and the principle of freedom, and persuade a jury that they may send a Freethinker to jail, not because he has impugned their opinions, but because he has outraged their taste. And I am afraid the ordinary common jury of the Old Bailey, consisting perhaps—with no disrespect to those trades, but with a recognition that men in those trades hav not usually much time to study the niceties of free speech—I say it is to be expected that a jury consisting of half a dozen green grocers and half a dozen tallow-chandlers should easily take the judge's view, and send a man to jail simply because they do not happen to like the cut of his opinions. One grand result, however, is that Mr. Justice Stephen has drafted a bill for abolishing these laws. In a memorable conversation in Shakspere a question was asked: "Stands Scotland where it did?" Fortunately, I hav not got to ask whether Justice North stands or sits where he did. I say stands or sits, because during the trial he stood about as much as he sat. He is removed to another sphere, I am happy to know, where both his bigotry and his eccentricities, while they may possibly inflict injury on the rights or property of his fellow-countrymen, can no longer endanger either their liberties or their lives. Judge North sent me to jail; Jailer Harcourt has kept me there. I wish it to be distinctly understood that no mitigation of the rigor of my sentence has ever come from Sir William Harcourt. I hav had books to read during the last nine months simply by the kindness of the commissioners. When on my entering jail I wrote to Sir William Harcourt on an official sheet of paper, asking amongst other things that I might hav books to read, the cold, formal reply came a month later that the secretary of state for the Home Department saw no reason to accede to my request. I hav had some change in diet; but I had the ordinary prison fare until after my trial before Lord Coleridge; and I owe nothing of this to Sir William Harcourt. I owe it to the kindness, rather, I will add, to the lofty humanity of Lord Coleridge, and the voice of public opinion throughout the country which had even reached the ears of people within the walls of Holloway Jail. Sir William Harcourt, not satisfied with maintaining the rigor of our imprisonment so far as he could, took the opportunity of libeling us in the House of Commons —a position where a man can be as libelous as he pleases without any danger. There is not a word of truth about Sir William Harcourt's statement that we were imprisoned for indecent libel. If we published an indecent libel, why did they not prosecute us for that? They knew they had no case. They prosecuted us for a blasphemous libel; and it is a villainous thing that, in order to justify himself, a member of a "Liberal" ministry, who looks after prisoners and another class of people of the opposit sex, beginning with a p, and who may be called, considering his duties, the common scavenger of the government, should be able, from the shelter of his official position, to libel men who at any rate hav shown their readiness to make some sacrifice for their principles, which I do not think he ever showed much readiness to do. Of my treatment in jail I hav already said something. I must, however, add that I shall ever bear a grateful recollection of Colonel Milman, the governor of Holloway Jail, who has shown himself throughout a gallant gentleman. The doctor also has done his very best for me, as well as for my fellow-prisoners. Of the chaplain I may say that he was so much exasperated and cut up by the reception which my friend Mr. Ramsey met with on his release that he has thought it prudent to go away for the benefit of his health. His visits to me in jail were not like angel's visits—few and far between. Shortly before the time when I was entitled to read books—when I had been in prison two months—he called, promising to let me hav some books fit to read; but I never saw anything of him after the time that I was entitled to them, and on the whole, I am very glad that I was under no obligation to him. I hav studied pretty thoroughly the operation of his teaching and the doctrins of his faith on prisoners in Holloway jail, and I shall hav an opportunity of saying something on that on Wednesday evening. The chaplain is a gentleman very anxious, according to his own account, to be "at home in heaven," as he phrases it, and yet he is always particularly anxious about his health. During the twelve months of my imprisonment he has had about three months' leave of absence. On the last occasion, when he addressed us before leaving the jail for the seaside, he stated he was going away to see what the Lord intended to do with him—and I hav heard several of the prisoners in their muttered conversations wonder what the Lord was doing with him. But I will leave him, contenting myself with repeating what I hav already said, that I am exceedingly glad I am under no obligation to him. There has been a great gain, I am glad to know, to our cause. The "blood of the martyrs," it was said, was the "seed of the church;" and we know very well that all persecution, unless it absolutely exterminates, must giv more strength and fervor to the persecuted party, and I verily believe that if our opponents will only continue to persecute us for a whole generation, we shall hav won a decided and irreversible victory over them. Mr. Bradlaugh has well said that no such greeting as this welcomed men in bygone days who suffered for Freethought. True, and it is a melancholy reflection; but it has also its bright side—because if such a welcome as I hav met with this morning is possible now, it shows that our principles are spreading. It shows that it is considered no longer a disgrace to testify one's love, not only of freedom, but of the principles that are activly assailed by those who profess themselvs lovers of freedom. There has been a great gain to our cause, and I hope I shall liv long enough to assist in a still greater gain to our cause. I thank you, friends, for the welcome you hav given me this morning. You will never know, until you stay twelve months in Holloway jail, the great joyous truth of Robert Burns's saying, "Liberty's a glorious feast"—the most glorious of all feasts. I thank you for your greeting. I am not played out. I am thinner. The doctor told me I had lost two stone, and I believe it. But I do not think the timbers of the ship after all are much injured. The rogues ran me aground, but they never made me haul down the flag. Now I am floated again I mean to let the old flag stream out on the wind as before. I mean to join the rest of our fleet in fighting the pirates and slavers on the high seas of thought. Mr. Justice North might hav thought that he was silencing Freethought at the Old Bailey; he might also perhaps hav thought that he was silencing or at least converting me; but he has done nothing of the kind. He has not silenced Freethought, because that is a task which a million Norths would fail before. He has not silenced me, because I am speaking to you in the same old strain this morning, and I hope that health and strength will be mine to go from one end of the country to the other to ask my fellow-countrymen what they think of my imprisonment. I shall ask them whether they do not think that the persecuted cause, which always, so far as I am aware, speaks out on behalf of the most precious rights of humanity, should hav a warmer place in the affections of all men and women who contribute something to the national greatness by the sweat of their brows or the labor of their brains, than the parties who simply liv upon the fruits of others' industry and use old effete principles and bygone, but not yet utterly dead, prejudices, to cripple those they hav not the strength to meet in a free and open encounter.

The meeting dispersed after giving three cheers for Mr. Foote. We may now ask ourselvs, "With whom lies the victory?" With the men who think that free inquiry and investigation can be stifled and suppressed by shutting up in prison for a year a man holding dangerous opinions? I think not. Rather with the man who, having suffered a cruel imprisonment, returns to activ life prepared to strike yet harder, to struggle yet more strenuously, to fight yet more energetically, against the creed which, though it cannot kill, is yet willing to strike the blow which, in its weakness, recoils upon itself. But we may console ourselvs with the conviction that, the tendency of the times is against persecution for matters of opinion, and that every blow aimed at Freethinkers is merely another nail in the coffin of orthodoxy. As Shelley says:

"Think not the tyrants will rule forever,
Or the priests of the bloody faith;
They stand by the brink of that mighty river
Whose waves they hav tainted with death.
It is fed from the depth of a thousand dells;
Around them it surges, it foams, and it swells;
And their swords and their scepters I floating see
Like wrecks on the surge of eternity."

ROBERT YOUNG.

The Liberal Club.

The lecture before the Manhattan Liberal Club on the evening of Friday, the 14th, was of the kind upon which there is no discount. It was delivered by the Rev. Mr. Gallagher, who is pastor of a Unitarian church in this city. His subject was "Mormons and Mormondom." Mr. Gallagher is a young man and a good declaimer. There is something of the actor and a good deal of the preacher about him, but the general effect of his style is agreeable. He was for several years a resident of Utah, and his testimony against Mormonism was that of an eye-witness. He read his lecture from manuscript, contrary to his custom, he said, because he had heard that speakers before the Liberal Club were held accountable for the deeds done in that body, and he wished to be accurate. Mr. Gallagher gave a brief outline of the life of Joseph Smith, the founder of Mormonism. He believed that Smith was actuated by a conviction that he was born for some great work, and that this conviction carried him through difficulties which would hav crushed him under any other circumstances. The worldly success of the Mormon people, the speaker said, was due to the practical nature of their religion, which was half superstition and half political economy. The priest tells his hearer how to raise good crops as well as how to save his soul. Mormon proselytism is carried on in foreign countries by the grossest misrepresentation. The missionaries hold up the most promising prospects to converts. Two young women of Mr. Gallagher's church at Salt Lake City told him that the missionary who brought them over from Europe related marvelous tales of the fertility of the soil in Utah. The missionary told them that upon the hillsides the honey bees fastened their comb, and that the cows, feeding upon the luxuriant vegetation, secreted so much milk that it dripped from their udders. The products of the cows and bees running down the mountain side together made Utah a land literally flowing with milk and honey. The poor girls were sadly disappointed when they came in sight of the arid Wasatch mountains, where a bee would die of melancholy and a cow would starve. The Mormons, the speaker said, were consummate liars and would not hesitate to perjure themselvs in the interests of their religion. The condition of women was that of the utmost degradation. Every natural instinct of womanhood and motherhood was crushed out. Still the women were the stanchest supporters of the priesthood. Mr. Gallagher could not account for this fact. He knew of a laborer who made about two dollars a day, and who had four wives. He did not support any of them. He boarded around a week at a time with each, and they had to provide for themselvs. This was the average condition of poor Mormons who were polygamists. Mr. Gallagher was firm in the belief that polygamy should be suppressed. He would confiscate the property of polygamists, giv one-half the proceeds to the public school fund, and the other half to the first and only legal wife. A renewal of the polygamous relations with either of the other wives he would punish as a crime. He would further make Mormons ineligible to any public office. A large number of other repressiv measures were also recommended by the speaker, together with various precautionary methods to make it impossible for either Mormon or gentile men and women to liv together in Utah or elsewhere as man and wife without having been legally married. The family, the speaker held, was the foundation of the republic, and loose marriage and divorce laws were inimical to our institutions.

At the termination of Mr. Gallagher's lecture a resolution was passed urging the governor to veto the bill which has passed the New York legislature making Good Friday a legal holiday.

Professor Eccles then took the floor. He could think of no more effectiv method of killing Mormonism than to induce every disciple of Joseph Smith to read the Book of Mormon. It was so full of absurdities and contradictions that no one could believe it after reading. The miracles of the Bible were a mere bagatelle compared with those of this book. To effect the decease of polygamy Mr. Eccles would recommend that every male Mormon should be forced to take a plurality of wives. They pretend to believe polygamy is necessary to salvation. Let us, then, compel every Mormon to be saved. Mr. Eccles said further that he did not see how we could consistently suppress polygamy in Utah while we had an Elizabeth street in New York.

Mr. Langerfelt thought it would be a great joke for our legislators at Washington to make laws restricting Mormons to the practice of one wife. He liked the economic part of Mormonism. It was the best thing in the country. But the Mormons had a monopoly of wives, and he could not abide monopoly in any form.

Mr. Andrews, when he stepped upon the platform, was received with a brave round of applause. He had been absent from the two previous meetings, on account of indisposition, and the cheering was the way the club had of showing they were glad to see he had got the better of the rheumatism. Mr. Andrews said that the reverend orator had been very candid and lucid in his statements; nevertheless, whoever came upon that platform did so for the purpose and at the risk of receiving whatever criticism might suggest itself to the minds of others. Mr. Andrews's remarks were so appropriate, and withal so valuable, that, contrary to the custom in these reports, they are given nearly entire. He said:

Notwithstanding what has been said and conceded in favor of the economical administration of the Mormon people, the burden of the discourse we hav listened to was that Mormonism is a foul blot upon the otherwise fair escutcheon of these United States and of the nineteenth century, and that it should be suppressed, not, the speaker thinks, by the shot-gun policy, but by stringent legislation, which is, after all, the ballot with the bullet just back of it. Now I stand here for the purpose of presenting the subject from a different point of view. In a very important and governing sense Mormonism is, in my judgment, one of the most precious and desirable facts in the history of the last half century. It is a precious boon to the age we liv in. It holds the mirror up to nature. It shows us precisely, here and now, the whole method and process by which a religion, founded upon faith in the supernatural, takes its rise in the subjectiv illumination of a single individual; in the credit given to his visions, illuminations, and authoritativ utterances by a little handful of impressionable and zealous apostles; in the gradual consolidation of this primitiv band of leaders into a powerful hierarchy and organized priesthood, believed in, submitted to, implicitly accepted, obeyed, and devoutly served by the still blinder and more ignorant masses, until an organization more powerful than any army; more powerful, it may be, than any civil government; more powerful, it may be, for a time, than all the enlightened, best interests of humanity, arises and establishes itself under the name of a church.

Now Mormonism has given us, during the last half century, right here, in present modern time, the opportunity to witness the precise way of this immense phenomenon. One hundred years ago nobody knew, or could know, what we now know of the engendering, gestation, and ultimate evolution of a great religious movement. Mormonism has contributed to us that knowledge. It is now easy to see what was before almost wholly hidden in or beyond the murky depths of past history, that every religion has arisen, grown, and unfolded itself in the same way; on the basis of faith, and specifically on the basis of faith in the subjectiv illumination of some individual man or woman. The instances of this remarkable evolution sufficiently modern to be somewhat known to us are Buddhism, Christianism, Mohammedanism, Shakerism, and Mormonism. The most modern, the most distinctivly pronounced to our observation, the most important, therefore, for us, is Mormonism. We could not afford to be without Mormonism. It is Mormonism that is going to show all the other great religious corporations precisely what they are and where they stand. They all build upon the same foundation. They are all tarred with the same stick. Moses, Abraham, and Joseph Smith are in no essential particular different from each other. Abraham was the ancient "father of the faithful," Joseph Smith the modern. Abraham heard God speak within him, commanding him to murder his own son, and was ready to do it, as Freeman, of Massachusetts, murdered his own daughter. That one fact marked him as father of the faithful and founded three of the great dominating religions of the world, Judaism, Christianism, and Mohammedanism. The same one voice from heaven, heard only in the secret vaults of an indviidual human mind, has founded, heretofore, all the great religious organizations. The basis of the whole thing is the exact opposit of objectiv observation, inductiv reasoning, rational reflection, and scientific instruction. The true orders of development are the exact antitheses of each other.

And now come the other branches of the same tree, the other religious organizations and churches of the land, proposing to resort to their old, exploded, discarded, un-American, and damnable method of persecution, by shot and shell, by bullet and ballot, by compulsion and incarceration, to extinguish Mormonism. It must be the Freethinkers, Liberals, the men who hav a rational as against an inspirational basis, who shall be called in to keep the peace, to defend Americanism as a principle, to insist upon absolute fair play for all.

It is said that Mormonism is a threat against the well-being, continuance, and success of the American experiment in free government. That is undoubtedly true; but in that respect it is nowise different from Catholicism, nor indeed from any and every other religious organization based upon a supernatural allegiance. Indeed, in America, every man who is not an ultra-radical is a secret enemy and a foreigner!

Nay, indeed, we could not afford to be without Mormonism. It shows us what every supernatural religion really is. It will in the end show all the supernatural religions to one another as they are. It is as rich a donation from fate to the nineteenth century as the art of daguerreotyping. It shows the spiritual faces of the religious sects to one another, precisely as the daguerreotype shows our physical countenances—marred, malformed, and mangy as they may happen to be. Yes, let them try it on. Let them persecute the Mormons here and now, right in the brilliant focus of this luminous and progressiv age. Every torch they light will kindle a fire in the roofs of their own edifices. Every blow they strike will recoil upon their own heads. The socialistic day of judgment is at hand. All parties must learn by some disciplin or other to stand upon a basis of equal rights, and to leave to others the same freedom which they claim for themselvs.

The discourse of to-night has failed to place the subject upon any fundamental principle. It was assumed by the reverend orator, without any justification, that our American institutions rest upon monogamy, and that monogamy rests upon Christianity. Neither position is true. Americanism to be true to the grandeur of its fundamental conception should be able to accommodate, to test, and impartially to compare every possible variety of the relation of the sexes, and all other social relations. It in no manner whatsoever rests upon monogamy any more than it rests upon old-bachelorhood, old-maidism, Shakerism, or Oneida-perfectionism. And in the next place it is not true that monogamy itself rests in any proper sense upon Christianity. That has been assumed and said by the Christian teachers, and generally believed in; but modern historical criticism is opening our eyes to new views of old facts. Polygamy prevailed throughout Southern Asia and Europe, including Judea, at the time of Christ. It was neither reproved nor reformed by him. Monogamy came in chiefly through the Teuton or German influence from the North. It was thoroughly established there, and the complete equality of women with men practically realized by these people before Christianity rose to be a power in the world. The most that can be said for Christianity is that it adopted monogamy, and enforced it with a rigor which has made it, in turn, an intolerable tyranny, when united, as it was, with the religious spirit of bigotry and persecution. The moment that we put arbitrary limits upon freedom there is no freedom. Another reason why we cannot spare Mormonism is that American liberty is a great deal safer with two, five, or a dozen great competing hierarchies in our midst than if there were only one. The freedom we hav achieved in America is very greatly due to the numerousness of our religious sects. They hav mutually checkmated each other, and given the opportunity for the growth of freedom which the predominance of any single sect effectually would hav suppressed. So now we are safer with Mormonism and Romanism as both hostil to Americanism than we should be with either alone.

Mr. Gallagher, in replying, said the criticisms that had been made upon the Bible and the church rolled off like water from a duck's back when thrown at him. He did not believe that the Bible was infallibly inspired. He did not believe, either, that Christ would ever come again to reign upon earth. Thank God, he belonged to a church that was as free as the wind. He was bound by no creed. Mr. Andrews had said that he (Mr. Gallagher) had based the subject upon no fundamental principle. Well, he might hav gone through a process of induction and deduction; but he believed he was before an audience that wanted facts. That was all he had aimed to giv them. Polygamy could never furnish us the mental and physical manhood that was the result of monogamy. It had never produced, for instance, a man like the chairman. "Look," said Mr. Gallagher, "at that robust form—those muscles." (Mr. Wakeman extended his arms and felt of his biceps). "These," continued the speaker, "would be impossible under a system of polygamic marriage." He did not condemn polygamy on religious grounds, but because it degraded woman, deprived her of all she had a right to claim from man, and destroyed the home, the most sacred spot on earth.

J. W. Stillman, Esq., is engaged for the next meeting of the club. He will discuss Mormonism from a constitutional point of view.

Woman Suffrage and Prohibition.

I do not know what the attitude, strictly speaking, of the woman suffragists is toward the question of prohibition. I believe that as a rule women are in favor of prohibitory laws as applied to the sale of liquor. This is shown by several recent events, among others the threat of a woman suffrage speaker that the Republicans of Indiana must giv that state good temperance laws or the party must die. Now, to my mind, this meddling with the question of prohibition is the gravest error that our lady would-be voters could commit. It hardly becomes a class struggling for their own liberties to clamor so loudly for laws restricting the liberties of others.

To the understanding of those who look at both the measure and the outcome, woman suffrage and prohibition alike hav their difficulties. Woman suffrage is right in principle—against this statement there is no argument that holds good; but men who see the inevitable effect of extending the electiv franchise to woman cannot experience the enthusiasm which the justness of woman's demands would arouse if the case were different. The majority of women are pious. That mental affliction called spirituality is, on the average, more pronounced in woman than in man. She is therefore naturally more "religious" than he. Left to herself, she will forget to reason when once her sympathies are enlisted in any direction. If the Constitution stands in her way, she classes it with the other obstacles as something to be surmounted. There are exceptions to this rule; the lady contributors to THE TRUTH SEEKER may be among them. Given legislativ power, and what disaster would not emotional and superstitious woman precipitate upon this country? At the suggestion of priests the Jewish Jehovah would find his way into our national Constitution at as early a date as the provisions of that instrument concerning amendments would permit. This is a consummation devoutly to be dreaded; yet who can doubt that the supporters of a waning superstition would take advantage of their influence over women to bring it about through the ballot?

Up to this time, I believe, woman suffragists, through their representativs, hav not pronounced upon this God-in-the-Constitution question, but their advocacy of prohibition indicates which way their sympathies tend. Prohibition is essentially a church movement. Religious people are natural-born suppressors.

Freethinking women who are also woman's rights advocates admit that pious women would probably at first make of their newly-gained privilege the intemperate use of which I hav spoken, but urge that liberty must be its own corrector. They will not, however, apply the same reasoning to the matter of intemperance in the use of alcoholic liquors, or even of tobacco, the indulgence in which, I hav no doubt, they would prohibit with equal promptness. I sincerely hope that women may gain their rights, but it is still more desirable that they should first acquire a proper appreciation of the rights of others and how to exercise their own.

As to the difficulties of prohibition, they originate with the principle upon which the movement is founded. That principle is wrong, though the effect sought after is indisputably good. If the sale of liquor can be legally prohibited, so can that of tobacco, tea, coffee, candy, corsets, tight boots, and high-heeled shoes—all of which are said to be evils; and with vegetarians in the ascendancy, meat, butter, spices, in fact, the larger part of the grocer's stock in trade. When the first and greatest of these evils (liquor) shall hav been legislated out of the market, these natural-born suppressors will turn upon that which the loudest-mouthed may deem next in importance. There can be no logical stopping-place for prohibitionists until the American citizen is restricted by law to a diet of oatmeal and cold water.

Thus we see that in woman suffrage and prohibition two opposing movements strike hands—the one for more liberty, the other for less; the one founded on justice, yet destined to work immediate and almost irreparable harm; the other based upon a pernicious principle, and at the same time calculated to do at once, if practicable, immeasurable good. How can the patriot and reformer do otherwise than hold his judgment in suspense? I move you, Mr. Editor, that both motions be laid upon the table.

GEORGE MACDONALD.

To Go or Not to Go; That's the Question.

DEAR TRUTH SEEKERS: Ever since Mr. Lacy spoke in THE TRUTH SEEKER about having me go somewhere and see slate-writing and other phenomena of Spiritualism I hav been receiving letters from one and another urging me to go, and some offering me assistance to do so. I hav received a letter from Mr. Lacy this week saying he will send me twenty-five dollars towards paying my expenses whenever I am ready to start, and Mr. Slenker's sister offers to keep house for me while I am gone, so if there are enough of you who feel a sufficient interest in having me go to New York or Boston and stay a week or two and visit some of the prominent mediums, writing out for THE TRUTH SEEKER precisely what I see, experience, and think of it all, I will agree to go if you will furnish the funds. It will be of no personal profit to me, and hence I do not object to receiving the needed help, as I shall use it in the advancement of light, truth, and knowledge. A dollar or two from each one of those who hav been asking me to go will be amply sufficient.

All contributions will be acknowledged in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and should circumstances or lack of funds prevent me from going the money will be held in trust for the donor and at his or her disposal.

I would like to go as early as June so as to be there before the intense heat of summer. I think you all know me well enough to be sure that I shall deal fairly and honestly all around and make no attempt to evade the truth, let facts, or seeming facts, go for or against my present ideas or prejudices.

Address Elmina D. Slenker, Snowville, Va.

Truly, ELMINA.

Mr. Greene and Mr. Truesdell's $500.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Permit me to suggest to Mr. C. H. Greene (see THE TRUTH SEEKER of Feb. 16th) the policy of verifying the wonderful slate-writing mediumship of Mr. W. A. Mansfield by accepting and winning the $500 offered by Mr. Truesdell, rather than "designate 'Bottom Facts' as a misnomer." By so doing he will prove the falsity of "Bottom Facts" and its author, gain $500, establish the reputation of his medium, and, above all, furnish to Spiritualism and one of its main supports—slate-writing—one of the best tests the world has ever known. Please try it, Messrs. Greene and Mansfield. I am impatient to hav Mr. Truesdell lose that money. ELLA E. GIBSON.

The Author of the Junius Letters.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: With honor and respect to the name and memory of Thomas Paine, of revolutionary fame, for his political and religious teaching to mankind, we cannot with any reasonable acknowledgment confer the honor of the letters of Junius upon Thomas Paine. Sir Philip Francis, a member of the British Parliament, and an activ promoter of the articles of impeachment of Warren Hastings, was considered by some as the author of Junius's letters. He died in 1818. Hugh Boyd was born in Ireland, in 1746, and educated at Trinity College, Dublin, and bred to the law; but being of a dissipated turn, he abandoned his profession. Having formed connections in England, he went to London, and through the introduction of Mr. Richard Burke became acquainted with the most celebrated literary characters. In 1772 he married a lady of considerable fortune. He was author of several political writings, and the celebrated "Letters of Junius." He accompanied Lord Macartney to India in the capacity of a second secretary. In 1793 he published the Indian Observer, a periodical paper, which was the first attempt of the kind in India, and gained him a great reputation. These essays were afterward collected and printed at Calcutta, in 8vo, 1795, and reprinted in London, 1798. He died in 1794, the year after he published the Indian Observer.

St. Joseph, Mo. M. H. BLACKFORD.

Two Opinions of S. W. Dorsey.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I was not a little surprised on reading your article on "How Garfield Carried Indiana." You must hav a very mean opinion of Garfield to take so readily the word of a notorious public plunderer, which, if true, proves Garfield to hav been not only a fool, but the vilest of human kind. Was Garfield so simple as not to know that every letter he wrote when a candidate for the presidency would be made public? If S. W. Dorsey ever received such letters as he speaks of, why does he not show them or publish them? That would clinch the matter. If he (Dorsey) was despicable enough to be Garfield's agent in such "dirty depths," let him prove it by producing the letters. He can sink no lower himself. S. STEBBINS.

From the New York Sun of Feb. 25, 1884.

"It is only justice to him [Dorsey] to say that we hav never seen any evidence that he would tell a falsehood for any purpose whatever."

Obituary.

Died, at Mountain View, Cal., Feb. 8, E.M. 284, Evan Jenkins, aged 55 years.

He was a Freethinker during his lifetime. The death-bed terrors, as described by the elect of God, came not on the dying Infidel. His close of life was as peaceful as could be expected considering the nature of his disease, and the pain and suffering it caused; life passed away almost as smoothly as the "coming of the dawn."

"Thou grim king of terrors, thou, life's gloomy foe,
Go frighten the coward and slave;
Go teach them to tremble, fell tyrant! but know
No terrors hast thou for the brave."

Lectures and Meetings.

THE Liberals of Leavenworth, Kan., hav secured the Rev. A. E. Higgins, who recently renounced orthodoxy, to occupy the platform of their lecture-room for the ensuing year.

MR. CHARLES WATTS expects to again visit this country on a lecturing tour. He will probably arrive in August. Friends desiring to engage him may address him now at his English home, 74 Herne Hill Road, Loughboro Junction, London S.E.

THE world moves! Within three weeks J. E. Remsburg has lectured in six churches, at Laura, O., Chesterfield, Ind., and Union, Nunda, Hainesville, and McHenry, Ill. Mr. Remsburg will be in Moline, Ill., March 17th; Wyoming, Ill., 18th, 19th, and 20th; Hannibal, Mo., 21st; Leon, Iowa, 22d, and 23d; Corning, Iowa, 24th, 25th, and 26th.

MR. CHAINEY lectured again in New York on the evening of Sunday, the 16th. There was a full house. Mr. Chainey's subject on this occasion was the "Life and Teachings of Ingersoll." He had intended, he said, to make his lecture somewhat descriptiv of Mr. Ingersoll's career, but he had learned that the colonel desired his friends to say as little about his deeds as possible, but to let his ideas stand upon their merits independently of what he might do or not do. Therefore the speaker mentioned in this direction only the fact that Col. Ingersoll was the son of an orthodox minister, and in early life commenced practicing at the bar. The lecture consisted largely of extracts from Ingersoll's writings, and as Mr. Chainey as a reader is scarcely inferior to the author himself, the effect was fine. The world made a mistake, the speaker said, in denominating everything in the line of Ingersoll's teachings "Ingersollism." Freethought was not the effect of Ingersoll, but Ingersoll was the effect of Freethought. As without the stage and the writers of plays who preceded him a Shakspere would hav been impossible, so without Freethought and men like Voltaire and Paine in the past no Ingersoll would exist in the present. The destructiv work of Freethought, Mr. Chainey added, was nearly accomplished. The majority of intellects worth gathering to the Liberal fold had been gathered. Those who had not heard Freethought lecturers were generally too stupid to be benefited if they should hear one. People in Boston who a few years before applauded to the echo the speaker's attacks on Christianity now took no interest in the movement whatever. Mr. Chainey's lecture was well received and the applause frequent, and at the close a satisfactory collection was taken up. The fourth Sunday in April Mr. Chainey will return and speak upon "The Genius of Shakspere and its Relations to Secularism."

Vivisection Philosophy in the Whole Shell.

The letters which THE TRUTH SEEKER continues to receive and publish concerning vivisection show that there is more interest in the subject among its readers than I imagined, and as the poet and sentimentalist has been favored with another full page, room may be found for a plain statement from a matter-of-fact young man. As usual, folks who are so horrified by the infliction of pain upon animals lose sight of the sufferings of us poor mortals—especially mine.

Mr. Pinney and others say cruel things without any thought of my feelings. Mr. Tompkins doesn't believe I can hav a disposition above a hyena or jackal, and Mr. Preston spares neither myself nor his own friends, for he must see how much pain he is inflicting upon Mattie C. Mitchell and other sympathetic women by the recital of vivisection atrocities.

Of course, I squirm, and if you will permit me, I will offer my protest against the tortures so inhumanely inflicted upon me by your correspondents, whom I would like to call my friends.

It is now evident that I hav been deliberately walking into hot water, and hav taken again an unpopular side. To one who is theologically, politically, and medically a come-outer, it is no new thing to find himself unpopular and stemming against the tide of public opinion; but in this matter I do experience a new sensation in being on the side of success, for as yet the anti-vivisectors hav not succeeded in convincing legislatures of the necessity for, or wisdom of, enacting laws for the suppression of vivisection.

In the state of New York Henry Bergh, with all his power of organized society backed by abundant funds, has not obtained the law he worked for, and only of late the Prussian parliament has refused a petition which only asked for the prevention of vivisection as a means of instruction in public educational institutions. This opens up another point of view, and a thorough discussion of vivisection would include a separate consideration of vivisection in four phases, with and without anesthetics, and whether it may be carried on for discovery only or for instruction also.

Personally I am one who would not needlessly set foot upon a worm, and am by nature so constituted that the "living, conscious, quivering flesh" which casts such a shudder through Mattie C. Mitchell, affects me similarly, but fortunately I am not submerged by my sympathies, and in spite of a natural reluctance to cause pain, I hav in the dispensaries of this city, where anesthetics were not provided for small operations, been the means of causing a great deal of immediate pain, and an immense amount of lasting benefit and relief, and in no single operation is this better illustrated than in the deep cutting of a felon. Were I to describe such things in detail, as Mr. Preston does the pains of vivisection, or were I able to put them in blank verse, no doubt I could cause as many cold chills down the spine as do his essays.

Mr. Preston might be able to fill every page of THE TRUTH SEEKER with accounts of the horrible things which hav been done in the name of vivisection, and yet what I hav said in previous communications is true—that they are all insignificant in comparison to the horrors of sport, butchery, and fashion. Please remember that I hav not contended that "two wrongs make a right," and my main protest heretofore has simply been that those who hav time and strength to devote to reforms can find more pressing, important, and deserving ones than this.

Claude Bernard's experiment with live animals in a stove, baking them to death, is done once where boiling a live lobster is done ten thousand times, and in this city there hav been within ten years several hundred of human beings subjected to the same torture from carelessness and negligence as criminal as was Bernard's sang froid. Hotel servants, factory girls, and "our best society" (packed in theaters) hav been consumed in fires where there was no means of escape, and therefore I say that before there is a society for the suppression of vivisection, I hope to see societies formed whose objects shall be to discourage—

1. The killing of game for sport.
2. The wearing of birds on bonnets.
3. The dropping of live lobsters into hot water.
4. The brutal slaughter of animals for food.
5. The possibility of "great loss of life" through human negligence and greed.

Mattie C. Mitchell (whether Miss or Mrs. I know not, and to avoid offense use neither) is evidently wrought up to the pitch of doing something, and, if she has money in her purse, is doubtless ready to advance it for the good cause of crying down "this monstrous crime;" but let me quietly suggest that there is already a better and worthier purpose to which she can direct her enthusiasm and spare cash, and on page 153 of THE TRUTH SEEKER she will learn something of it. I refer, of course, to Prof. Adler's movement in the direction of tenement house reform, one result of which will be to prevent the possibility of burning whole families alive, which has been, and, under the present order of things in New York tenements, is likely to be a somewhat regular occurrence. The dangers of the cruel infliction of pain in this way are vastly greater than that any one in America will repeat the cooking experiments of Claude Bernard. If Mr. Preston had seen, as I hav, a human body cooked crisp, burnt alive, and distorted by muscular agony, he might write it up in lurid blank verse, and dedicate it to the souls of the wealthy and miserly owners of New York tenements.

To the lady's inquiry as to

WHERE VIVISECTION IS PRACTICED,

I can reply, right here in the medical colleges of New York; not in all, but in some special laboratories fitted up for the purpose, and one who has been among them can assure her that the operators are humane gentlemen who prefer to use anesthetics, not only because they hav no desire to cause needless pain, but also because most of their operations can best be done when the animal is unconscious. As you admit "the death of an animal is nothing, nor, if necessary, dissection after chloroform is administered," you accord to a majority of vivisectors (here, at least) all they ask. Having had a four years experience right in the headquarters of medical instruction in the United States, and during that time a pretty free run of its colleges, laboratories, and hospitals, I am fully convinced that any one with tender sensibilities can hav them more shocked by one day's visit to our hospitals, dispensaries, or tenements, than by a six months inspection of physiological laboratories; and as much better as man is than a sparrow, so much more important are activ and energetic efforts for the relief of his sufferings better than the expenditure of our sympathy on the lesser misfortunes that fall to the lot of animals.

MY KNOWLEDGE OF VIVISECTION

and its atrocities is based on what I hav seen and read. The former has not exasperated a naturally sympathetic mind, but what I hav read does, I admit, cause qualms. I hav no apology to offer or defense to make of "the abominable proceedings of Signor Paolo Mantegazza," which were evidently indulged from motivs described by Mr. Preston as the motivs of all vivisectors, viz., curiosity, innate cruelty, and ambition to surpass in feats of horror; but these are not the motivs of scientific men, nor is the brutal Italian a fair sample of scientific men, nor are his ways their ways; and such a man as Burt G. Wilder would denounce beyond measure such cruelty, though he is, perhaps, one of the most activ working naturalists to-day.

Cruelty from pure cussedness, or an inborn love of causing pain in other sensient creatures, is a relic of barbarism, which, like other human vices and evil propensities, is not yet civilized out of mankind, and that it should once hav been exhibited in a man who has, perhaps (I don't know that it is so), earned by talents the title of professor, is not strange in a world where thousands of cruelties are perpetrated every day; and when such "a devilish outrage" on a human being (in Corning, Ohio) as is described in THE TRUTH SEEKER before me can be done by the tools of the Catholic church, it is not, after all, so surprising that a man born and raised in the heart of Catholic church influences could exhibit a fiendish delight in the torture of animals, and making a record of his shame.

As I hav nowhere made the assertion that nothing wrong has been done in the name of vivisection, so the main point of contention between Mr. Preston and myself is as to the prevalence and relativ importance of the wrong thus committed; and as I hav said that my knowledge of such wrongs is derived from what I hav read, so I must say that this reading has been of articles written by essayists and sentimentalists, for whose exaggerations we must make considerable allowances; and when I read in Mr. Preston's first article that "entire factories hav been devoted to the production of vivisecting implements," I knew at once that he was writing for effect, to create a sensation, and not in the real interest of making the truth manifest, and until he shall name the factories, and giv the number of days devoted to the manufacture of such implements, and the number turned out per year, I shall knock off ninety per cent from his average statements. As Mr. Preston makes bold to accuse all vivisectors of three bad motivs, I will state what I consider their and they are, first, not idle curiosity, but an earnest desire to ascertain facts and increase useful knowledge—they are real truth seekers; second, not a love of cruelty, but a love of life in its best aspects, and a desire to lessen the sufferings ultimately of both men an animals; third, ambition, not to surpass in feats of horror, but a legitimate and laudable ambition to make a name in achievements for the advancement of scientific knowledge. It is certainly the busy truth seekers in all departments of science, the experimenters, the inventors, the plodders in the study of the facts and laws of nature, who hav given us all that we hav that is useful as the result of civilization; and the motivs of such men, in whatever field they operate, are not to be impugned by mere "literary fellers" who can wield a caustic pen, and write to make the worse appear the better reason.

When men of mark in the scientific world value their own life as less than the pursuit of knowledge, their motivs are above criticism, and the instances which could be collected are many. John Hunter inoculated himself with the worst form of venereal blood poison for the purpose of studying the disease, and to acquire knowledge of its symptoms and treatment. Only lately Dr. Cory, director of animal vaccination at the Vaccine Establishment, London, inoculated himself with syphilis while experimenting, to determin whether the disease could be conveyed by vaccination, and the conditions necessary to such conveyance. Within a year past commissions, each composed of competent medical men, one from Germany and one from France, hav been risking their own lives by conducting investigations of cholera in Egypt and India, and one of the French company has forfeited his life by the disease. The motivs are the same whether the experiments are conducted upon themselvs or upon animals, and in the study of the action of drugs and poisons the annals of medicin show that both methods are employed.

As Mr. Preston never tires of repeating that there is no

UTILITY IN VIVISECTION,

I will enter upon this subject. When I wrote that "to prove its utility would require more of my time and THE TRUTH SEEKER'S space than the subject is worth," I meant that to prove it positivly and satisfactorily to the average reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER would require more space than the paper could spare for such a purpose. It is no small matter to prove anything, and the kind and amount of proof required depend greatly on the condition of mind that is to be convinced in comparison with the thing to be proved. Those who hav had a liberal education in medicin and allied subjects are easily convinced of the utility of vivisection, and on this subject, therefore, I ask only space to state a few of the achievements of vivisection, as they are acknowledged by the vast majority of medical and scientific men, and they are properly the experts from whom legislativ bodies ask opinions when this subject is brought before them. Of Claude Bernard's dying confession* that no good had come of his experiments, I know nothing; but I do know that in every book on physiology the results of his experiments are referred to and utilized in the teaching of this very important subject. Prof. Dalton has written: "The information which has been acquired by the experimental method is so extensiv that without it medical science could never hav reached its present position. Every important discovery in physiology has been directly due to its employment, and the more modern advances in pathology, as well as many of those in practical medicin and surgery, hav only been made possible through the same means."

He cites among the most remarkable instances of its utility the following:

1. Almost everything we know of the circulation of the blood, of respiration, of the functions of the nervous system, and its relation to the vital organs.

2. The possibility of saving life by transfusion of blood, by artificial respiration, by operations for cure of aneurism, and by prophylactic means for prevention of germ or parasitic diseases.

I hav before me a list of forty discoveries of value to medical science and art, some of actual service to humanity already, which are convincing to me. To make them equally so to everyone would necessitate a general education in the line of physiology, which is not now provided, though it ought to be. Some idea of the utility of experiments on animals is likely to be conveyed in stating that our knowledge of tapeworms and trichinæ (pork parasites, now a cause of international contention), has been thus obtained; and in the domain of germ diseases, known to be the cause of a large mortality every year, everything is learned by this means; and without the study already prosecuted in this direction there would not hav been the advance in general sanitary procedures which has been brought about in the last fifty years, and which is the great saving movement of the present time. (Look for more in this line in my lecture on "Bacteria," now in print).

A thought in regard to class instruction by experiments on animals: The greatest strain to which my nerves were ever put by such experiment was in a demonstration of the sufferings of a pair of pigeons in close confinement from lack of air to breathe; and while I should prefer to remain away from such a sight again, I am free to confess that I believe the majority of us would be permanently benefited by seeing it just once; and the deeper the effect the better, for one of the most difficult things to impress upon the minds of a very large number of people is the necessity of plenty of good air by sufficient ventilation, and all the talking, writing, and directing done by physicians and sanitarians is apparently of little avail. People suffocate and wallow in their own filth (atmospherically), and don't know when they are hurt by it. If the pupils of every public school could for one minute see the distress which can be occasioned to a pigeon by insufficient and poisoned air, it would probably convey a lesson that would strike deep enough to last them a lifetime and save an immense amount of carelessness and suffering. The objection to such a lesson would be the bad example of cruelty, to minds that might not be able to appreciate the difference between such an infliction with and without a purpose, rather than the amount of suffering the pigeon would hav to endure, for that would be insignificant in comparison to the headaches the pupils take home every day from imperfect ventilation of school-rooms.

*It is, perhaps, as true as the oft-told stories of the death-bed recantations or Infidels.

Mr. Preston has no more justification for accusing me of slurring women than I hav to charge him with offering them blarney—or taffy, to use the most modern term. What "narrow and unmanly sentiment" hav I uttered? I hav no desire to treat women otherwise than justly, and in speaking of the "sympathetic sex," and so relating excess of sentiment with femininity, I speak as correctly as in associating cruelty with masculinity. While admitting the equality of the sexes, abstractly and potentially, I see that at present there are essential differences, and special virtues and vices dominant in each; so that while the most shocking cruelties are the result of the worst passions of men, the most sickly sentimentality is evidenced by some specimens of women, both of which statements were illustrated in the case of the negro Chastine Cox, who brutally murdered a woman, and then received visits of condolence and bouquets from women.

Men and women both need to cultivate intellect for the subjugation, control, and direction of feeling, sentiment, sympathy, and passion, and until they arrive at the higher plane in this direction they are not in a suitable frame of mind to hold consistent and rational views on a subject such as vivisection; and in the mean time we shall see one poet in most serious mood depicting the sufferings of a dog under vivisection, while another (Gilbert, the playwright) writes flippantly of "the coster-monger jumping on his mother," and women of estimable purpose and a life above reproach, so far as the infliction of pain on an animal is concerned, going about with a petition for the suppression of vivisection, and wearing a sealskin sack, which involves the necessity of clubbing infant seals to death while they rend the air with cries that are scarcely distinguishable from those of a child, and the mother-seals exhibit unavailing ferocity and anguish. Are they "thoughtless women," as you say, who wear birds on their bonnets, sealskin sacks on their backs, and drop living lobsters into boiling water? Yes, I admit it; and do "humane people deny themselvs," as you say, these luxuries? Not at all, or not much, at all events.

And so I end, as I began, by the broad, undeniable assertion that there are a hundred pressing and worthy reforms which ought to receive attention before the abuses of vivisection are taken in hand; and as folks at prayer-meeting send up requests for prayer, let me close with a few requests to Mr. Preston for poems which will provide appropriate matter for lurid description, activ imagination, and a gory pen:

1. Five thousand pigeons brought once a year from the far West in sacks, without food and water, nursed to life again, and sprung from traps to be riddled with bullets for "sport."

2. Cattle slaughtered by bleeding to death, according to the requirements of the Jewish butcher trade.

3. Capturing seals by the thousands, and braining the babies with clubs, so that our ladies may look fine, and our gentlemen wear rich fur hats.

4. The brutal husband kicking his wife to a jelly, which occurs the world over about as often as a vivisection without anesthetics.

Well, if Mr. Preston does justice to these, I will furnish on demand a few more for his agil pen.

Fewer Saints and More Men and Women Needed.

As is better known to the editor of The Truth Seeker than to most of its readers, I hav been disposed to be quite conservativ in my views as to the merits and demerits of the church at large, and to make all just distinction between its better manifestations of liberality and its baser elements of narrowness and bigotry, as shown respectivly by its more Liberal and more bigoted sects, giving full credit for the one, and looking as leniently as possible upon the other, as natural and necessary links in the chain of human progress, and as successiv stages in the system of universal evolution.

These views and sentiments of an individual are significant only in that they represent the sentiments of a large class of Freethinkers who would carefully avoid an indiscriminate indorsement or repudiation of any institution which professes to labor for the good of mankind, and who would not only be eminently just in their discriminations, but would at the same time throw the broadest mantle of charity over the past history and the present attitude of the church and all other institutions in their relations to the work of human progress.

After all, the fact remains that the highest type of human advancement, the best fruitage of all this growth and blossoming of earnest endeavor, is a man or a woman in the largest development of the essential qualities of manhood and womanhood, standing erect and firm amid the idolatrous altars of superstition, free to think, free to speak, free to act in the fullest exercise of every manly and womanly prerogativ, and not that church-made man of a man-made church, twin caricatures of the human and divine, and libels upon both, nor that faint and fickle suggestion of diluted womanhood, weak in real humanity and wanton in assumed divinity, the measure of whose manhood and womanhood can be most fittingly inventoried as about two yards of semi-animated whine, howling the hosannas of heaven in the trembling accents of an abject fear of hell, and whose sole aim in life is to deadbeat its way through paradistical gates at death, and to secure a comfortable seat in a heaven of indolent and immortal ease by hanging its shriveled, shrunken soul of devout emptiness around the bleeding neck of "vicarious atonement."

One real man or woman, in the noblest sense of manhood and womanhood, is worth more to the world than a score of self-glorified saintships; and what the world most needs to-day is more men and women and fewer saints. J. M. Thayer.

I.

It appears that those holy men, the bishops and minor clergy, representing the only true church of Christ, as by law established in this happy country, hav been greatly maligned for some long time past. Scoffers, and wicked defamers, hav said that these messengers of Jehovah hav systematically been doing nothing but carefully looking after their own worldly interests, and laying up treasure, while totally neglecting the condition of those under their charge. Certain ungodly individuals, instead of minding their own affairs, hav thought proper to giv to the general public an account of the misery they hav witnessed in this God-fearing and wealthy city. They hav gone amongst the slums and byways, and visited those who had scarce where to lay their head, and destitute of the wherewithal to provide themselvs with the semblance of a meal. Such disclosures created much excitement and discussion as to the means to be used to alleviate this great distress, though, as might be expected, nothing of a practical nature was suggested till the clergy came to the rescue. All the time they were, apparently, indifferent to the fearful wretchedness and poverty existing under their eyes, they were carefully considering the best and surest means of bringing about a better state of things; and after great consideration and prayer they hav finally arrived at the only sure cure for all these ills. Those who had not given careful consideration to the matter, and who were in the habit of merely giving a superficial view to anything that came under their notice, absurdly suggested that food was necessary for starving beings, and better houses instead of the disgraceful hovels in which the honest poor are compelled to liv, and work found for those who were able to do it, together with other rank socialistic ideas which would tend to utterly subvert the present all but perfect state of society. On the other hand the bishops, after long and careful deliberation, arrived at a far better and safer conclusion. Their remedy is doubtless the only true and lasting one, viz., that the suffering poor want more churches, where they may receive the true bread of life, softened with the milk of the word. That great and good man (may his name be ever held in reverence and esteem), the bishop of Rochester, at a convention, held a short time back, appealed to his fellow countrymen to immediately raise the sum of £12,000 to build another church in the poorest and most densely crowded portion of Southwark. He boldly declared it should never be said that the clergy were behind the worldlings when distress was to be alleviated, and good to be done. Within the last few days a new bishop has been installed to assist in the good work, and if, after all, these herculean efforts to remedy existing wrongs, the poor and down-trodden millions persist in their evil courses, the sympathy of every right-minded man and woman must at once be withdrawn, and the hardened wretches must be left to the doom they so richly deserve.

Let no ungodly Infidel now dare to raise his voice in reproach against such good and true men; benefactors hav they always been, and still are, and will be, to the human race.

I will engage to say no Atheist would hav ever thought of so simple and efficacious a way to solve this social problem.

Last evening I had the pleasure of hearing Charles Watts deliver a discourse on American Freethought orators, taking as representativ men, Ingersoll, Wakeman, and Chainey. It is needless to say he treated the subject in his usual able manner. He seems to be a great admirer of the former; perhaps he saw more of him than of the other two.

Mr. Watts fully indorsed the opinion of Freethought Americans regarding the colonel, and from his personal knowledge of the men of whom he spoke, he was able to giv much interesting information new to many of those composing his audience.

I hope it is not to late to wish you and your readers, and the Liberal party generally, a happy and prosperous New Year, and with a sincere wish that the cause may continue to advance still more rapidly than heretofore.

II.

Although the large-hearted and liberal Christian, luxuriating in the full blaze of gospel light, has strong objections to allowing his church or schoolroom to be used for the purpose of ventilating heterodox opinions, he does not, when he considers himself powerful enough, decline to avail himself of the standing offer of the narrow-minded and benighted unbeliever, who is groping in the darkness of reason and common sense, to a free use of his platform, a fair hearing, and consequently we are now and again favored with the superstitious notions unfortunately still current; but we hav plenty of varieties of opinions and interpretations of the one true faith, which is of so simple a nature that no two authorities on the subject can agree as to what it is all about.

A few Sundays back we had at the Hall of Science the benefit of an exposition on the so-called Apostle's Creed, given by the apostle of the Christian Socialist party, the Rev. S. Headlam. It was truly delightful to hear that this creed could be so explained that any secularist might fully subscribe to the whole of it, without sacrificing his own opinions in the slightest. The interpretation was scarcely orthodox, perhaps, but it seems the church allows considerable more latitude now in such things than it did in some years back, thereby showing what a tender mother holy church is. Some hypercritical individuals might perhaps say that such is the case because the parsons cannot help themselvs, and that when the power was in their hands they used it unsparingly, and with but little consideration for the feelings of others, but the punishments then awarded for heresy were on the same principle as those given by the schoolmaster to his refractory pupils—it always hurts the schoolmaster most. We are told, "Whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth," and the church acted on similar lines, always for the good of the chastened.

Mr. Headlam was good enough to inform us that in his opinion secularists were people raised up by God to show the church as by law established how corrupt it had become, exactly as the Christian religion was instituted to correct the older creeds, and the only fault he had to find was that we did not acknowledge Jesus Christ as the savior of the world. The Infidels of the present day are the true Christians, but will not acknowledge their founder. The audience generally was somewhat in doubt whether the lecturer was poking fun, or really meant what he said, but as he is known as a very earnest man, and not likely to crack jokes, it must be assumed that he really believed what he stated, more especially as he is not considered very orthodox by his own party. If such is the case, it seems a great pity that a man who can enter so thoroughly into the principles of Secularism, and appreciate them, does not come boldly forward and throw in his lot with those he so much admires. It appears to me that it would be a far more honest thing to do, for no matter how ingeniously a man may argue himself into a belief that two totally antagonistic elements may be closely allied, it is rather straining facts to establish such a position. It is a great misfortune that there are men who lay themselvs out to reconcile such opposing forces, as it makes the work so much the harder for the disciples of reason to crush the hydra-headed serpent of superstition, and while good is intended, much harm is done; and in the deadly struggle now going on, there can be no real place for those who will not declare decidedly for one side or the other.

We Shall Try To.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I inclose my $3, being thereunto admonished by my label and by you.

I am glad to see that you are fully alive to the importance of news—the news of the movement—the basis of all lasting success in every kind of journalism. Sweep the universe for news of man's progress in the use of his mind. Go on and prosper.

Very truly yours, James Parton.

The Truth Seeker Annual and Freethinkers' Almanac is the first production of this class attempted by the Truth Seeker Office (33 Clinton place, New York city), and yet we do not see how its compiler could hav done better if he had had ten years' experience. Dispersed through its pages are many rich full-page illustrations from Mr. Bennett's Around-the-World volumes, and its pages are crowded with good things too numerous to mention, from the pens of popular Liberal writers. Christians at Work.

A case deserving the attention, sympathy, and prompt aid of Liberals is that of the Vincents, father and sons, of Tabor, Iowa. The facts are these: The Vincents publish the American Nonconformist, formerly a Greenback paper, but latterly devoted also to the destruction of Christianity. So long as it was exclusivly a money reform journal, but little opposition was manifested toward it. But when the editor began his attacks on the church, the church began a warfare upon him and his paper.

In buying new material for the paper the Vincents were obliged to giv notes for $450. When these came due the Vincents were unable to raise all the money. This was the opportunity of the Christians, and they were not slow to seize it. A syndicate of church-members was formed, and the notes purchased at a premium of $35. The notes were secured by chattel mortgage on the printing material, and on obtaining possession of them the Christian syndicate foreclosed the mortgages. The Vincents succeeded in regaining possession of a portion of the material through a writ of replevin, and immediately began the publication again of the Nonconformist. About $250 has been subscribed by friends to help the Vincents, but much more is needed to pay the whole $450 and extra costs that hav been saddled upon the paper by the efforts of the syndicate to suppress it.

The animus of the prosecution cannot be doubted. The syndicate even went so far as to send a delegate to confer with Mrs. Vincent, who is a Christian lady, as to confining her husband in an insane asylum, the position taken by the syndicate being that a man who could oppose the Christian religion must be insane. Mrs. Vincent denounces the persecution of her husband and sons in vigorous language, and turns the many-sided Bible against her former church friends with a force and directness that must be unpleasant reading for the Sunday-school. They hav, she says in addition, lived in Tabor twenty-nine years, always supporting the church and paying their taxes. But since Mr. Vincent has become convinced of the rottenness of the Christian theology, they hav been unable to send their children to school because of the taunts and torments heaped upon them by the children of Christian parents. Mrs. Vincent accuses the syndicate of Christian professors of the sin of covetousness in endeavoring to obtain for $450 a printing outfit worth double that sum, of playing the spy and listening at a telephone office door to pry into the business of her husband and sons, and scorchingly asks them if it was not a noble example of Christian and neighborly love to threaten her son with prosecution to the full extent of the law if he did not stop publishing the Nonconformist. "Among you," she says, to the college professors engaged in the persecution, "you are acquainted with several languages; cannot you help me to some term that shall fitly set forth the depth of meanness to which you hav descended in sending to me to persuade me to leave my house to listen to your temptations to conspire with you to carry out your nefarious designs against my own children, my dear husband, and even against his liberty? Are there words in any language that can adequately describe the condition to which you must hav sunk before you could cause such a proposition to be conveyed to me?"

The freedom which the Tabor Christians propose to allow the Freethinkers of Iowa, was defined by the local preacher from his pulpit. "In the promulgation of beliefs," said the brilliant bigot, "the largest latitude must be allowed, consistent with belief in the Bible or in Christianity." The sentiment expressed by this preacher is the real sentiment of the whole church, and is what the Christians mean when they talk of religious toleration. A man may hav freedom to think so long as his thinking is done within prescribed limits; he may hav liberty to talk until he begins to question the divinity of Christ and the inspiration of the Bible; the freedom of the press is to be maintained unless some daring man shall use his type and presses to print opinions adverse to the claims of the Jewish Jehovah, and then the freedom ceases. And this is called a free country! We tell you, Liberals, it is not free so long as Christians rule, and never will be until the church is deprived of power. It is true that in this case no state aid has been invoked, but who can doubt that it would be were it needed? That it has not makes the remedy easier to apply, and it should be done in such a manner as to deter the church party from making further attempts at suppression. Let five hundred Liberals send in the price ($1.50) of a year's subscription to the Nonconformist, and we guarantee that the Vincents will come out of the conflict with flying colors. Address H. and L. Vincent, Tabor Iowa.

The Republic's Enemies.

It is a good thing for the country that Catholicism does not spread in the West as rapidly as it does in New York and New Jersey. When Cardinal McCloskey was a lad at school there were only two Catholic churches on Manhattan island. To-day there are three hundred and forty-three in the archdiocese, and about one million communicants in this city, Brooklyn, and the cities on the water front of New Jersey. Under his command McCloskey has the attendants and inmates of forty-nine chapels, sixteen asylums, seventeen industrial schools, twenty-nine convents and monasteries for nuns and priests, besides a theological seminary and several hospitals. The parochial schools of this city hinder thirty-four thousand pupils from becoming acquainted with scarcely any knowledge but of the saints and the duty of supporting the priests.

In the diocese of Brooklyn, comprising the whole of Long Island, there is an estimated Catholic population of two hundred thousand, to whom one hundred and fifty priests attend in eighty-eight churches, of which forty-nine are located within the city; thirty-seven chapels, one theological seminary, sixteen asylums, four hospitals, eighteen academies, and seventy-three parish schools. The most important Catholic institutions in this city are St. John's College at Fordham; St. Francis Xavier's College, Manhattan College, Manhattan Academy, and De La Salle Institute, under the direction of the Christian Brothers; St. Bridget's Academy, in East Tenth street, under the Sisters of Charity; the Sacred Heart Convent, Manhattanville, and another of the same order in Seventeenth street; the House of the Good Shepherd, in Eighty-ninth street, under the direction of the Sisters of Mercy; Ursuline Convent, in East Morrisania; the Catholic Protectory, at Manhattanville, under the charge of the Christian Brothers; the Female Orphan Asylum, on Madison avenue, containing one hundred and fifty inmates, and a Commissariat of the Holy Land, established for the reception of subscriptions to be devoted to the preservation of the principal sanctuaries of the church in Palestine.

The state of New Jersey is included in the archdiocese of New York, and is divided into two dioceses, those of Trenton and Newark. The diocese of Trenton was erected in 1881, and Father Michael J. O'Farrell has within his jurisdiction forty-seven secular priests and seven clergy of the regular orders. He controls eighty-two churches, three convents, and twenty-seven stations. In the diocese are also twenty-six schools, with a pupilage of four thousand eight hundred and twenty, five academies, and one hospital.

In the diocese of Newark are stationed ninety-one secular priests and fifty-three members of recluse orders, eighty-three churches, twenty-three stations, and three monasteries. There are also eight convents and one seminary. About fifty of the churches hav parochial schools attached to them, with an aggregate of about two hundred thousand scholars. There are also three colleges for young men and seventeen academies for young ladies, five orphan asylums, and four hospitals. The Catholic population of this diocese numbers about one hundred and fifty thousand, which, with fifty thousand in the diocese of Trenton, makes a total Catholic population of about two hundred thousand in the entire state of New Jersey.

A new Dominican monastery has just been finished in Newark, and the Dominican sisters will immure themselvs therein on the 29th. The rules of this order are the strictest known in the whole church, and the imprisoned sisters spend their time in adoration of the "consecrated" wafer which they superstitiously believe to be the body of Christ, in prayer, and in embroidering gaudy gewgaws for the priests and bishops to wear.

These worse than useless institutions escape taxation, are under no supervision by the state, and no man knows what crimes are committed within their prison-like walls. The whole system of convents and monasteries is monstrous. At their best they lead to the perversion of human nature; at their worst they are vast brothels and prisons, and shields of intrigue and infanticide. Many rich Catholic women are induced by the priests to take the veil that the church may take the novice's money, and after she has passed her novitiate the nunnery hides her from her friends as effectually as would the grave. These institutions are not open to civil officers, and yet there is nothing in the whole land that needs closer watching than the convents and nunneries. Every year, at least, the state ought to open the doors and let the inmates choose whether to stay or come out into the light of day.

It does not seem that more words can be needed to point out the danger this country is in from this church. But our legislatures and press are perfectly apathetic in the matter. One of these days they will wake up and find what trusting, besotted fools they hav been all these years, and they will regret not paying more attention to the principles of government and less to how they may divide the loaves and fishes of office. Liberals, at least, can accomplish a little good by calling attention to the most dangerous growth of the institution and persistently urging our assemblymen to tax every dollar's worth of property not owned by the state.

Crazed by Christianity.

Another melancholy instance of the bad effects of revivals, of their tendency to drive crazy those emotionally sensitiv, and to bring unhappiness upon families, has just transpired in El Dera, Ill., the home of Charles Hazelrig, a young man of twenty-two years, with hosts of friends, intelligent, and seemingly well calculated to be an honor to his parents.

Young Hazelrig was visiting a sister at Edina, Mo., at which place a "revival" was started in a church. At first he attended as company for his sister, but soon the craze caught him, and his mind began to show signs of weakening, until his brain gave way entirely, and he became a raving maniac. His mother and father were at once summoned by telegraph and went to him. They are both very old, the former being past seventy, and the latter in the neighborhood of sixty. When they reached their son he was so bad that he had to be tied, and even then it required the combined strength of several men to hold him. He would at times plead in heartrending tones for pardon from the God he had been told he had offended, and falling upon his knees offer supplication after supplication in a beseeching voice. Then his mood would change, and he would say that he was Christ come the second time. Then he would become violent, and make efforts to harm himself and those attending him. He became so violent that he had to be taken to an insane asylum.

His mother is nearly distracted over her trouble and her mind is visibly affected by it. Last week, while wandering aimlessly over the house, she fell down a flight of stairs, breaking her right wrist, and bruising her face and different portions of her body painfully.

What a blessing Christianity has been to that family! The mother in bed with broken bones, the son in an insane asylum, a howling madman! The grief of the father and sister can be imagined, not expressed. And the cheap John revivalist whose work this is has taken his fees and gone to repeat his efforts in other places.

And what shall the harvest be? Crazed boys, illegitimate children, a host of crackbrained fools, with only wit sufficient to keep on the outside of asylum walls, divided homes, stricken mothers, and weeping sisters—a lull, a backsliding, and the town plunged lower than ever in moral degradation. That is the outcome of two-thirds of the spasmodic orgies called "revivals of religion." A revivalist ought to pay a license like the saloonkeeper, or be put under bonds to support the lunatics his preaching makes. The fate of Hazelrig is a warning to the unconverted to stay dead in their sins rather than be awakened at the price of their sanity.

Editorial Notes.

"To love our enemy involves both an absurdity and an immorality; to do so would be wrong if possible, and impossible even if right."

THE new Congregationalists' creed affirms: "We believe that the love of God to sinful men has found its highest expression in the redemptiv work of his son, Jesus Christ." Per contra, it is supposed the wrath of God, who is "angry with the wicked every day," has found an equally high expression in the damnativ work of his adversary, the devil.

THAT Mr. Reynolds is doing substantial work in the lecture field is evidenced by the extended notices he is receiving from the secular press. These reports reach many more than he can personally address, and must do much good. Mr. Reynolds says things worth hearing, and says them in an entertaining manner. We sincerely hope he will be kept busy the year round. We learn that he proposes to start west soon, and would like engagements. Address him at North Parma, Monroe Co., New York, box 104.

A KIND of Liberalism that doesn't amount to much is prevalent in Canada, if one of our correspondents is correct. "There are," he says, "plenty of Agnostics in Canada, but they want courage, and the spread of papers like THE TRUTH SEEKER, and also organization, before they will be respected. We hav many here who pay pew-rent, but plead 'hard times' when asked to subscribe for any Liberal paper, or to help defray the expense of a lecture." With this state of things, is it any wonder that Canada keeps blue laws in force?

A NEEDY Liberal is Walter W. Broom, who is sick and almost blind, at 412 Wood street, Philadelphia, Pa. To help himself to bread and butter, with now and then a little cake, he is selling photographic copies of the Declaration of Independence, copied from a scarce metal plate, seven inches square, containing portraits of the signers of that historical document, with fac-similes of their signatures. Plain copy, $1; framed in glass and silver wire for $1.50. Mrs. Slenker has one, says it is a gem, and wants her friends to buy one to help the old man.

A short time ago THE TRUTH SEEKER was led to make some remarks upon the heretical utterances of the Rev. Mr. Curry, Methodist, of Chicago. Mr. Curry now denies that he was correctly reported. The reporter, however, who is himself a Methodist minister, is ready to swear to the accuracy of his transcript of what the Rev. Mr. Curry said. The question of veracity thus lies between two clergymen. It is to be hoped that there is some mistake, and that neither of the gentlemen will be called upon to acknowledge that he is capable of lying.

A WITNESS called in a civil suit in Toronto, Canada, on Friday, was objected to on the ground of religious unbelief, and, being questioned, said: "Well, you would call me an Agnostic. I would say I am a man. I was brought up in the Jewish faith, but I hold that I hav no knowledge of what is generally held as religious belief." The witness said further that he did not know anything of a future state, but he believed that if there was such a state its rewards or punishments for acts in this life would be eternal. Having expressed his belief in a supreme being, his evidence was allowed, and he took the oath on the New Testament.

THE TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL is going to the uttermost parts of the earth. A gratifying feature connected with its circulation is the fact that those who buy one, as a rule, upon seeing it, immediately order another. Brother J. A. Rutherford, of Brookston, Lamar Co., Texas, orders $10 worth, inclosing the cash. Brother Rutherford informs us that he is in his eighty-sixth year. We congratulate him that he has lived so long, especially as his protracted days hav permitted him to see the FREETHINKERS' ALMANAC. Here age and beauty meet indeed. We wish him many years of continued existence on this earth to repeat his motto, which forms the closing sentence of his letter to us: "Be good to your fellow-men and keep a good conscience in everything. Huzza, huzza for Liberalism!"

BISMARCK is a tyrant in politics, but not in religion. It is asserted that in his youthful days he was nearly converted to rationalism, and Mr. Bennett thought he had evidence sufficient to justify enrolling the German chancellor among the living Freethinkers. From extracts from Moritz Busch's forthcoming work on "Prince Bismarck in Relations to German Politics and Political Parties, and in Private Life," the religious status of Bismarck is given as "deeply religious, but in favor of the utmost liberty of thought and opinion in sacred matters." This is illustrated by the following story:

"One day at his table the conversation turned on the Puritanism of the New England states. 'The way they keep the Sabbath holy in England and America,' said Bismarck, 'is sheer tyranny of the most appalling description. I remember that the first time I went to England and landed at Hull I began to whistle in the street. An Englishman whose acquaintance I had made on board the packet begged me not to whistle. I asked, "Why not? Is it forbidden to whistle here?" "No," he replied; "but this is the Sabbath day." I was so much annoyed that I forthwith took a ticket for another steamer bound for Edinburgh. I could not stand not being allowed to whistle when I pleased.'"

We cannot giv Mr. Bismarck too much credit, however, until it is certain that his tolerance is not like the Iowa preacher's—"the largest latitude consistent with a belief in the Bible and Christianity."

IN an address at Belleville, Ont., the other day, a Rev. Dr. Meacham told a "story of the East." His discourse referred particularly to Japan. He enumerated several drawbacks to the spread of Christianity in that country, the chiefest of which, he said, was the introduction of Infidelity, which had had the effect of producing many Agnostics. "Literature written by Paine and Ingersoll had been extensivly circulated and read more widely and carefully there than in Canada." This testimony is extremely pleasing to us, for it is to Mr. Bennett's efforts while in the East that this luxuriant growth of common sense is largely due. His lectures in Ceylon hav not only been scattered broadcast in the country where they were delivered, but hav overflowed into Japan, and his presence aroused a number of the educated class, who hav taken hold of the translation of Ingersoll's and Paine's works. English Freethought literature has also been extensivly introduced into Japan. The fruit these efforts are bearing is acknowledged by Mr. Meacham in the remark that "Japan must hav a minister for every 50,000 people or the country will be populated with Agnostics."

BISHOP LITTLEJOHN, lecturing to the students of a theological seminary in this city on "The Impaired Influence of the Clergy," said that the cause which lies deepest "is the opposition of the spirit of the age to the supernatural which runs through the history of the church. Certain unscriptural and unchurchly notions which hav grown up in the church hav also tended to weaken the influence of the clergy. The principal of these is the notion which makes each member of the church practically independent of the governing body, the theory that an individual can save himself by immediate communion with God, and that church membership, while expedient, is by no means essential. Another hindrance is the enormous development of sectarianism in modern Christianity. The most potent cause of the decline of the influence of the clergy, however, is the decay of disciplin in the church." Bishop Littlejohn seems to hav gone all around the cause of the decaying influence of the clergy without touching it; and that is, the growing conviction that ministers, so far as their claim to divine authority is concerned, are impostors. They travel nowadays upon their intellectual merits. Lacking these, as most of them do, it is not necessary to look farther for the cause of their waning influence.

JOE COOK having pompously assured his Monday lecturship audience that Wendell Phillips had been admitted to heaven, the Rev. Dr. Curry pronounced his remarks "heathenish," and now the Rev. William Hayne Leavell steps into the columns of the Independent to assert that Mr. Phillips has gone to the other place. He is sorry for this, but "I plead," he says, "for simple, honest adherence to our doctrins. If the churches take the ground of Mr. Cook, that such men as the distinguished antislavery orator, who never pretended to be an evangelical Christian, are gone to an 'incalculably great reward'—meaning that he had been admitted to the high companionship of God and the angels—then they must change their creeds, or consent to be charged with holding doctrins they do not believe will be strictly enforced at the final judgment. Mr. Phillips was a man who believed most firmly in a kind, wise, and Almighty God of Providence; and in this faith fought his battles and won his victories; but there is no reliable evidence that he was a Christian in the evangelical sense at all; and we but cheapen our convictions of the doctrins of the New Testament when we unhesitatingly hand him on to a Christian's full reward the moment he dies. Mr. Phillips belonged to a class unprovided for in our conservativ theology. We cannot condemn them without declaring that our God is opposed to goodness. We cannot save them without contradicting our doctrin of salvation." Mr. Leavell is theologically correct. Wendell Phillips is in hell or Christianity is false. All the same, sensible men will prefer to go where Phillips is to where Cook will go.

Answers to Inquirers.

J. W. S.—The place for your differences with Brother Seaver is in the Investigator.

F. W. OPP.—Thanks for illustrations of Gen. ii, 7, and ii, 22. They are no doubt as true to life as the pictures of Jesus and the V. M. that adorn so many churches.

M. M. EGLI.—Henry Stone's address is 325 Clifton Place, Brooklyn, N. Y. Will publish your questions suggested by the Ohio flood, and the other when space will allow.

SOME one sends a communication entitled the "Devil." "I withhold," he says, "my name at present." Very well, friend; we shall withhold the article as long as you withhold your name—if not longer.

DR. L. V.—Gideon exercised a limited authority over the Israelites after their subjugation of Canaan; Abimelech, his son, tried to establish a kingship, but failed, and Saul was the first king.

C. H. BETTS.—We do not know which college had the honor of educating Col. Ingersoll. He is very much averse to answering inquiries of a personal nature, and we doubt if he would tell if we asked him.

R. W. MOSS.—Thomas Paine was not a signer of the Declaration of Independence. Of the circumstances you mention in Franklin's life we hav no knowledge. Lossing we regard as poor authority, especially where Freethought is involved. His reference to Paine shows his bitterness. Franklin was a Deist, but never avowed his belief in any religious system.

PHILIP PIPHER.—Captain McCabe's "Dream of Ingersollville" has been going the rounds of the press for the past four or five years. There is nothing in it to reply to. The sentiments, language, and actions attributed to the inhabitants of an imaginary place are based on a deliberate misconception of, and wilful lying about, Freethinkers. Such blatherskites as McCabe are not worth noticing.

J. R. RICHARDS.—Dr. Hay's onslaught on Ingersoll is funny, but his facts seem to be but guesses, his inferences only inferences, and his reasoning of but a feather's weight. Talmage did much better, yet made a "holy show" of himself. If we stopped to shoot all the folly flying from the pulpit, THE TRUTH SEEKER, big as it is, would contain nothing else.

MRS. S. J. LENONT.—Mason and Dixon's line in the boundary line separating Pennsylvania from Delaware, Maryland, and Virginia. It obtained its celebrity as being the divisory line between free and slave territory, but took its name from Charles Mason and Jeremiah Dixon, two surveyors who were engaged in 1763 by the owners of the lands to run the line. All Delaware at that time was owned by the heirs of William Penn, and Pennsylvania and Maryland had "lords proprietors" on grants by the crown. It was these "lords proprietors" who engaged Messrs. Mason and Dixon.

WM. FRAY.—The suttee (from the Sanskrit, meaning a virtuous wife,) is incorrectly applied by English writers to the practice at one time common in India of a widow burning herself along with the body of her husband. This self-immolation is not sanctioned by the laws of Menu, but rests upon the authority of the later Sastras and Puranas. The practice ceased in 1847. There is no doubt that many a Hindoo child has been thrown to the goddess "Ganga," as the worshiping nativs call the Ganges. The spirit prompting the sacrifice is the same that caused Jephthah to slay his daughter, Abraham to offer his son, and Freeman to plunge the knife into to bosom of his child. It is religion run mad.

N. FORD.—Until a child arrives at years of discretion, he must be governed and instructed. That he may be a good business man, he is taught arithmetic, bookkeeping, etc.; that he may know how to travel, he is taught geography; that he may know something about the countries he sees, he is instructed to read history. Now why, for the good of his health and that he may know the dangers of the cup that cheers, should he not be instructed in hygiene and physiology? He is not compelled to travel because he studies geography, and he is not compelled to put the physiological precepts into practice if he chooses not to. If he rather be a drunkard he has a right to be one—so long as he injures no one else. That, however, is such a difficult undertaking that, were it lived up to, you would never need urge prohibition more.

NICHOLAS HARPER.—Materialists hold that matter always existed because it is impossible to create something from nothing. Matter is an objectiv reality—a something that exists, and must, therefore, always hav existed. We will take this as the major premis of a syllogism: Everthing uncreatable existed from all eternity. And this for the minor premis: Matter is uncreatable. The conclusion then is, Matter exists from all eternity. Completed it stands thus:

Everything uncreatable existed from all eternity.
Matter is uncreatable; therefore
Matter exists from all eternity.

The only way to disprove this is for theologians (or any other doubter) to go to work and create a little matter. The conditions necessary to prove spontaneous generation (of life) hav not yet been attained. It is only an hypothesis—advanced, it is true, to the position of a working hypothesis—but when biogenesis is more fully understood the proof will probably be at hand.

WALTER SIMONDS.—Livezey's circular, the "Stake and Gibbet in 1884" is a lie, and we publish it that our readers may see just what kind of a man he is. The numbers in it refer to the circular we printed last week, headed "To Infidel Men and Women:"

THE STAKE AND GIBBET IN 1884.

If there is anything the Infidel professes to hate, it is the suppressson of the individual right to think, and to set others to thinking. He never tires of expatiating on the murder of Hypatia, and the burning of Bruno in the remote past. He sees back through the vista of years better than he sees the actualities of the present; but the stake and the gibbet are threatening some Oregon people in 1884, and where is the defender of Hypatia and Bruno? He is gathering the fagots, and knotting the rope side by side with the outsider, and the hypocritical churchman.

Reader, the Portland Oregonian of Feb. 2, 1884, givs an account of preparations being made by a vigilance committee to hang at least seven humble, toiling, inoffensiv Christians on account of their teachings and belief, unless they leave the locality in which they liv. Z. T. Bryant, of Marshland, Oregon, over seventy-one years of age, is one of them. He writes me that the committee bound itself under an oath (the same as did some forty men against Paul) to hang or burn at the stake, him and his friends if found after eight days. Last summer, after similar threatening, the preacher of these people was shot, members assaulted, and camp-houses burnt.

Reader, ask yourself, where are the Catholics, Presbyterians, Quakers, etc, etc., with their love of Christ and their neighbors, while these things are fomenting? They are lauding our nineteenth century civilization, they are boasting of the increase of peace and good will, they are converting the heathen, and they are vieing with the Infidel in threatening, vilifying, shooting, hanging, and burning Christ in his members. Nos. 12, 15, 16, 17, 19, and the New York TRUTH SEEKER, I hav alike confronted on behalf of these persecuted people; Nos. 12 and 19, of Portland, Oregon, particularly. (See circular.)

Catonsville, Maryland. F. B. LIVEZEY.

THE TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1884 is a very handsome illustrated publication, and givs useful information as to our American Freethinking brethren. The story of the establishment and growth of the National Liberal League, which has now 265 auxilary Leagues or branches, the paper on "The Progress of Liberal Thought in Canada," and Josiah P. Mendum's little sketch of the Paine Memorial will be read with great interest on this side the Atlantic.—National Reformer.

KENT, O., March 1, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Accept the inclosed $10.50 to increase the subscription list of the good old TRUTH SEEKER. Credit me with a year's subscription, or to March 17, 1885, when I shall endeavor to again present you with another club of new subscriber as a token of my appreciation of your impartial management of that champion of fair play and Freethought, the fearless old TRUTH SEEKER. MARIUS H. HEIGHTON.

EUREKA, MICH., Feb. 24, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I must hav THE TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1884, and the other books herein mentioned. All hail to the dear TRUTH SEEKER! It is our holy Bible. Long may it liv to do battle for the right. I bless the day I heard of and saw one of Mr. Bennett's papers, about seven years ago. It opened my eyes very quick. Every time I look on one of our TRUTH SEEKERS I think of our dear Bennett. MRS. L. E. TITUS.

WENTWORTH, DAKOTA, Feb. 21, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: The sample copy of your paper is received and thoroughly read. I am satisfied with its contents. We hav a very Liberal neighborhood, and I do not think this will be the last subscription from here. Inclosed find $5, for which send THE TRUTH SEEKER to me for one year, and also the inclosed list of books. I hav become disgusted with old orthodoxy, and want something with a tinge of common sense, and at least a little reason. W. L. HORTON.

WILLIAMSTOWN, O., Feb. 26, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been very much interested in reading the opinions of different ones in regard to THE TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL. I hav carefully perused the copy I obtained of the editor, and hav this to say in regard to its worth: I do sincerely wish there was a copy of it in every family in the United States, accompanied by a copy of your paper. But Liberalism must certainly be wonderfully on the increase. I judge from the great number of specimen copies of Liberal papers sent me, and all seem to hav a very liberal patronage. It makes my heart rejoice to know of the great change which has been wrought upon the public mind in this direction in the last few years. And since the introduction of Liberal papers and tracts in this village and vicinity, the opossum has let go all her feet, and just hangs by the tail, orthodoxy.

Respectfully, B. D. EVANS, M.D.

LYON, RICE CO., KAN., Feb. 29, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I was much interested in reading the copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER which you sent me. The reports of the celebrations of Paine's birthday show that Freethought is certainly making some progress.

It is easy enough to hav such celebrations in cities or in old settled countries, where people are on the tide of prosperity, and where there are brains that are capable of giving and brains that are capable of receiving the bread of truth. But in new countries that hav been open ports to unscrupulous traders, broken-down sharps of all descriptions, and a poverty-stricken mass, such celebrations are impossible.

It is also hard to support many Liberal enterprises, when one has no other means of existence than raising wheat and corn. When the farmer has paid a fabulous price for a machine (made out of protected iron) to cut his grain; has paid extortions to railroads; has sustained the cross-fires of commerce, and paid his taxes, it leaves him for his share a little sack of bran. JOSEPH LECLERC.

NUNDA, ILL., March 5, 284.

MR. EDITOR: J. E. Remsburg is having good audiences in all of his appointments in Illinois, notwithstanding that in every place we go the Christians make a desperate effort to keep the people away from the lectures. Here in Nunda the Methodist Episcopal church is running a negro minstrel show as a counter attraction. Last evening Mr. Remsburg opened his course of lectures here with his lecture on the "Sabbath" to a good audience in the Disciples Church, and at the close of the lecture, a minister of the Christian church paid him the compliment of acknowledging that Mr. Remsburg had treated the Sunday question in a fair, logical, and truthful manner. Last Sunday the Congregationalists at Huntley Grove had a Chicago divine as a counter attraction. And in the evening while said divine berated and abused Infidels to empty pews and an audience of less than twenty people by actual count, Mr. Remsburg delivered his eloquent and unanswerable lecture on the "False Claims of the Church" to a well-filled hall.

P.S.—My post-office address is yet at Bloomington, Ill.

F. F. FOLLET.

BOSTON, March 3, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: The sample number of your paper has just come to hand. I am pleased to note the evidence of its perfect success in its search for the truth. I accept it as my teacher, and I inclose pay for three months' tuition.

I was reading to a friend the account of Garfield's questionable means of carrying Indiana. My friend replied: "Would not a Freethinker use substantially the same means to attain a desirable end?" I answered: "No; the case of Colonel Ingersoll illustrates the fact that I am right. When he had the governorship of Illinois within his grasp; when a little hypocrisy and judicious silence would hav given him the prize, he would not stoop to such means. He said, 'No; I will keep my manhood if I lose the office.' He did keep his manhood, and lost the office."

And just here is a fine illustration of the reward of being loyal to the truth and one's sincere convictions. Since rejecting the bribe of hypocrisy he has given to the world ideas which will place his name high on the scroll of fame, when all the governors of Illinois shall hav faded from the mind of man. How the cheap fame of governors, and presidents, and kings, and nobles, pales before the transcendent fame of a man like Colonel Ingersoll, who has blessed the world with light, who is the greatest orator of nature that has ever expounded her mysteries and illustrated her beauties! When the brain has cast out the impurities of superstitious ignorance there is a new life and exhilaration which no Freethinker will trade off for offices and honors.

W. M. CHANDLER.

SANFORD, N. Y., March 11, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. Andrews says in his article entitled "Money and Its Meaning," that the legal tender attribute of certain money is neither essential nor incidental, but merely accidental. I would like to hav him state where money of any kind can be found that is not a legal tender, i.e., is there anything aside from law that can make money? I understand that an English guinea is not money in the United States; neither is any foreign coin money outside the jurisdiction of the law of the country that coins it. National bank bills are money only as far as the law makes them a tender for taxes, salaries, etc. Trade dollars were once money; now they are only a commodity, the same as any other chunk of metal. If a person agrees to pay me fifty dollars, I am compelled to accept standard silver dollars, gold coin, or United States notes (greenbacks). Any other coin or paper I cannot be compelled to receive, although it may hav a greater commercial value. In short, does not nature furnish or make metal, while law makes it money? M. L. KINSKERN.

SALEM STATION, WIS., Feb. 18, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find $5. I want THE TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL, and want to pay for the best paper on earth to January 1, 1885, and the balance to the Monument Fund, if I am not too late. I went to Milwaukee and met Mr. Bennett when he was on his return from around the world, and I found him looking so robust that you can hardly imagin how grieved and shocked I was when I tremblingly broke open the black-lined TRUTH SEEKER and read the account of his death. I rode in a car from the city of Milwaukee to Kenosha, where I bade him a last good-bye, as it turned out. We had a good visit on the journey, and pleasantly discussed the probabilities of a future life, he having more faith than I, but that did not disturb the harmony between us. If it is true that death does not end all, Mr. Bennett is enjoying life beyond the reach of the "low-down" Comstocks, it is to be hoped. But when I look over the entire field, looking at the pros and cons as much as it may be desired, I can see no valid reason why the old patriarch's saying is not true, that "man dieth like the ox."

A. D. CORNWELL.

LANCASTER, PA., Feb. 25, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Presuming that you and your many readers will be pleased to hav another county heard from, I take the liberty to address to you and them a few lines from this goodly city in the Keystone state.

With a population of thirty thousand, you may wonder that we hav no Liberal organization here in Lancaster, and, to tell the truth, it has always been a wonder to me; but do not conclude that we hav no Liberals living here. On the contrary, with its thirty-two churches, all reasonably well attended, although, as is usually the case, mostly by women and children, Lancaster counts among its citizens quite a number of Liberal men, who, if they could be stirred up to unite their efforts, would make a creditable showing. What we want is a few good lecturers to show to the priest-ridden populace the approaching light of the dawning day of liberty. Messrs. Watts and Chainey were booked here during last December, but unfortunately were prevented from fulfilling their engagement. I wrote to Mr. Remsburg during his tour in Ohio last month, but my letter must hav reached its destination after Mr. Remsburg's departure, as it was returned to me through the dead-letter office. So, in the absence of lecturers, I will try to do some good to the cause by introducing Liberal papers. So please send THE TRUTH SEEKER to each of the following gentlemen three months on trial. A. ADLER.

FRANKFORT, N. Y., March, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: We are once more called upon to chronicle the death of one from our Liberal ranks. Brother Phineas Gates, a well-known Liberal and Freethinker of Ilion, Herkimer Co., N. Y., died March 1, 1884. Born May 1, 1813, his age was seventy years. His sickness was somewhat protracted, though he was confined to his room but two months. His disease was of a rheumatic character, and very painful. Brother Gates bore his affliction with fortitude, fully conscious of his approaching death. He was strong in the faith which he espoused, and lived and practiced the Golden Rule. He passed away as calmly as going to sleep, without a struggle. He had no faith in gods nor fear of devils hereafter.

In early life Brother Gates was the associate and schoolmate of D. M. Bennett, and during that time he was nine years with the Shakers, leaving that society five years before Brother Bennett. He came to Ilion in September, 1849, where he resided until his death. He leaves an aged wife, and his friends and neighbors sympathize with her in this her lonely bereavement, and endeavor to smooth the pathway for those who mourn.

The funeral took place at his late residence on Main st., Ilion, Monday, March 3, 1884. Agreeable to the request of Brother Gates before his death, that no Christian theologian should speak over his remains, the funeral ceremonies were conducted by Brother Cattaway, who took his remarks from "The Truth Seeker Collection," on page 71, which were given with feeling and with satisfaction to a well-filled house.

G. A. KENYON.

ROCHESTER, N. Y., March 10, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: In a late number of THE TRUTH SEEKER I notice an illusion by a writer to the Jewish press taking exceptions to their position, and intimating that the Jews ought not to oppose or quarrel with the Liberals, because "they hav already enemies enough." Now I respect this Jewish press very much more for its antagonism, if sincere, than I should for "bowing before," against principle, simply to make friends. This is simply a repetition of what has been in nearly all creeds and parties, and is, perhaps, the more noticeable at present in Liberals, Freethinkers, radicals, etc., than others, for their platform provides "that each shall hav his or her individual opinion, free and untrammeled by any dictation of sect, set rules, dogma, or otherwise than by conscience." Now in the face of this, it seems entirely out of place for a Liberal (?) to chide another party for taking the very same position as does his own party, seemingly forgetting that this great Liberal (?) party was gotten up expressly to furnish means of expressing diverse opinions, independent of whether they agreed with some other preconceived opinion or not. Some—I do not say all or many—of the Liberals (?) are the most selfish, egotistic, and illiberal persons I meet. I am glad to be able to say, however, that this part is in small minority, and that the Liberals I meet are usually all that the name implies.

In an abolition meeting many years ago was a well-known character known as All Togood, a large, powerful man of forty, who was so underwitted as to be incapable of earning his living, but begged it from door to door, singing songs and telling stories for pay; but who had, however, an occasional brilliant idea. In the course of this meeting some dissenters spoke in opposition to the prevailing sentiment, and there was some loud hissing, stamping, and cries of "Put him out!" etc., when All Togood's voice was heard above the roar, shouting, "That's the price of free speech, gentlemen; that's the price of free speech!" which ended the confusion at once. The friends of freedom (?) saw the point, and that they were acting in opposition to their avowed principles. Thereafter the meeting was quiet and orderly, and succeeded in its praiseworthy object. By publishing this it will appear that "ye are not one of them." F. W. ROCH.

FARLEY, IOWA, Feb. 23, 284.

MR. EDITOR: You will find inclosed $5.75, which use as directed. THE TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL is a gem, a beauty, and a perfect storehouse of information, and we should all thank you for placing it within our reach. I am now keeping a list of heretical ministers who may be discovered during this year, as I am able to gather them from reading the newspapers. If you should think proper to insert them in the ANNUAL you will be welcome to the names I secure.

Now, as to the future prospects of our cause, we need hav no fear so long as we enjoy the liberty of the press. Our literature is doing its silent but thorough work on every hand and in every home. The secular press is becoming a strong helper in the forward movement. Although she may attack us in some of our most radical demands, yet she comes daily freighted with heresy and new and advanced thought. I am personally acquainted with several editors who put into their papers all the heresy that their readers can bear. This is all we must ask of them. They are doing a good work where our Infidel papers would not be looked at.

I hav just returned from a four weeks' trip in Wisconsin, and am happy to say that in every locality that I visited I found the church gradually losing ground, and Liberalism and Infidelity gaining. Most of the old gray heads cling to the church, but the young are nearly entirely out, and likely to stay out. The preachers may blow about converting fifty here, one hundred there, or two hundred at some other place, but it is not true. Under the strain of excitement, women and children get up and openly confess that which they had believed all their lives. This they call conversion; but we know better. Such a thing as a real conversion from Materialism to Christianity is very rare. I hav never known a case. All that Liberals need to secure an early victory is to work together in harmony, leaving all internal strife until we hav got rid of man's most dreadful enemies, superstition and priestcraft.

Yours ever at work in the cause, H. GILMORE.

MILLBROOK, CT., March 11, 284.

MR. EDITOR: At the risk of meeting the unanswerable and of course overwhelming accusation of being one of a mutual admiration society of two, the other member of which society is your able and noble-souled contributor, Mr. Elliott Preston, of Boston, I write again to express to him my heartfelt gratitude for writing, and to you for publishing, his late article on vivisection in reply to Dr. Foote, which appeared in the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 8, 1884. I may also thank young Dr. Foote for his weak defense of the horrible practice, because it provoked a continuance of the controversy. I hope the subject will be thoroughly ventilated, for if it is, such a cry of horror will arise from humanity that even doctors will become ashamed of vivisection, ashamed to defend it in the public prints, and afraid to hav it known that they practice it; and heartless young sprigs in medical colleges will no longer be taught the devilish art of extorting needless pain from unoffending animals, for public sentiment—once awakened—will not tolerate vivisection in our colleges. I earnestly entreat every reader of these lines to send to the "Victoria Street Society for the Protection of Animals Liable to Vivisection," Victoria street, London S. W., England, for a copy of "Light in Dark Places," which will be mailed to him free, and will disclose horrors that make the tortures of the Spanish Inquisition seem insignificant. Comparativly few, I think, hav any idea of the infernal torment which vivisectors daily inflict upon defenseless living animals. But let them procure and read the above work, and if they do not agree with me that vivisection is a most damnable practice, their hearts and heads must be of very different material from mine. And it seems that the torture inflicted is without any beneficial results to humanity; it neither benefits the vivisector nor adds to the sum total of human knowledge called science. It simply edifies bloodthirsty young doctors and monsters of cruelty, mad with ambition to excel all other monsters in the production of excruciating agony. Mr. Preston speaks of attempts on the part of vivisectors to obtain human beings for their experiments. This suggests the horrible thought that possibly some of the many prattling and innocent little children who hav been kidnapped within the past few years may hav gone to the torture chambers of the vivisectors, and there (under the influence of the poison curare, which intensifies the nerves of sensation, and, at the same time, increases the torment, by paralyzing the motor nerves, by which sensation is expressed) been multilated and torn, baked and boiled alive, for the amusement of their tormentors, and under the stultifying and false pretense of increasing the store of human knowledge. We may be justified in supposing any attrocity possible in the practice of the mad enthusiasts of vivisection.

Again permit me to thank you, Mr. Editor, for printing and Mr. Preston for indicting unanswerable protests against vivisection, that fiendish practice which, undoubtedly, as he says, "produces within the compass of any given twenty-four hours a sum of agony surpassing in its hideous total all the suffering upon the earth or in the sea existing during the same period and ascribable to all other causes combined."

I can hardly find words, Mr. Editor, to express my admiration of the letter of Mattie C. Mitchell, of Jackson, Mich., in THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 8, 1884. It givs no uncertain sound, but has the true ring, and from the bottom of my heart I thank her. I am proud to know that even one of the lady contributors of your paper has dared to speak—and in language that cannot be misunderstood—in denunciation of the damnable practice of vivisection. I hope we may hear from her again through THE TRUTH SEEKER, and that others of the gentler sex will go and do likewise. It is a subject well calculated to arouse the sympathetic nature and finer sensibilities of woman. Also, warmest thanks are due to J. L. Tompkins, of Lake City, Iowa, in the same number of THE TRUTH SEEKER, for his short but sharp castigation of those fiends in human shape, the vivisectors, every stroke of which I fully indorse. Mr. Preston has struck the chord; let us help to keep it vibrating.

HARVEY W. PINNEY.

ROCHESTER, N. Y., March 3, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: A few words in criticism of Mr. Tewksbury's letter of Jan. 6th, published in THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 1st. I very seriously question whether the "death-ends-all" theory will, as he says, "keep people' minds in so low a plane of thought that nothing can be accomplished that could be done on a higher plane of thought and aspiration." I hav never regarded the "death-ends-all" theory as a very low plane, nor hav I been able to find anything especially elevating in the "belief of a higher life," which I regard as a twin sister of superstition. Perhaps, however, it is like the Christian's reward—to be received "over there." The aim of all Liberals, I agree, should tend to a higher life here; but whether this can be done by trying to solve the Spiritualistic theory I am much in doubt. The time naturally allotted us will be fully occupied in cultivating such principles of character as will make us worthy to be called noble and good, without muddling the mind with ghosts and disembodied spirits.

His letter is the first I hav seen that publicly arraigned THE TRUTH SEEKER, and charged that the editorial department and correspondence possessed "too little soul." The impartial hearing that all shades of belief hav enjoyed in its colums endears it to the Liberal world. What paper, I ask, has done half as much to break the shackles of mental bondage, and liberate enslaved humanity? The doctrins of Materialism and Spiritualism hav alike been assailed and defended through its columns. During the dark days, when, seemingly, the power of the church never would be weakened, THE TRUTH SEEKER nobly withstood the shot and shell of church persecution, pleading humanity's cause. Never has it forsook the standard its founder first reared. Fighting for a lifetime under the flag of Universal Mental Liberty, his memory will endure when those who would unjustly criticise the work he has done hav passed into forgetfulness. He has died, but his monument, THE TRUTH SEEKER, still livs, no less a shining light than when the first ray flashed forth from its columns. If the people of the town in which Mr. Tewksbury resides are "too careless and indifferent about matters of a reformatory nature," and care nothing for the advancement of humanity, I hav no hesitation in suggesting the circulation of a few more copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

A. E. RINGER.

CHEBANSEE, ILL., March 1, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: John E. Remsburg delivered three Liberal lectures in the Masonic Hall, at this place, on the 26th, 27th, and 28th of February, 1884. There was a large attendance each evening, and the lectures were listened to with the closest attention. The first lecture was on "The Sabbath;" the second, "The Bible," and the third, "The Church."

The lecturer handled his subjects in a very masterly and logical manner. In the commencement of the first lecture he said that Christianity stood upon three great fundamental pillars—the Sabbath, the Bible, and the church. In the course of these three lectures he proposed to demolish one of those pillars each evening, commencing first with the greatest and most powerful one, the Sabbath. With great eloquence and logic he disposed of the Christian Sabbath in his first lecture, and showed positivly that there was no authority for it in the scriptures. Since the lecture a number of semi-Christians are searching the New Testament for Sabbath-day authority, one of the Liberals having offered to buy the best new hat in town for any man who can find a passage in the New Testament requiring Sabbath observance.

In the second lecture the Bible was handled in a way that opened the eyes of many persons. He examined its origin, its history, and its character, and read some disreputable portions. Several delicately-constituted persons stayed away from the last lecture, because, as they said, his lecture was too severe and too obscene. Yet those same persons do not blame the Bible for being obscene—and the lecturer did not expose the worst parts of it, either. By many persons the last lecture was considered the best in the course. It was mainly his published lecture entitled "False Claims" of the church. F. F. Follet, secretary of the State Liberal League, was traveling with the lecturer and selling Liberal books and papers.

These are the first Liberal lectures in Chebansee for a number of years. There are three or four churches in the place, and they hav gone along almost uninterrupted, although there are a considerable number of Liberals—and still more "half-breeds"—here. The churches held opposition meetings every night during the lectures, and used their influence to keep people away. One old deacon said his boys were bad enough without going to such lectures, and he kept them away. The Catholic priest and the Methodist minister were both personally invited to attend the lectures, but they did not go. At the first lecture the chairman announced that any person who desired would hav the opportunity of replying to anything the lecturer might advance, but no one ventured to raise any objections.

These lectures hav stirred up the people a good deal, and will hav a good effect. The admission was free, the expense being paid by a number of Liberals. It is intended to hav more lectures of this kind in the future. The Chebansee Herald, in its notice, said: "The lectures in the Masonic Hall this week, by Mr. Remsburg, were well attended every evening. He is a fluent speaker, and makes it interesting for his hearers."

MR. EDITOR: I notice by my tab that you are in want of another three dollars from me for the grand old TRUTH SEEKER. So here you hav it. This is my third year of reading your paper. I only hope that as long as I liv I shall be able to hav it and pay for it, for it is the most satisfactory and the cheapest reading that I hav. I received the ANNUAL all right. It is worth double the amount that you charge for it.

FORT SCOTT, KAN., March 6, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I hav just finished a course of lectures here, the course extending through two months. The interest manifested by the public in the cause of Liberalism indicates a desire on their part to become more fully acquainted with the purposes of Liberal reform.

Inclement weather has often been against our meetings; yet on nearly every night the court-house was filled. On last Sunday night a large number were compelled to stand during the entire evening, the subject being, "The Progress of Heresy." I anticipate giving another course of lectures here early in the summer. In the meantime, however, I wish to make arrangements to lecture through Kansas, Nebraska, Missouri, Iowa, and Illinois. All Leagues or persons desiring to communicate with me will address J. L. ANDREW,

In care of Prof. D. D. Bryant, Fort Scott, Kansas.

PHILADELPHIA, March 3, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: We are much interested in reading in THE TRUTH SEEKER of the progress of the Liberal work that is going on in all parts of the country, and I infer from my own interest in the cause of humanity that your readers may be interested to learn that this grand uprising of the people is manifest here as elsewhere. We hav made quite a great deal of progress in our League since we began a few months ago. The officers of our society are activ, intelligent, and liberal. They hav given the people here an opportunity to hear such capable speakers as Remsburg, Chainey, and Bell. The latter speaker addressed the League twice last Sunday, and it is the universal verdict of those who heard Prof. Bell that he is a splendid talker, and touches the most vital issues of the day in a common sense and practical way. We want to hear him again just as soon as he can arrange to come this way. W.

LOOKING GLASS, OR., Feb. 20, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I know no better way to aid the Liberal cause, especially in a district remote from the lecture field, than by helping to circulate Liberal papers. I find a great many who disbelieve in church dogmas, yet when their opinions are assailed can giv no good reason for the faith that is in them. The clergy here keep themselvs posted in regard to who is supplied with Freethought publications, and manage to govern themselvs accordingly. If you hav THE TRUTH SEEKER and Paine's "Age of Reason" about the house you can hardly coax one home with you. Since I hav been a reader of Liberal books and papers one thing more noticeable than anything else is the ignorance of some of the clergy, not only in scientific truths, but what should be facts pertaining to their profession, and yet we are asked to take counsel from them. Not long since a good member of the church asked me if I believed in the theory of the motion and rotundity of the earth. I left him in disgust. He doubtless thinks the earth square and with corners.

FRAZIER WARD.

SALISVILLE, MONT. TER., Feb. 7, 284.

MR. EDITOR: In common with others, I hav taken deep interest in the discussion between Spiritualists and Materialists as carried on through THE TRUTH SEEKER, but, after giving both sides a hearing, find myself as far from settled convictions on the subject as when the discussion began. To my mind it seems impossible that the question of immortality can ever be settled by argument any more than by dogma. Evidently the whole question turns on proof. No other solution will ever meet with general acceptance. And certainly the burden of proof logically rests with Spiritualism. We know nothing of a future existence, and when we attempt to reason the idea of immortality, as generally understood, seems too vapory to approach substantial reality. Yet my sympathies are with Spiritualism. I should rejoice to see a universal demonstration of continued existence. I can see no more in continued existence to be ashamed of than the present one. My present life has not been so barren of all pleasure but that I should be willing to repeat the operation of living over again, and would contract to liv a little longer when I bid farewell to blood and bones, should the laws of nature permit. Yet the facts are what we want, let them lead where they will.

The Materialist does not, as I understand, claim to hav positiv proof of his position—neither is it necessary he should—but arrives at his conclusions by a method of reasoning founded on what is known of the laws of nature. Whereas, the Spiritualist not only enters the domain of logic, but summons to his aid that which he believes to be proof of spirit existence.

What I write is not to enter the arena of debate, but is solely for purposes of information. And I invoke criticism to the end that those who are competent may point out my error and thereby either furnish a basis upon which I may arrive at conclusions more satisfactory than hitherto, or better enable me to form a correct estimate of my own ignorance, the existence of which is my only apology for writing this article.

For ages man has been insulted by a dogmatic demand that he should accept a priestly concocted belief labeled faith. Now that he has grown restless under such mockery of reason, he comes forward respectfully soliciting something more tangible. And should Spiritualists succeed in favoring him with absolute knowledge of continued existence they should, from my point of view, rank among the world's greatest benefactors.

Christendom has suffered an intellectual famin under the reign of faith. The only wonder, and bearing the closest resemblance to a miracle, is that even one good and sensible person exists to-day where "civilizing" Christianity has been, knowing, as we do, that for more than a thousand years the church was engaged in exterminating the noblest and best, and allowing the vicious and ignorant to survive and propagate their kind, genuin receptacles of faith, cut and made to order. In view of the pernicious effects of faith, I think our Spiritualist brethren will indulge our skepticism and deal tenderly with us when we ask in a becoming manner proofs which will reach these remote regior s of the West. Though many of the ablest and best accept existing proofs, yet many to whom the same appellations apply do not, and "moral turpitude" cannot properly be assigned as a reason. One difficulty seems to be, the demonstrations so far hav been confined within too narrow limits, too much so to attain rapidly to universal conviction. It would seem, if spirits exist and can communicate with mortals, conclusiv evidence of the fact to all intelligent beings could be produced without denying mediums their prerogativ of fixed and prescribed conditions. We are bound in earth life by similar laws, and spir its being only human at best. I can see no impropriety in according the same to them. Therefore we shall not, as some writers hav done, demand proof to each individual. Also we will recognize the demand for favorable conditions, and are willing mediums may remain in their cabinets, surrounded with every facility for thorough work. But we ask, not in a bigoted spirit, why can they not from these facts make their proofs of a universal character, and thereby reach the general public? Has not the telegraph operator stood at his post and compelled a skeptical world to acknowledge that man in his majesty can control electric force? He has not convinced each individual separately, or only those who were able to visit his office. Many thousand individuals hav never seen a battery for charging a telegraph wire, or know anything whatever of the modus operandi of telegraphy, yet are convinced of its truth. And why is this? The proof has been universal, and reached all alike. If we all hav to await the slow process of spirit demonstration now going on, quite presumably many will hav to await the reality. It is impossible for persons without means to visit a powerful medium hundreds of miles away. Even had they the means, and should they go, how are they to know but on returning home the first newspaper they pick up will contain intelligence of the exposure of the very medium who had so benignantly placed their feet on the rock of ages? The exposure of mediums seems always in order. How are we to know but that in time all will meet like fates—especially when we see mediums high in their profession challenged to exposure, and perfect silence prevail. Some time since a kind of feinting, dodging effort was made to convince Mrs. Slenker. Had the scheme been carried through, and Elmina convinced, the world would not be. True, we should hav rejoiced that she had received satisfaction as an individual, yet proof to her would not hav been proof to the world, no more so than proof to others had formerly been to her. The same may be said with reference to the long standing and almost forgotten Truesdell-Lacy test.

The question arises, How is proof to be made which will reach all alike without disturbing the conditions under which alone spirits can communicate? I ask those who are supposed to know, in the event such a thing is possible. Is it not claimed spirits can and do transmit messages? If they can, hav they not, in a great measure, the same means at hand to carry conviction to the world that the electrician had in his sphere of action? When the Jeannette for so many months was on her fatal voyage, and a world with bated breath awaiting even one authentic word from her, did not spirits lose one grand opportunity of demonstrating their existence? Why not hav brought back a faithful report of that terrible voyage? Had their report sustained a verbatim comparison with the ship's record when found, would not such evidence hav almost amounted to proof? Then did not considerations of humanity demand they should hav done so? Could not this hav been done without violating the conditions of spirit communion? Mediums could hav remained in the obscurity of their cabinets and awaited favorable conditions? To-day the Greeley expedition is somewhere within those terrible solitudes. Why not let us know something of it? I presume we will again hav to await the superhuman efforts of man to know its fate, when spirits without frosted ears, frozen fingers, or nipped toes could let us know all about it.

If spirits can transmit private messages, why not intelligence of a public character, and thus furnish proof essentially the same to each and all? and, if always reliable, especially when coming from remote regions where any other source of information would be impossible, certainly such evidence would hav weight. When Spiritualism succeeds in making a universal demonstration of its claims to all intelligent persons, I shall contribute all my stock of pleasure to the common fund of joy over the triumph. Respectiully. THOS. BURK.

Children's Corner.

"His life is long whose work is well,
And be his station low or high,
He who the most good works can tell,
Livs longest though he soonest die."

Grandfather's Pocketbook.

Grandfather's pocketbook, faded and old!
Years thresscore and ten hav over it rolled
Since the day and the hour when it was new,
And the sheen on it wore its glossiest hue.
Gray it is now with the touch of Time's fingers,
The hard print of which on it still lingers.

'Tis made of morocco, once shining and red;
Grandfather bought it the day he was wed!
He looked on its contents with little less pride
Than he gazed on his young and beautiful bride:
For that he well knew would keep want from the door,
And welcome would giv to the weary and poor.

'Tis a joy to see this pocketbook old,
With its cavernous cells for silver and gold;
It brings to our mind the time far away,
When greenbacks in darkness unconsciously lay;
When sov'reigns and guineas of genuin gold,
And Spanish-milled dollars were made in a mold.

Look! here's a letter, all blotted with tears,
All yellow with age, and stained by the years!
'Tis a love letter, and reads much the same
As letters this day of a similar name;
It begins with, "My darling," and tells of love
As lasting as that of the powers above.

'Tis addressed to grandmother's maiden name,
And there is in it a shadow of blame
That their wedding morn is so far away,
('Twas just one year from the date to the day.)
It tells that he rode sixty miles in a stage!
And grandfather's name's at the end of the page.

And see! here's a lock of grandfather's hair,
As curling and black, as shining and fair,
As when grandma's scissors clipped it from his head
On his nineteenth birthday, when softly he said,
"Take, Susan, I pray, the whole of my head!"
And that was the way he asked her to wed.

Here's their marriage paper, crumpled and torn;
See where it was folded, how it is worn!
The year eighteen hundred, the ink was wet,
Two years from the time my grandparents met,
When they to each other gave hand and heart,
To cherish and love till death should them part.

A sailor was grandpa, brave-hearted and bold,
And fearless of danger, as oft I've been told;
Hardy and activ, to all ports he went,
And brief was the time that at home he spent,
But blissful there were the hours that he passed,
Though shadows of parting o'er them were cast.

He sailed from Newport one bleak winter's morn,
Just as the day was caressed by the dawn.
Grandmother's sweet lips he touched with a kiss,
As he gave her the wallet, saying, "Take this;
There's enough for all that you'll want to buy.
Take care of your babies—and, darling, good-bye!"

Of that ship and crew not the slightest word,
From that day to this, has ever been heard.
Grandmother waited year out and year in,
Till she grew gray-haired, and faded, and thin;
But the dear one came not her fond heart to cheer,
And no tidings of him e'er did she hear.

But one still night, as she quietly slept,
Grandpa came in a dream, and over her wept;
She saw, in her vision, his clothes dripping wet,
And gently he told her that his sun had set;
In his face, icy cold, clearly she read
That his dear body forever was dead.

Time brought to grandma offers of marriage,
A house in town and a handsome carriage;
But to each and all grandma said, "Nay;
In patience I'll wait the coming bright day
When my low-roofed mansion is ready for me,
And I trust in that time my husband to see."

And now she has gone, at eighty odd years,
To the rest that she yearned for through misty tears;
And I think if there's life on the other side,
Grandpa has greeted his long-ago bride!
And I know, if so, the perfect bliss given
Compensates for the joy that here was riven.

The babies, two boys, are old men now,
And silver hair crosses each furrowed brow.
Father, and grandfather, each has become,
And their journey on earth is now almost done;
The shadows of twilight draw on apace,
With stars shining bright on the bosom of space.

Grandfather's pocketbook, faded and old—
Its leaves in reverence I tenderly fold;
And I lay its treasures back in their place,
Putting them up in their old-fashioned case—
For 'mong the choicest things I hav and hold,
Is grandfather's pocketbook, faded and old.

A Grizzly.

"Papa, what is a grizzly?"

"A grizzly, my son, is a species of bear that inhabits the Rocky and Sierra Nevada mountains of the West."

"Papa, did you ever see a grizzly? If you hav, tell me about him, will you?"

"The grizzly is the largest and most ferocious of all the bear tribe. His fur is of a dark brown color, thickly interspersed with white hairs, which giv him a grizzled appearance; hence his name. He grows to be nine feet in length, and frequently attains the weight of one thousand pounds. Although his claws are six inches long and his strength prodigious, his great weight prevents him from climbing trees, as the black bear does. The grizzly bear will attack man or beast at sight, fears nothing, and being very hard to kill is regarded by the hunter as his most formidable enemy and his most precious prize. The Indian brave who can wear a necklace of grizzly's claws, having slain the bear himself, is regarded by his admirers as the bravest of the brave, and honored accordingly."

"Papa, tell me a story about grizzlies, will you?"

"A true one or a make believe?"

"A true one, of course. I like those best. Made-up stories are too much like the Sunday-school books that Amy Linton reads—wishy-washy stuff that you can't depend on. I like something that I can believe and learn something from."

"All right, my boy. I will gratify you. When your grandfather was a young man he had a friend named David Huber, who studied medicin, and when gold was discovered in California by Captain Sutter in 1849, Doctor Huber left the old Keystone state and went to California in search of the shiny metal. But shoveling gravel and rocking the 'long tom' were not congenial employments for the doctor."

"Papa, what's a long tom?"

"A long tom was a kind of rude cradle with a slatted bottom, employed by the early miners of California to wash gravel and separate the gold from it. Doctor Huber practiced medicin for some time, but finally determined to turn shepherd. So he went up into the foot-hills that skirt the Sierra Nevada mountains, built him a substantial log cabin, and stocked his ranch with sheep. During the day the sheep were allowed to run at large, but at night they were carefully housed in order to protect them from the wild beasts that infest the country. One beautiful moonlight night the doctor thought he heard a disturbance among the sheep, so he jumped out of bed, and without waiting to take down his gun, or even dress himself, ran out to the pen, and sprang lightly over the log fence surrounding the sheep-fold and found himself face to face with a huge grizzly, contentedly making a meal on a slain sheep. Not wishing to share Mr. Grizzly's nocturnal repast or cultivate a close acquaintance, the doctor, without even begging pardon for the intrusion, sprang back over the fence and ran toward the house at the top of his speed. But Ephraim—as the hunters call the grizzly—felt insulted and determined to punish the doctor for his meddlesomeness, so with mouth open, growling ferociously, and with surprising agility he followed closely upon the doctor's heels. Finding himself closely pursued, and having no means of defense, the doctor grabbed a picket from the garden fence and wheeling round ran it down Bruin's throat, whose jaws closed like a steel trap, biting off the picket and chewing the offending piece into bits. In the mean time, the doctor having sprung aside, the bear spat out the unpalatable medicin and returned open-mouthed to the charge as before. Again the doctor administered a full dose of piquet de jardine, and sprang aside to await the effect."

"What is piquet de jardine?"

"Well, my boy, doctors are generally very learned men, and having a reputation to sustain they giv their medicin foreign names to enhance its value, and piquet de jardine is French for 'a picket off the garden fence.' But as the bear was not an educated one, and had never been to 'Yhrrup,' the effect was lost upon him. He regarded the medicin as a common American product and rejected it scornfully. But as 'desperate cases require desperate remedies,' the doctor continued to press the picket upon the bear's attention until the supply became exhausted. Gradually the doctor had worked his way toward the cabin door, and as Bruin made his last charge he gave him the stump of the picket as a last hope. The bear's long and heavy body went plowing past the cabin some distance, and before he could stop and turn around the doctor sprang into the recess formed by the ends of the logs at the door, and as he was shielded by the shadow the grizzly on turning around passed the door without seeing him and ran back to the sheep-fold. The doctor, who had been too busy to think of danger, now became thoroughly frightened, and, springing into the cabin, closed and barred the door, jumped into bed, and remained there till after sunrise the next morning. He then peeped cautiously out and his eye caught sight of his gun quietly reposing on the hooks over the door. In his excitement the night before he had entirely forgotten that he possessed such a valuable piece of property. But now it was too late to use it, as the sheep thief had taken his departure, carrying his booty with him. An examination next morning of the ground between the sheep-fold and the cabin revealed furrows in the soft ground as though a plow drawn by a yoke of oxen had done duty there during the night. This was evidently the result of the bear's efforts to check his speed and wheel his unwieldly body when the agil doctor had dodged him. Years afterward the doctor enjoyed many a hearty laugh as he related how he performed the 'wizard dance' by moonlight, while the music was furnished by a grizzly."

THIRD EDITION.

BIBLE MYTHS

AND THEIR

Parallels in Other Religions.

Being a Comparison of the Old and New Testament Myths and Miracles with those of heathen nations of Antiquity, Considering also their Origin and Meaning. With numerous illustrations.

The object of the work is to point out the myths with which the Old and New Testaments abound; to show that they were held in common with other nations; and then trace them to their evident origin and explain their meaning.

"It has long been acknowledged by the most eminent biblical students that the Hebrew scriptures contain a large mythical element; but, so far as we know, the present is the first complete and scholarly atttempt to trace these myths to their source, and ascertain their original signification."—Boston Courier.

"Never before has there been given a volume to the reading world that shows the research for the origin of these myths as does this one just published by J. W. Bouton, of New York."—Boston Times.

"It is unquestionably true that the results of a rationalistic study of the Christian scriptures are nowhere else so accessible as they are now made in the work before us.—N. Y. Sun.

1 Vol. Royal 8vo. Cloth. About 600 pages.

D. M. BENNETT'S LAST WORK.

A TRUTH SEEKER

Around the World.

FOUR LARGE VOLUMES.

With a steel plate engraving of the author in Vol. I. and each volume illustrated with forty-seven cuts.

BY D. M. BENNETT,

Late editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, author of "A Truth Seeker in Europe," "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," "Champions of the Church," etc., etc.

Handsomely bound in red cloth, $6.50; in leather, red edges, $9.50; in morocco, gilt edges, $10.50.

Readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER know the circumstances nder which this work was written. The last words penned by the great author were for the fourth volume which was nearly completed at his death, and which will now contain an account of his world-lamented death and burial. Mr. Bennett was a very patient and faithful chronicler of the habits and customs of the different peoples of the many places he visited. The every-day life of all nations is laid before the reader by one who has visited them and beheld them with his own eyes. Particular attention is paid to the progress of Freethought in the various countries he visited, and the morality of so-called pagan nations is contrasted with the morality of Christian countries, much to the detriment of the latter The work is a

Freethinker's History of the World.

This work and "A TRUTH SEEKER IN EUROPE" should be in every Liberal's library Besides its intrinsic worth it is a memento of one of the greatest Freethinkers the world has known—of one who ranks with Voltaire and Paine in the force and clearness of his writings.

James Vincent's Paper,

The American Nonconformist.

Established in 1879. Price, $1.50 per year.

Editor, JAMES VINCENT, SR. Publishers, H. and L. VINCENT, Tabor, Iowa.

Its motto is: "Total and Immediate Emancipation from Slavery to Bondholders, Railroad Corporations, National Banks, and Ecclesiastical Dictation."

It is the organ of no sect or party.

No paper in the United States, or in the world, is bolder or more emphatic in its demands for reforms in the interest of the commonwealth.

It demands a total separation of church and state.

It insists that the abolition of what is called the Christian church is absolutely necessary before permanent and vital reforms can be accomplished.

It demands that the producer of wealth shall be protected by law in the enjoyment of the largest share of the products of his labor.

A Reply

TO MISS SUSAN H. WIXON'S BEAUTIFUL LINES, "HERE AND NOW."

Of all our thoughts which crowd into a life,
Of all our joys and pleasures, or of pain,
The one thing uppermost, and ever rife,
Is, shall we an immortality attain?

To know is what engages every thought—
To conquer error, and develop mind.
Then shall we say that all this work is naught?
And, dying, leave the world and all, so blind?

Shall we dissolve to elemental states,
And be dumb matter, o'er and o'er again,
To feed the bodies or the brains of apes?
Why not liv on to feed the brains of men?

How can I comfort take in the "here and now,"
When o'er my soul hangs an impending fate?
How can ignorance contentment know,
When life's arcana I may penetrate?

The school-boy worries on with slates and books,
His aching head attests his honest mind,
A puzzling problem seen in all his looks
To get the answer which he seeks to find.

But does he giv it up, and try no more,
And say, "I've done my very best, I trow!
My brain I've racked until it's tired and sore!
I'll rest and take my comfort, "here and now?"

Or see the men, a Newton or Laplace,
Or Kepler, whose telescopic visions rare,
Nature's grand realms taught us how to trace,
And learn of those celestial regions there.

Did such seek pleasure in the "here and now,"
And make no struggle for immortal fame?
Nor weave a wreath for manhood's noble brow,
Nor teach us how a noble manhood came?

Shall any problem which the mind can ask,
Or any thoughts concerning life or death,
Deter from the stupendous task
To answer—e'en with the latest breath?

I've known the gates of glory open wide
To dying man, whose vision then but came,
The angel sister standing by his side,
Who bade him come, and called him by his name

With tears of joy, and looks angelic, she Brought others to his humble dying couch,
And then, with clairvoyant vision, he Could see them all, and sense their gentle touch.

His aged father came, and many more
Whom he knew not while on this mortal side,
With cheerful faces, from the angelic shore
To help him o'er the vasty deep to ride.

And with a smile, as only death can giv,
He said, "My friends! to all I bid adieu;
I've seen the grand and glorious 'other side;'
Of heaven I've had a grand and glorious view.

No words I need on matter or on mind,
No canting priest to guide me on to rest,
His dogmas, rituals, and creeds, I find
The angels smile at, as but a cruel jest.

The soul livs on, as matter most refined,
The body, but the germ of mortal clay,
It dies, and to its mother earth returns,
While I with spirits fly to realms away."

With peace he closed his mortal eyes in death,
A mind full conscious of the "when and how;"
He taught us with his gasping, dying breath,
That immortality is here and now.

Couldn't Understand.

Opie Read in Arkansaw Traveler.

For some time young Mulkittle has been very studious, under the learned superintendence of Miss Patesmore, an old maid who stands in great favor with the minister's family. The other evening, when the lamp in Mr. Mulkittle's study had been lighted, preparatory to heavy work on a new sermon, entitled, by an original flash, "The Fall of Man," the good man entered, arranged his papers, and mused: "Yes, for some time I hav contemplated a sermon on this subject, something, I think, that under my observation has never been clearly done. The fall of man, by all religionists, is taken for granted, and too little effort to explore the case has been made."

The youngster entered.

"Why aren't you at your books, my son? I am much pleased with the progress you are making, and I hope that you will giv me no cause for changing my opinion."

"I want to talk to you," the boy replied.

"Well," turning from the desk, "you are old enough, and hav studied enough within the past five or six months, to talk sensibly. I hav just started to write a sermon on the 'Fall of Man.'"

"I saw him when he fell!" he exclaimed, in the light of sudden recollection. "He was walkin' along on the other side of the street, an' slipped up an' cum down, cur-bim! Ma told you, didn't she?"

"You don't understand me. I do not mean any man you may hav seen fall. I mean the fall of the first man—the fall that caused all our suffering."

"How did he fall?"

"He was told, you understand—for you hav often received instructions on this point—not to eat certain fruit—"

"An' he fell out of the tree?"

"Oh, no. Eve, his wife, gave him the fruit, and when he ate it—"

"It knocked him down?"

"Look here. I don't see that study improves you in the least. You hav heard the story of creation time and again, and—"

"I thought it was the truth."

"It is the truth."

"Then how can it be a story?"

"No, according to your construction of story, it is not one. A great many disputes hav arisen in regard to the tempting of Eve by the devil. Satan, as intelligent men understand the recital, was formerly an angel, thrown out of heaven."

"Why did they throw him out?"

"Because," scratching his head, "he was unwilling to acknowledge the supreme power of God. He wanted to overthrow the great ruler and become a ruler himself. This led to a war. Satan and his band were defeated and cast down to hell."

"Did they fight?"

"Yes, they fought with flaming swords."

"Did any of them get killed?"

"Oh, no; they were not human, and therefore could not die."

"Did Satan get scared?"

"Yes, for he was driven out."

"But if they couldn't kill him, what made him get scared?"

"We don't really know that he was scared, but at any rate he was driven down to hell. This was before man was made. After the creation of man, Satan saw him in the garden of Eden, enjoying himself, and was determined to work his downfall; so he left the infernal regions and went to the garden of Eden."

"Did God know when he left?"

"Oh, yes."

"And did he know that Satan wanted to hurt Adam?"

"Most assuredly, for he had warned Adam against him."

"Did God love Adam?"

"Yes, for Adam was made in the Lord's image."

"Then, why didn't the Lord scare Satan away?"

"You are getting into your old foolish habit again. The more I try to teach you the more foolish you become. Satan told Eve that she was blind, but that if she would eat of the forbidden fruit, her eyes would be opened. She believed Satan and ate of the fruit, and gave it to Adam, who also ate. Suddenly they discovered that they were naked—"

"Didn't they know it before?"

"No, for when they ate the fruit their eyes were opened and—"

"Satan told 'em the truth, didn't he?"

"Go on away, now," said Mr. Mulkittle, indignantly. "You are old enough to hav better sense than to ask such silly questions."

"But the fruit done just what he said it would do."

"Go on, or I'll paddle you with my slipper. You are too young to understand, but your youth does not protect you against just punishment. Go on!" As the reverend gentleman reached for his slipper, the youngster, perplexed at his own inability to understand, left the room.

Primitiv Christianity in the West.

BRIDGEPORT, IOWAY, March third ateen aty fore.

MR. EDITOR: Ive bin away holedin a pertracted meetin, over at Hells kitchen. its the wust place in this country, and we concluded, after a grate deel uv prayer and communein with the lord, that wede establish a church there, under the ospises uv the church uv Hopple. akordinly, we went over there, en mas, as it ware, and cut the logs and razed it in wun day. We bilt it with fore corners tu it, becoz the erth hez fore corners, and hosses hez fore legs. in fact, all kind uv fore legged animels hez fore legs. and we put the chimbly at the northeast corner becoz Solaman's temple wuz begun at the northeast corner, and while we warm the Soles of Sinners with the Gospel uv crist, the fire-place will warm their bodies. the populashun is mostly maid up of hoss theves and lude wimmen, and weve had a terrible time to git up a interest in the meetin. we commenst on Saturday nite, and on Sunday we had three fites and a hoss race rite in the church, but we told em wede cum tu stay, and they sed they dident keer a dum how long we staid ez long ez we dident steel nuthin. this we cunsiderd a insult tu the coz, but Bruther Hopple advized peece at anny price, so we kep on a preechin, and a exortion uv em tu cum tu crist. at last the preechin uv the wimmen, espechely mine, semed tu atract em. fust wun, and then another, and at last the hole croud cum, and a pack uv hounds follered, and when wede sing, them hounds wood jine in the corus; and it wood hav dun yure Sole good tu hev heerd the musick.

At fust thade laff at us, but we seed we wuz a gainin' ground. We node the holey sperrit wuz there ef they dident. We could see they ware a mellerin' up, little bi little, and when they cumenct to ask us home with em to eat, we node wede soon git the under holts on em, and shore enuf at the end uv the second weak, bi previous agreement, Sister Hopple tuck one corner and Sister Smith anuther, and Sister Slocum and me the other two, and after a powerful sermon from each corner Brother Hopple riz up in the middle uv the house and commenct a singin "Cum tu Jezes jist now," and uv coarse the fore corners jined in the corus, and the hole pack an hounds jined in with us, and jist ez the mud began tu fall out in the cracks between the logs Gideon Pate riz up and ast fer prairs, bellerin like a caff. And as he iz a leader uv a gang uv thieves the uthers soon follered him, and we had tu thro the benches out uv dores so they cood hav a chance tu rassel with the sperrit, and fer about six hours we wuz all mixed up in a pile on the flore so that we cood hardly tell which from tother. And sich shoutin and singin and huggin and kissin and prayin I reckon haint ben seen sence the day uv Penty Cost. The sisters each tuk one uv these wicked men into our special keepin, and the bruthers each rasseled with a fallen woman. You see we cood hav more effect that way, and were lurnt bi experience that a woman can handel a man at a revival better than wun man kin handel anuther man.

Bruther Hopple calls this strategy, and i gess it is, for it works offal nice. i hed the plesure uv assistin in the baptism uv that hole naberhood (except the hounds), and they wuz thare a sittin on the ice a-shiverin and a-watchin there masters and mistresses ez they cum up out uv the water kivered with glory and icecickles, and singin "thur is a fountin filled with blood," and so forth. i fele ez tho i must cloze this interestin letter, and in duen it i fele ez tho i owe to the reeders uv yure paper the follerin butifull lines. i cumpozed em last nite after the metein clozed. our metein hez bin such a suckcess that i fele ez wun inspired, and at sich times the poetry jist fairly runs rite out uv me.

The Pot uv glory's bilein
In the fiyur place uv hell,
And the dinner uv Salvashun,
That the Cristian luvs so well,
Will sune be on the tabel,
All a-smokin with the breth
Uv our Lord and Savior Jezes,
Hoo will save our soles frum deth.

Health in the Household,
OR HYGIENIC COOKERY.

BY SUSANNA W. DODDS, M.D.

One large 12mo volume, 600 pages, extra cloth or oil-cloth binding, price $2.00.

THE object of this work is to enable health-seekers, and those who would eat for life and for strength, to furnish their tables with food that is wholesome, and at the same time palatable.

PART FIRST, giving "The Reason Why," contains the philosophy of nutrition, the constituent elements of various articles, and their relative values, and the reasons for some articles being better than others.

PART SECOND, the "Hygienic Dietary," gives directions for the preparation of food, recipes for cooking, etc., in what the author considers a strictly healthful manner.

PART THIRD, "The Compromise," containing directions for preparing food, not strictly in accordance with the Hygienic way, but in such a manner as to render it more plain and healthful than it is ordinarily found.

Undoubtedly the best and most practical Family Cook-Book published, and will contribute very much toward the promotion of Health in the Household.

TESTIMONIALS:

Read the following testimonials, and be convinced that our claims are correct in every particular and that your ailments can be eradicated without the aid of MEDICIN. THESE APPLIANCES ARE THE ACME OF PERFECTION:

Remarkable Cure of Paralysis in One Week.

CINCINNATI, Dec. 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: As I feel greatly indebted to you for the benefit I hav received from your treatment, and the use of your Magnetic appliances, I can say without hesitation to those afflicted as I hav been that the effect was simply marvelous. Two weeks ago I was stricken with paralysis in my right arm and could not use it at all, but after wearing a suit of your MAGNETIC CLOTHING for one week, can use it quite as well as ever. I hav also been troubled with Dyspepsia and Kidney Complaint for a number of years, from which I hav suffered intensely, and, although doctoring all the time, never found but temporary relief. Since putting on your appliances I hav experienced great benefit, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav in the past two weeks, will soon be well. I would, therefore, recommend to those suffering as I hav your Magnetic appliances as the only means of effecting a sure cure. Yours respectfully,

WM. H. CLEMMER,
No. 80 Eastern avenue.

Remember that the same appliances which will effect a cure in a case of Paralysis will at the same time eradicate CATARRH or DYSPEPSIA in the same patient. We do not, like the Old School Physician, change medicins every day until, after dosing the patient almost to death, he may possibly strike something (if he is very skilful) that brings relief for the time being.

Neuralgia of the Heart of Six Years Standing Cured in Three Weeks.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., Dec. 11, 1882.

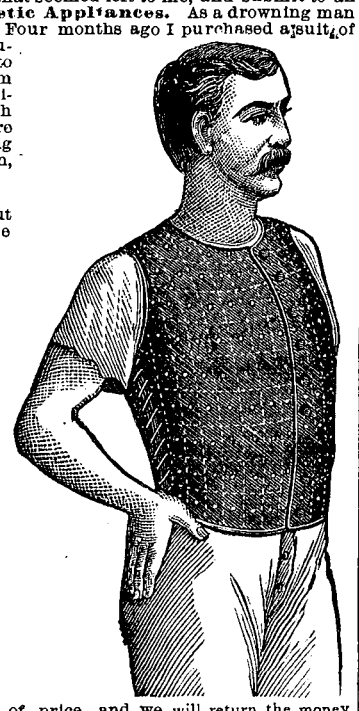
DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: After wearing one of your MAGNETIC VESTS for about three weeks, I was entirely cured of Neuralgia of the Heart and Side, which had been a source of misery to me for the last six years. I had tried numerous remedies before without benefit, but as soon as I put on the MAGNETIC VEST I got relief instantly. With unbounded gratitude, I remain

Yours respectfully,
H. A. BROWN.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been under drug treatment for eight years with nervous prostration and female weakness:

OSBORN, O., Dec. 15, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY: Your letter just received; also the Clothing on Tuesday last. Fitted perfectly. FELT BETTER FROM THE FIRST HOUR I HAD THEM ON. Am not joking, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav since Tuesday, will soon be well. Will report again soon. Respectfully yours, E. J. K.



This lady reports herself entirely cured in less than six weeks after putting on the garments, and, although in bed, unable to get out, when applied, she nevertheless was able to ride twenty miles in two days after the application. The lady's name can be had upon application at this office, by anyone desiring to communicate with her.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been suffering for two years with an Ovarian Tumor, and who had been told that nothing but the knife would save her life, and the chances were as 9 to 1 against recovery. In four months' time she is perfectly well, and has not taken a dose of medicin since putting on the appliances. Consult us when your physician tells you he can do nothinog for you; it will pay you.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., November 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY, Dear Sir: About two years ago my health began to fail me; I became nervous, lost all desire for food, and, in fact, began to fail rapidly, so that I became alarmed and consulted several physicians of St. Louis, at which place I was then stopping, all of whom declared that I had an Ovarian Tumor, and that the only thing that would save my life would be the knife. About six months ago I grew rapidly worse, and had about made up my mind to take the only course that seemed left to me, and submit to an operation, when my attention was called to the Eureka Magnetic Appliances. As a drowning man will catch at a straw, so did I catch at this faint hope of a cure. Four months ago I purchased a suit of your appliances. From the very first I felt invigorated, the tumor, which had extended entirely across my abdomen, began to decrease, my pains became less from day to day, until now I am as well as I ever was in my life. Since putting on the appliances I hav not taken a single dose of medicin. My bowels, which before were constipated, are now regular. I would therefore cheerfully recommend them to anyone suffering as I hav, believing that they will do all and more than you claim for them. I remain,

Gratefully yours, MRS. MARY J. STEWART.

Remember that these appliances are not worn next the skin, but over the under-garment, and, unlike all other appliances in the market, they impart no shocks and leaves no sores.

While our appliances are offered at less than one-third of what others are selling worthless appliances for, yet we will guarantee that the magnetic quality is a hundred fold superior to any other appliance ever offered the public, and will outlast the garments themselvs. Every magnet is put through a particular process, and hav raised five times their own weight six months after being magnetized, while not a single appliance in the market will attract the smallest particle of iron, the majority of such worthless appliances having so-called magnets made of material no better than hoop-iron, and not capable of retaining magnetism for a moment. All of our garments are made from the very best material for the purpose, and will outlast any and all other garments now before the public. Every magnet is arranged in the garments upon scientific principles, and not haphazard as in all the others. We offer you therefore

The Only Scientific Magnetic Appliance Ever Constructed.

And challenge comparison with any of the so-called magnetic garments now offered under that head. At the same time the application of labor-saving machinery in our manufacture enables us to offer them about

AND

THE DEVIL'S DEFENSE.

By Col. John R. Kelso, A.M.

Not since Hudibras has there been such damaging blows given to these old myths and fables. The colonel has made the sacredness of the scriptures appear as absurd as Cervantes made that of the knights of the age of chivalry. The singular audacity with which he attack. the foundations of Christianity shows the earnestness of his own convictions in regard to its fabulous origin.—L Hutchison.

Gems of Thought.

MAN may be regarded as an epitome of all that is below him in the scale of animal life; and he is endowed with passions and selfish qualities which, if yielded to, not only interfere with the happiness of others, but also with his own. It is man's prerogativ to draw from existence all the happiness that is possible, but this is not done by yielding to the voice of passion, nor by following the tastes which end in excesses that militate against his physical and mental health, and must result in pain and unhappiness. —D. M. Bennett.

MORAL courage is unquestionably, if the most manly, certainly the rarest of the social virtues. The most venerated traditions and institutions of society, and even some of the kindliest and most finely-fibered affections, are not in a few cases arrayed against its exercise, and in such cases, to speak the truth boldly requires a combination of determination and of tact, of which not every man is capable. . . . There are occasions when a man must speak boldly, and even at the risk of plucking the beard of fair authority somewhat rudely. If he does not do so he is a coward and a poltroon, and not the less so because he has nine hundred and ninety-nine lily-livered followers at his black.—Blackie's Self-Culture.

THE lazy, the dissipated, and the fearful should patiently see the activ and the bold pass them in their course. They must bring down their pretensions to the level of their talents. Those who hav not energy to work must learn to be humble, and sh ould not vainly hope to unite the incompatible enjoyments of indolence and enterprise, of ambition and self-indulgence.—Sharpe's Letters and Essays.

AS that man cannot set a right value upon health who has never known sickness, nor feel the blessings of ease who has been through life a stranger to pain, so can there be no confirmed and passionate love of truth for him who has not experienced the hollowness of error.—Coleridge.

"YOU are sick, that's sure!" they say.
"Sick of what?" They disagree.
"'Tis the brain," says Doctor A.
"'Tis the heart," holds Doctor B.
"The liver, my life I'd lay;"
"The lungs," "the lights!"
Ah me!
So ignorant of man's whole,
Of bodily organs plain to see;
So sage and certain, frank and free,
About what's under lock and key—
Man's soul. —Browning.

THE first step toward philosophy is incredulity.—Diderot.

"PIOUS and painefull!" Why has that excellent old phrase gone out of use? Simply because these good, "painefull," or pains-taking persons proved to be such nuisances in the long run that the word "painefull" came, before people thought of it, to mean pain-giving instead of pains-taking.—O. W. Holmes.

IT is necessary to the happiness of man that he be mentally faithful to himself. Infidelity does not consist in believing or disbelieving; it consists in professing to believe what he does not believe.—Paine's Age of Reason.

WHEN you pray, be not like the hypocrits, who delight to stand in the synagogs, or at the corners of the streets, that they may be sure to be seen. I tell you, they hav received their reward already. But when you pray, go into your inner chamber, shut the door, and pray to your father who is in secret; and your father who sees in secret will reward you.—Jesus Christ.

IF the religion of the present differs from that of the past, it is because the theology of the present has become more scientific than that of the past; because it has not only renounced idols of wood and idols of stone, but begins to see the necessity of breaking in pieces the idols built up of books and traditions and fine-spun ecclesiastical cobwebs; and of cherishing the noblest and most human of man's emotions, by worship, "for the most part of the silent sort," at the altar of the unknown and the unknowable.—Huxley's Lay Sermons.

UPON reading the Pentateuch, we find it full of prodigies and miracles. It givs an account of a state of the world and of human nature entirely different from the present—of our fall from that state; of the age of man extended to near a thousand years; of the destruction of the world by a deluge; of the arbitrary choice of one people, as the favorits of heaven, and that people the countrymen of the author; of their deliverance from bondage by prodigies the most astonishing imaginable I desire anyone to lay his hand upon his heart, and, after a serious consideration, declare whether he thinks that the falsehood of such a book, supported by such testimony, would be more extraordinary and miraculous than all the miracles it relates; which is, however, necessary to be received according to the measures of probability above established.—Hume's Essay on Miracles.

SO long as error and evil passions lift up their heads in literature, the soldiers of truth must go forth against them; and seldom will it be practicable to fulfil the task imposed upon Shylock, and cut out a noxious opinion, especially where there is an inflammable habit, without shedding a drop of blood. In fact, would it not be something like a mockery when we deem it our duty to wage battle, were we to shrink from using the weapons which God has placed in our hands? Only we must use them fairly, lawfully, for our cause, not for display, still less in mangling or wantonly wounding our adversaries.—Guesses at Truth.

THE sun will run his orbit, and the moon
Her circle. Wait and Love himself will bring
The drooping flower of knowledge changed to fruit
Of wisdom. Wait, my faith is large in time,
And that which shapes it to some perfect end.
—Tennyson.

THE first duty of a wise advocate is to convince his opponents that he understands their arguments and sympathizes with their just feelings.—Coleridge.

Odds and Ends.

A CLERGYMAN, meeting an inebriated neighbor, exclaimed, "Drunk again, Wilkins!" to which Wilkins, in a semi-confident tone, responded, "So am I, parson!"

THE reporter of a New York daily paper went to see the panorama of "Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress." On being refused admittance without paying, he said, "Let me see Mr. Bunyan, then; he will let me in."

A LITTLE girl was taught to close her evening prayer, during the temporary absence of her father, with "And please watch my papa." It sounded very sweet, but the mother's amusement may be imagined when the child added, "And you'd better keep an eye on mamma, too!"

"YES," she said to her escort as they glided around the rink, "I do so love roller skating. When we are sailing around this way our souls seem to be floating away toward heaven, and ——" At this point both of her soles floated away toward heaven, while the rest of her smote the earthly floor with a mighty smite.—Independent (Orthodox).

THE conversation was about bishops, and one fervent dame said: "How good the dear bishop of Peterborough is! What a good man!" Instantly a small-salaried preacher replied: "There is no merit in that. Bishops ought to be so. They get five thousand a year for being good, while we are expected to be good for almost nothing—and most of us are."

THERE was a young man out in Arizona who once declined a pressing invitation to favor a select company with a song. "Oh, really, you must excuse me," he said. "I tell you I can't sing. I don't come of a singing family. Why, there was my old father; he used to try 'Old Hundred,' but he had so little ear for music that he never got any more than ninety out of the tune.

"PAP, is it a sin fur a man to hav two wives?" "Yes, son." "Well, it isn't a sin in heaven to hav' two wives there, is it?" "Yes, I suppose so." "Why, old Bloomer's wife what died yesterday is his second wife what's dead now, and if he goes to heaven when he dies, he'll hav two wives there, won't he?" "Yes." "Then heaven must be a sort of a Mormon place, isn't it?" "That'll do now." "Oh, yes; you always say 'that'll do now' when you can't answer what I ask you."

SUSAN adorned her well-turned limbs
With delicate hose, but not for show;
Yet everywhere that Susan went,
The wind was sure to go.

It followed her to church one day,
Playfully gamb'ling round;
Was mischievous, naughty on the street,
As Susan often found.

And when the sexton shut it out
It frisked and capered near,
Roaming impatiently about
Till Susan should appear.

"What makes the wind plague Susan so?"
Kind-hearted young men cried;
"'Cause Susan don't object, you know,"
An elderly maid replied.

AN old Newport lady is a great believer in coal oil as a cure for everything; in fact, as a cure-all, she has coal oil on the brain. And a few evenings ago, while some old women friends were calling on her, one of them said: "I don't know what's the matter with my Johnny's knee. It's swelled, and it makes him so lame he can hardly walk." "Bathe it with coal oil," said the old lady; "I'll guarantee you it'll cure it." Another said: "My Sarah has such a pain between the eyes." "Well, all she's got to do is to rub it well with coal oil three or four times a day, and it'll cure her," hastily remarks the old lady. "Well," said the third woman, "I ain't got nobody sick about my house, but if a body hasn't got trouble one way, she's got it another. All I can do I can't get my Jennie to stay at home of evenings." "Rub her with coal oil," said the old lady, in good earnest, "and I'll guarantee you it'll cure her."

SAYS Reuben Knott unto his fair,
In language burning hot:
"Matilda, do you love me dear?"
Says she, "I love you, Knott."

"Oh, say not so!" again he cried:
"Oh share with me my lot!
Oh, say that you will be my bride!"
Says she, "I'll wed you Knott."

"O cruel fair, to serve me so!
I love you well, you wot!"
"I could not wed you, Reub," says she,
"For then I should be Knott."

A light broke in on Reuben's mind
As in his arms she got;
She looks demurely in his face
And says, "Pray kiss me, Knott!"

THE Pennsylvania courts hav decided that while you mustn't lie about it directly and openly, it is perfectly lawful to keep your mouth shut during a horse trade, and while you must not warrant an animal as perfectly sound in wind, limb, and condidition, without fault, spot, mar, or blemish, when you know that he has a glass eye, goat neck, mange, saddle galls, roach back, ringbone, quarter crack, spavin, flat-foot, wind galls, scratches, capped hock, stiff joint, blind staggers, ox-foot, rattail, and hollow back, yet you are not compelled to call attention to these minor defects in the splendid Kentucky-bred animal you are trying so trade the stranger for a spring wagon, set of harness, two-year-old colt, and $75 cash. This is a wise and humane law, and lets deacon out of a good many tight places, where otherwise trade would be paralyzed, the arteries of commerce choked and stagnated by the unwise hand of oppressiv laws, and panic, mistrust, and depression would settle down upon a hopeless world in the rayless gloom of mistrust and suspicion.

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Entered at the Post-Office at New York, N. Y., as Second-class Matter.

Vol. 11. No. 13. | PUBLISHED WEEKLY. | New York, Saturday, March 29, 1884. | 33 CLINTON PLACE. | $3.00 per year.

Notes and Clippings.

THE new Congregationalist creed recalls to the Universalist the story of the colored theologian who told his flock: "Bred'ren, dar am two roads; one leads to hell and de odder to everlasting damnation." A listening brother called out: "If dat's de case, dis nigger takes to de woods."

GEORGE WASHINGTON was born on the 11th of February, 1732. In 1751 the Gregorian calendar, or "new style," as it is called, according to which we were obliged to jump forward eleven days, was adopted; and so we celebrate Washington's birthday on the 22d in place of the 11th of February.

WEATHER-PROPHET DE VOE, of Hackensack, N. J., has brought himself into public notice by heading a movement to enforce the provisions of the Sunday laws in his town. The New York Sun some time ago said that De Voe was a fool. Those who did not believe it then may reverse their decision now.

A NUMBER of ladies went to the house of the Rev. Mr. Garrison, of Trenton, N. J., one day last week to present him with a testimonial in the form of a gold watch. Mrs. John E. Mellor headed the procession, and as she was about to present the watch she sank into the arms of her husband and died. She had been subject to heart disease.

To show the vinegary effect of religion upon some people, an exchange relates this anecdote: "Dear," said a religio-shrewish wife to her husband, "isn't it time our daughter Amanda should join the church—she's got to be a grown-up woman?" "Heavens, no!" said the husband; "it is all we can do to get along now with your religion. If we had two such Christians in the house it would be impossible to liv in it."

THE Cœur d'Alene gold mine, in Idaho, is attracting a good deal of attention just at present. Contradictory reports as to the richness of the mines are rife. Mr. Pritchard, the discoverer, writing to THE TRUTH SEEKER, in a letter which will be published next week, advises those with comfortable homes to remain where they are, and not be too sanguin about the prospects of uncovering immediate fortunes in the hidden treasure of the Cœur d'Alene mines.

THERE was a warm discussion in a parish meeting of the Seventy-first church, the other evening, reports the Boston Transcript. It was shown that something must be done at once in the way of economy, and various suggestions were made toward the curtailment of expenses. One brother thought the paid choir should be given up, another suggested that the Sunday-school picnic, the young people's dance, and the older people's monthly raffle could be dispensed with; but it was finally decided to reduce the minister's salary. It would never do to interfere with the necessities of worship.

IT seems that the last criterion of honesty has failed. The following conversation illustrates that fact: "Do I understand that your cashier is an embezzler, Mr. Goldust?" asked a friend of the banker. "Yes," replied Goldust, "and we had every confidence in him." "Did he drink?" "Yes." "Chew and smoke?" "Yes." "Gamble and drive fast horses?" "Yes; and, so far as can be learned, was never a church-member nor Sunday-school teacher. In fact, he inspired implicit trust, and it only goes to show how hard it is to discern a man's true character by his habits."

REVIVALIST Harrison has been making a monkey of himself at the Centenary Methodist Episcopal church for some time past, and the flippancy with which he handles religious subjects causes some of the faithful to be themselves a little "fly" in discoursing about sacred things. Here is a sample: "I say, miss," an old lady remarked to a jaunty little creature in one of the front pews, "are you a Christian?" "Well, I should shake a sock," was the innocent maiden's reply. "Then you've found Jesus?" "You kin just bet your specs I hav," the little lady answered, tipping her chin and winking her left eye. "I've got him on a string." The old lady came near fainting, but had the presence of mind to go to the Rev. Harrison and send him around to shake hands with the girl.—St. Louis Critic.

THE influence of Christianity on the politics of this country cannot be overrated, remarks the Winsted Press. "I know three men," says a New Yorker, "in the church of which I am a member, not strict party men, either, but business men, who would each contribute a million dollars to aid in the expense of a campaign with Payne as a leader." The candidate with a barrel would plainly stand no chance of election in opposition to these Christians and their tank. With the help of the Lord and three million dollars the Democratic party might giv the Republicans a respectable funeral and hire the mourners.

LAROY SUNDERLAND writes to the Boston Herald to correct the notion that the men who took the leading part in the antislavery conflict inaugurated in 1830 by William Lloyd Garrison are all dead. He reminds the world that "Parker Pillsbury is living at Concord, N. H., and two members of the executiv committee of the American Antislavery Society, of which Arthur Tappan was president. One of these is Hon. Elizur Wright, of Boston, now eighty years old, and the writer of this article, who is of the same age, and for whose head, 'dead or alive,' his Methodist brothers at the South in the year of 1836 offered a reward of $300,000."

THE National Reform Association held a convention in Philadelphia on the 24th and 25th for the purpose of discussing the best means of overthrowing our government. The association "seeks the strengthening of Christian elements in our national life, as the Christian Sabbath and marriage laws and Bible in public schools. It opposes carrying mails on the Lord's day, which has been the fruitful parent of nearly all our public Sabbath desecration, polygamy, and easy divorce, now so common, and license of the liquor traffic under any form." The main object of the movement is "to secure an amendment to the Constitution recognizing Christianity as the fundamental law of the land."

IN Lyons, France, one year and a half ago, the Socialists published a weekly paper called La Lutte. It had three editors. They were arrested, the paper suppressed, and the editors sent to prison for three years. The next week the paper appeared with a new name, Le Drapeau Noir, and three new editors. Time passed, and they were arrested and jailed and the journal suppressed. Immediately it appeared again under the name of L' Emeute, three more men taking charge. Three weeks ago this journal was also suppressed and its editors imprisoned. Within a week, however, its successor, Le Defi, appeared, with three new men at its helm. It takes a long time for the truth to spread that persecution never succeeds but in inflaming the heart to greater deeds of heroism, France bedaubs her lilies when she persecutes for opinion's sake.

SPEAKING of Talmage's effort at St. Joseph, Mo., to demolish Ingersoll, the Saturday Democrat of that place says: "Talmage's lecture at Tootle's Tuesday evening in reply to Ingersoll was a disappointment to the majority of the audience. There was in the speaker a style of expression of such a violent and irreverent character as could only be tolerated in Talmage, and stands in unfortunate comparison with the smooth, charming, electrifying utterances of Ingersoll. His lecture was not argumentativ, but was of a political or pettifogging character. There were many people in his audience who hav no prejudice against Christianity and who went to hear Mr. Talmage, the acknowledged head of the orthodox churches, hoping that he would remove the doubts, the scales from their eyes. They were honest searchers for light and the truth, and that part of the audience left disappointed. Mr. Talmage's gestures and acting were at times painful and destructiv to his efforts. The S. D. is not a disciple of Ingersoll. It may be, and we hope it is true, that the distinguished scoffer is wrong—radically wrong, but if so it will take a clearer, stronger man than Dr. Talmage to down him."

THAT the confessional is regarded as superior to the law has new support just now from Ohio. The case of John Cohesy and John Weaver, accused of stealing $4,000 from Michael Powers, was tried before a jury in Judge Gardner's court, in Chicago on the 12th, and the defendants discharged. Powers and his wife were an aged and penurious couple. Last fall a box containing about $4,000 in cash was taken from their house. For some time nothing was heard of the money till Father Corbett, an old Roman Catholic priest connected with the convent of the Sacred Heart, hunted up Powers and returned him $1,036 of the stolen money. Where he got the money, or by whose hands it came to him, he refused to say, pleading that it was one of the secrets of the confessional. Cohesy and Weaver, two boys living near Powers, were arrested for the crime. Father Corbett was put upon the stand and severely cross-examined, the court holding that he was bound to tell who gave him the money, but he steadily refused to do so, saying, when pressed, that he did not know. And yet the politicians annually giv Father Corbett's church millions of dollars, and the people submit.

THE attention of those in charge of the Greely relief expedition is respectfully called to a request made on Sunday last by the Rev. Justin Fulton. "Place me," exclaimed Mr. Fulton, "upon a polar iceberg, where no verdure greets the eye and where naught but the white bear's growl can be heard." This request is a thoroughly admirable one, and it should be granted without a moment's delay. A polar iceberg is the very place for Mr. Fulton, whatever Mr. Bergh may say in behalf of the polar bear. Perhaps the bear would not suffer much, provided Mr. Fulton were forbidden to preach to him. The sermon in which the happy thought, as expressed above, is found, was directed against the theater, and contained some incidental abuse of Mr. Miln, the Chicago preacher who recently undertook to demonstrate that he could play Hamlet almost as well as he could preach. Mr. Fulton called Mr. Miln "a hypocrit," also "a cancer," also "a tumor." Waiving the question whether Mr. Miln is really a combined cancer and tumor, the accusation that he is a hypocrit is not justified by facts. Mr. Miln, when he found that he no longer believed the Christian religion, frankly said so, and left his pulpit. He may be a very undesirable person, but he is no more a hypocrit than is Colonel Ingersoll, and Mr. Fulton might with equal justice hav called him a Jesuit or a Quaker. As to the theater, Mr. Fulton proved that it is a wicked place, for the reason that "a good, old-fashioned, prayer-meeting" could not be held in a theater during the progress of a play without seeming to be out of place. Having thus proved the vileness of the theater, Mr. Fulton asserted that "Christians could no more desire to make his bed in hell." It would be a mere waste of time to argue with a man sincerely holding this belief as to the theater. Against such accusations as these the theater needs no defense. The pulpit and the Christian religion ought, however, to be defended against such persons as Mr. Fulton. The infallibility of Fulton is not a dogma of any denomination, and is probably held only by Mr. Fulton himself. He has therefore no right to decide, ex cathedra, what the theater is, and what a Christian may or may not do. If he is honest and sincere, he can know nothing of the theater; and it has long been very evident that he knows nothing of the Christian religion. In denying that any man is a Christian who does not agree with Mr. Fulton and the small number of ignorant persons who share his views about the theater, Mr. Fulton does not represent any intelligent person, much less any reputable sect. He merely expresses what he dignifies with the name of his views, and they are worth no more than the views of any other equally ignorant person.—Times.

GEO. W. FAIRCHILD, deputy United States surveyor for Nebraska, says that all the agricultural land there has been fenced in by the cattle men. Their ranges extend for hundreds of miles, and the wire fences, inclosing all desirable public lands and even watercourses, are posted at intervals with notices threatening death to any persons opening them. The herders assert that they hold these lands under the desert land and timber culture laws. The result is a check to persons seeking to make homestead settlements.

CHAPTER XXI.

A NEW TURN.

There was general hilarity throughout the camp in view of the memorable achievement of Cupples. All prepared to enjoy a mighty feast. There were visitors from the city on the morning's boat, and among them Maria and little Bessie, the baby, now ten years old, but still called the baby for all that.

At high noon the drum corps fell in and played "Over the Rhine," the prelude of the coming attack on pork. The noble victim had received a royal dressing, and was so well cooked that even the palate of a Jew might water for each delicate morsel. Of course no one could get more than a mouthful, but hard tack and coffee and boiled potatoes and rice made up for what might be lacking of the redolent holocaust. There was plenty of good nature and a little commissary whisky to wash things down and make the dinner an Olympic festival. When Cupples advanced to take the first bite, the band vigorously played "See, the Conquering Hero Comes." Cupples bowed, and, after the American fashion, made a little speech, before he plucked the tail of the monster and ate it as his trophy of the night's battle.

"Fellow citizens: The war is begun. The enemy is ours. Thereby hangs a tail. Even so may all combats come to an end. That's to my taste exactly."

The orator was applauded to the echo. Maria and Bessie than took a bit of the fragrant monster. After that everybody got what they could amid universal rejoicing.

Said Col. Billy Stubbs as he strolled along:

"There is a tide in the affairs of men which, taken at the flood, leads on to fame and fortune. A big swell for you Cupples. I'll try a bite of it just for luck myself."

"Take a big one; more luck the better," said Sergeant Jones.

"More hog the better, too, I guess," said Dr. Dobson. "At any rate, the hog gets a good meal."

"And makes one, too," said the sergeant. "It balances at the end."

"I suppose so. I wish I knew how I was going to balance."

"You'll tip the beam, I reckon. Take another slice and help it along."

"No, I thank you. I like to have things go round."

"And keep a going round," said Cupples. "The trouble is that the best things come to an end."

"And the worst things, too; so you see it evens up," said the sergeant.

"It's pretty well mixed though," said the doctor. "I have to say good lord and good devil with quick changes, in order to keep on the winning side."

"It's devil now, sure as fate," cried the sergeant. "Cupples, that's Bolton. Watch him. I hope his memory isn't as good as mine."

It was Bolton and no mistake. He was riding into camp under a flag of truce, a brigadier general in the rebel army.

He passed leisurely by the company with scrutinizing glance. It fell upon Cupples and the sergeant, and then upon little Bessie. A flame of recognition swept over his face, and a fierce gleam was in his eyes.

"Sandy," said he, to a mulatto body-servant at his side, "I know that little girl. It's her very image. I have not forgotten it. She's my slave by the laws of this land."

"I can swear to that myself," said Sandy.

"Haven't I a right to my property? That's what we are fighting for."

"Your claim is valid as things now are, and all the armies of the Union must back you up."

Sandy was his master's factotum. He said and did everything that Bolton wanted him to, for he had the faculty of reaping an advantage from every benefit that he did. Though a slave, he had a boundless ambition.

Little Bessie shrank violently when she met the gaze of the rebel general full upon her.

"I want to go home," she said.

"I guess we'd better," said Maria.

"I second the motion," said Cupples. "Somehow I don't like the look of things."

"There's nothing to be afraid of—only it's uncomfortable to have some folks round. It makes me shiver all over," said the sergeant.

"Like ghosts," said Cupples. "We are afraid of 'em, though we know they can't hurt us."

"It's safer to be at home," said Maria; "then we know what to do."

The day was drawing to a close. The immense porker had serenely vanished. The victory was complete, and everyone seemed to be in a very triumphant frame of mind. In imagination the war was already over, and the Stars and Stripes were floating in an untroubled sky. The blessings of a square meal were shed abroad. Cupples was off duty, and so he and Maria and Bessie could take a look at the dress parade before the evening boat returned. It was a gay sight indeed, and the music was inspiring. The regiment was not very well drilled, but every soldier took pride in his appearance and put his best foot forward, though not always in correct time. The star-spangled banner floated in front—a silken banner presented by the patriotic ladies of E——. There was quite a crowd of spectators, for this was the last time that friends would be permitted within the lines of the army. The next day the camp was to be broken up, and a march made into the interior with the daily expectation of a battle, although there was still some talk of compromise. War as yet had only flung its outward splendors upon the air. Its dark and terrible aspects had not lowered, and it seemed more like a gorgeous sport than a reality.

The brass band played its liveliest music and promenaded up and down before the glittering battalions with prodigious effect. Everybody felt patriotic and that the flag of our country would float only in sunshine.

Now the ranks are breaking up, and the great whistle of the steamboat is blowing, and in fifteen minutes it would start.

"We must hurry up," cried Cupples. "It won't do to miss the boat this time, for I haven't a spare bed in the house."

"Good-bye," said Bessie. "You'll be home in three months."

"Oh, before that," said Cupples. "It won't take long to whip the rebels. We shall have lots of fun."

"More fun at home," said Maria. "I don't like these stray shots."

"I shall dodge 'em," said Cupples.

They were just ready to step on board the boat when an orderly sergeant touched Cupples.

"Is this Bessie your daughter, so-called, or Bessie Bolton?"

"Both," said Cupples. "She's mine, and nobody can take her away."

"That may be," said the sergeant, "but I am ordered to arrest her. She is the slave of General Bolton, and he claims her."

"Claims her!" said Cupples. "Isn't he a rebel, and are we not fighting for freedom?"

"I don't understand that," said the sergeant. "I must do as I am told. According to the law every slave must be returned. They say that may bring about a peaceable settlement."

"Bosh!" cried Cupples; "I've had Bessie with me for years, and possession is nine points of law, anyway. The idea that our government will surrender my little girl to a slaveholder!"

"Come along; Col. Potter will settle it. He's in command of the brigade."

"I'm not going to stand this," said Maria. "I'm going on board. Come, Bessie."

Bessie leaped to her side, and they stepped upon the gangway.

"That's right, said Cupples. "Damn the impudence of this Bolton!"

"Damned or not," said Bolton, just riding up, "that child is mine, and I'm going to have her."

"No, you won't," said Cupples, "but you shall have this," and leaped upon him and dealt him a stinging blow.

Instantly there was commotion. Cupples was overpowered. Bessie was taken in charge by the officer of the guard. Maria went with her, rousing the whole camp with her indignant protest. The feeling of the soldiers was terrific, and many swore that little Bessie should never be taken away from the federal encampment.

"It's only an episode," said Col. Stubbs. "I'll fix it up, Cupples, to-morrow. What an impertinent cuss that Bolton is, fightin' against our laws and yet claiming their aid to restore his property—and that property the handsomest and sweetest little girl in E——. Blast my soul! If he ever comes out from under that flag of truce I'll give him a piece of my mind that will sound very much like a bombshell. I'm glad you hit him, Cupples, though it was a breach of discipline. I'll make the best plea I can, and you shall have a slice of my own steak, and some soft bread and butter into the bargain."

Mr. Cohen on Finance.

In a communication to THE TRUTH SEEKER Stephen Pearl Andrews does me honor in saying that I asked earnestly if it was not price, rather than value, which money represents; which, in his judgment, showed real insight into the subject. And yet in his elaborate essay under the head of essentials of money, he asserts, 1. That it must be a measurer, or measure—which by some is called a measure of value and by others a standard of values. The reason I stated that money represents the price rather than the value is, that an article may hav a price, but a different value at different times, different places, and for different persons. Values are commonly expressed by prices, but not sufficiently certain to make the money, corresponding to the prices instead of values, either a measure or a standard of values.

Values of products and labor may for a very long time remain the same, while the prices for the same may be constantly changing. Money is neither a measure nor a standard of values nor prices. The value of labor and products and prices thereof are determined by what is commonly called supply and demand, by crops, cost of production, transportation, etc., and are influenced by the fluctuation of money but not determined by money. If, for instance, there is a total failure of a crop of cotton, such failure, and not the money, would determin the price of the cotton on hand.

In his recapitulation, Mr. Andrews says: "Money is in the nature of a yardstick, a quart measure," etc. This is only true in one sense, namely: a sufficiency of measures or money facilitates business transactions, while an insufficiency of either restricts them. Again, as measures can be and are made of the cheapest and most convenient material, so can and should money be made. To illustrate: if we were by law compelled to hav a gold yardstick instead of a wooden one, a gold quart measure instead of a tin one, a gold pound-weight instead of an iron one, the consequence would be that these measures would be very dear and scarce, and hence restrict the facilities of exchange; and if this were so, would a yard of cloth be worth more if measured by a gold instead of a wooden yardstick? Would a quart of oil or a pound of butter be worth more for that reason? Is a pound of anything worth more if bought with a gold dollar instead of a paper dollar?

The reason why money is not a measure, unlike the others, is because these measures only measure quantities but not qualities. A yardstick will measure a cheap article the same as a dear one, which money, if it were a measure, would not do.

Money cannot be a measure or standard of values because it is subject to fluctuation and legislation, both of which effect its own and the values it represents. I hav defined money to be a "unit," and claim that after the prices of values hav been determined by supply and demand, money, instead of being a measure or standard of values, becomes a standard of payments.

Money is a representativ of values with the unit expressed upon its face, but the quantity and quality of values it represents are determined by markets, individual agreements—in short, supply and demand. The exchange of a gold or silver dollar having an intrinsic value equivalent to the market price of the commodity to be exchanged would be barter, which does not and cannot answer the present purposes of trade. And as the purpose of money is to constantly travel, its intrinsic material would be too burdensome, as experience proves. On this point Col. Ingersoll once said in Cooper Union: "A paper dollar, to be a good dollar, must contain a dollar's worth of paper. If so, a ten dollar-note should contain ten dollars, and a fifty-dollar note a bale of paper; and yet experience, which is the best teacher, proves that a silver dollar is worth a dollar without containing a dollar's worth of silver, a paper dollar is worth a dollar, containing only one-eighth of a cent's worth of paper, and, still more remarkable, a fifty-dollar bill is worth fifty dollars, containing no more paper than a one-dollar bill. Money, Mr. Andrews correctly asserts, is not property, for we may hav plenty of money and no property, or plenty of property and no money. If as a nation we had money and no property, then the money would be both worthless and useless. Money, being a representativ of value, should not be the value itself. This would only be necessary if it did not circulate. The objections to gold and silver money are, first, because the government, at the expense of the people, must buy the metals for the purposes of money. It buys it with either paper money or public obligations called bonds. If the paper money or bonds are good enough for the bullion dealers, why not for the people? If it is as good for the people as for bullion dealers, why buy the metals? Secondly, to pay off this paper money or bonds at maturity, the money coined having found its way into the public, and being hoarded, the government must buy again. Thus an artificial market for these metals is established and kept up. Third, metal money wears out every fifty years, and its total outlay is a loss upon the taxpayers. Fourth, in its loss by destruction so much real value is lost. Fifth, there never has been and never can be enough of these metals produced to supply this country alone with money necessary to do all its trade on a cash basis. That it is not necessary will be evident from the fact that the trade of New York city is done with one per cent coin money, two per cent paper money, and ninety-seven per cent credit. Sixth, coin money is subject to fluctuation either in the metals or by legislation. The Paris Monetary Commission to agree upon a uniformity between gold and silver coins decided that such was in the very nature of things impossible. Seventh, as long as different kinds of money exist in a country all others will be compared to that possessing the most intrinsic value, thereby causing a fluctuation or instability of the money and the value it represents. Eighth, different kinds of money is merely a scheme for the speculations of money-changers. When the Constitution provides that Congress shall regulate the value of money, it declares for something which Congress cannot do. Congress can regulate its weight, fineness, design, etc., but its value depends upon its purchasing power, which Congress cannot determin. Its purchasing power depends upon prices, which are regulated by supply and demand, and not by Congress. Money is redeemed every time it pays a specified debt and every time it passes from hand to hand for value received. And as every individual is thus by law compelled to redeem it, so should the government in its transactions. Mr. Andrews says that paper money rests solely upon confidence, and is good as long as such confidence retains. I will show that it rests upon more than that. The government which issues it receives its supposed value before it passes out of its hands. For thus having its value received in behalf of the people, the people are morally and legally made responsible to redeem it, not only in coin money (this is an insufficient security), but with all they possess, gold and silver included. That portion of the money necessary to carry on trade is constantly redeemed among the people, and needs no other redemption. That portion which goes back to the support of the government is redeemed by its taxing power. There can be no safer basis nor redemption. It is good as a representativ as long as the original is there. It has been and should be good as a lien upon all its property collectivly even though a government were to change. It certainly is good as long as the government is good, and when the government fails, what guarantee is there for life, liberty, and property? Are they as important as money? Therefore I hold it is not a mere matter of confidence, but a legal obligation of all the people through its government to redeem said money, pledging therefor all they hav got, which ought to be the very best security. Lord Rusconi, Italian delegate to the Paris conference said, "Metal is one thing, money is another; nature makes the metals, law alone makes the money." If exchanges should be made by intrinsic equivalents, should not a mortgage transferring a house worth $50,000 be recorded on a plate of gold to the same amount? What givs a mortgage of $50,000 upon a cent's worth of paper the value of $50,000? Simply the law which enforces its provisions.

ISAAC COHEN.

Philosophy on the Half-Shell; or, Ethics of '83.

CHRISTIANITY.—ELLIOTT PRESTON TO "D. W. T."

Sir, or Madam: Judging from the size of your explosion (about four and a half columns in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Feb. 16, 1884), I suspect that some of the "hot shot" I poured into your redoubt in my article of Jan 19, 1884, must hav reached your magazine; at all events you hav "bloomed out" in most amazing proportions, and talk, too, as if you had "got mad"—a most improper proceeding for a philosopher and sage, such as you claim to be. The more I am abused the better I like it, for it givs me a splendid chance to "talk back."

As I hav already occupied a very large space in these valuable columns in speaking of Christianity, I feel I hav scarcely a right to take more room to-day than is absolutely requisit for touching rapidly upon a few of the leading points which you attempt to make in your criticism now before me.

First, in speaking of Christianity I used the word which you put at the top of your article, using it in its non-scholastic signification, meaning thereby the entire scheme believed in by average Christians. You are aware that without the Eden myth there could be no belief in Christ as a savior, since there would be nothing to be saved from had not our first parents sinned. You will notice that in my essay in the issue of Nov. 24, 1883, which caused all this discussion, I analyzed both Old and New Testaments under a common heading. I used the term simply to denote the belief of the Christian world, as you must hav observed had you taken the trouble to do so. I merely speak of this because you claim to misunderstand me.

The myths of the Old Testament were as much a portion of the Hindoo religion as were the myths of the New, as I presume you are aware, and hence I will not burden these columns with a transcription of the story which lies before me and is almost identical with the Jewish myths.

Is it to be believed (dispensing with references for the moment) that India tinctured the Jewish mind with only that portion of its myths which relate to the New Testament, conveying therewith nothing now found in the Old, since both were part and parcel of the same parent creed? I think not.

In order to dispose of the weight of evidence I derive directly from Col. Ingersoll's statements relativ to the location of the paradise of the Hindoos, etc., etc., as expressed by him in his eloquent lecture entitled "The Liberty of Man, Woman, and Child," you find yourself compelled to assert that he (Ingersoll) has probably "repented him" (in the style of the Jewish Jehovah) that he ever made such statements, and is even now ready to "eat his own words," if requested. This is a "house builded upon the sands" with a vengeance, and you had best get out of it before it fall about your ears. Upon what slimmer pretense could any argument be built than this? You know nothing, you prove nothing, but you "guess"—as we Yankees would say—that Ingersoll would "back down" if questioned upon the subject. If he did, it would be the first time he ever did on a point of theology, or I am greatly mistaken.

Neither are the statements found in Jacolliot's "Bible in India" of such a nature as to be set aside, off-hand, upon the testimony which you offer. I could, if required, fill the same number of columns as yourself with counter statements and authorities, but what would be gained thereby? There would still remain ample room for unlimited discussion and controversy.

Second. You profess to understand me to say that every one of the "Crucified Saviors" was an actual personage, and say I state I do not speak "allegorically." I do not use the word "allegory" or "allegorical" anywhere in my criticism, as you will see by referring to it. I did say I meant "pure and simple English," which you so frequently quote in your reply to me, but (granting my meaning not as absolutely clear as it might hav been made by some other form of expression) you can hav no possible excuse for misunderstanding my true position in the matter, since I say, with the utmost clearness, further on in the same article, "The whole gist of the matter is this: the entire business is most probably mythology, and about as likely to be true as that Christ was himself crucified," etc.

Does this leave any room for doubt as to my true position? Nevertheless, you proceed to set up "men of straw" through the space of several columns in THE TRUTH SEEKER, apparently for no better purpose than to hav the pleasure of knocking them down again. However, the histories of the saviors which you there giv are, in a moderate degree, correct, and so the space is not entirely wasted.

Third. Your apparent attempt to cover your former mistake in regard to my statement of the numerous correct ways of spelling Christna, by saying that every writer is a blockhead who chances to differ from you in his spelling of this name (including the very celebrated Renan), will scarcely stand as "fast colors"—the motiv is too apparent.

Your attempt, likewise, to destroy the credibility of the author of that wonderful work, "Isis Unveiled" (Madame Blavatsky), because she has also written a little volume entitled, "Occult Science," which does not chance to accord with your own particular views, is not likely to prove successful, unless you can "trot out" some better evidence than you hav yet.

By the way, before I forget it, if you desire still more saviors than the sixteen I offered, I hav a very choice lot left over, which you are welcome to, gratis. But I see I hav already exceeded my proper limits of space, and so, without pausing to discuss the subject more in detail, will bid you "Good-day" (or, rather, "Good-bye"), for I shall not probably tax the courtesy of THE TRUTH SEEKER by printing anything further on this subject in its columns at present; and hence, if I do not answer any "fireworks" of yours which this epistle may call forth, you will not be surprised.

As regards my supporter, "Antichrist" (who is personally unknown to me), he is abundantly able to "paddle his own canoe," and, I presume, may reply later on to your strictures upon his article.

As before, I hav the honor of remaining, sir (or madam), yours for exactness, ELLIOTT PRESTON.

A Plea in the Higher Court Against Fire.

If I shall ever stand before the bar of God for the purpose of being judged, in justice I should hav a chance to be heard in my own behalf before I am sentenced to eternal punishment. And believing that, if there is a God, he will be willing to listen, and will giv me an opportunity to present the reason, if I hav any, why I ought not to be damned, I hav prepared the following plea, which I hope to present at the proper time, if I am permitted to defend my own case.

THE PLEA.

May it please your honor: The question of eternal punishment, whether by fire or by any other punishment that shall be eternal, to me just at this time is an important question. In presenting my argument, I shall rely on reason and justice, and will occasionally refer to the eminent counselor, Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, as authority for what I hav to say.

May it please your honor, I hav never punished, nor felt like punishing, any of my erring children, not even for one whole day. In fact, in anger I never struck them a blow in my life. And a divine father has no more right to be cruel and punish his children forever than a human father would hav to punish his erring children forever, provided he had the power to do so.

Your honor has laid down the law that men should do unto others as they would that others should do unto them. And, sir, you cannot justly go back on your own law. Therefore it is your duty to do by me as you would hav me do by you if I were you and you were me. I would not punish you, nor even a dog, forever. Then under your own law you hav no right to punish me.

If I committed sin, and you had the power to hav prevented it, it seems to me that, instead of my asking you to forgiv me, in justice you ought to ask me to forgiv you. But, if I am mistaken, and it is my duty to ask your forgivness, it seems to me, as Ingersoll has said, that "here and now is the proper time and place to do it." And most respectfully, your honor, if I hav ever done you a wrong I now ask your forgivness, and as a merciful God you hav no right to damn me.

Your honor has laid down the rule that men should love their enemies. And if that rule is good for a man it ought to be good for a God. And I insist that you hav no just right to require men to love their enemies whilst you at the same time are damning your enemies. And you cannot consistently damn me under that rule even if I were your enemy, which is not the case.

It is unreasonable to require a father to love a God who has cast even one of his children into hell. I could not love such a God if I would, nor would I if I could. And any religion that requires a man to love the God who has damned either his wife or his children is a barbarous religion, and a religion for which I hav no respect.

In the Bible I find this passage, "That which befalleth the the sons of men befalleth beast, even one thing befalleth them; as the one dieth so dieth the other; yea, they hav all one breath. So that man hath no pre-eminence over a beast, for all is vanity. All go unto one place; all are of dust and shall return unto dust again" (Eccl. iii, 19, 20).

Your honor will please bear in mind that, if the Bible is your work, you hav said that men and beasts will go to the same place. I am here, but where are the beasts? The passage alluded to puts man on the same level with a beast; immortality for one, immortality for the other; no soul for the beast, no soul for the man. I am willing to admit that there are other passages that teach the immortality of the soul, but if one is wrong, how do I know the other statement is right? And I must insist, your honor, that it is unfair for you to damn me for not having taken the proper steps to save a soul that I did not know required saving.

I will now present for your honor's consideration an extract from the theological creed in use at the Andover Seminary, a place where they make Congregational ministers. It reads, and the minister is made to say, "I believe that the wicked will awake to shame and everlasting contempt, and with devils be plunged into the lake that burneth with fire and brimstone forever and ever."

Your honor, that creed is in accordance with the teaching of the Bible. And Rev. J. E. Richards, of St. Johns, who sued me for $10,000 damages to his character for having expressed my opinion that he did not believe the Bible to be the word of God, when in court swore that he did believe that the wicked will be cast into eternal fire, and he said that he could not say but that the fire might be the same kind of fire that we use in our stoves.

Now, your honor, I hav no fear that you will cast me into such a fire as that, believing that you are not quite so bad as my Congregational friend takes you to be.

Hell fire and eternal punishment hav been the stock in trade on which the priesthood hav lived and flourished in all times. With their dogmas of superstition they hav filled men with fear until they through fear fall upon their knees and confess to loving the God who has damned their dearest and best friends.

Your honor can think of what I hav said, and after a little I will go on with the argument, if you shall think that before you decide my case I had best to continue it.

M. BABCOCK.

The Day That I Was Dead.

The day my spirit fled
I mourned not that you were so alone;
I ever had abhorred that crowds should come
In Romish robes within our humble home,
And gaze upon me, helpless, white, and dead;
Or that the church be filled, and pompous priests delivering
The husks of worn-out creeds, while the blessed sun was quivering
Upon truer sermons where the singing grass was shivering,
And chanting its own requiem when life had sped.

That day when I lay dead,
You could not know my spirit dwelt so near,
Grieving with you weeping so many a tear,
And all you loved of earth beyond all earthly fear,
Returning to greet your lonely tread;
And angel guides leading me as I floated sorrowing,
The light of endless worlds my silent way was borrowing,
With morning song of suns, not sweeter than the mother's sing,
And there beheld my other self lying cold and dead.

"So sad 'twas true," you said,
And murmuring low that any sun could shine,
When cruel, cruel fate had parted thee and thine;
And with a spirit-thrill I touched your hand with mine,
While all unknown to you the greater burden fled.
Rejoicing then with me that bright hosts were gathering,
And fields inviting me had no flowers withering,
And you almost heard the tones that fell from a golden string;
And yet, and yet how could I leave you with your dead

Clearwater, N. C. MARY B. FINCH.

The Liberal Club.

The Hon. J. W. Stillman addressed the Manhattan Liberal Club at the last meeting of that body. His subject was the "Mormon Question." This is the third lecture before the club this month on subjects which admit of an incidental discussion of the marriage relation. A man or woman nowadays who is not prepared to giv a recipe for abolishing what little infelicity exists in the marriage state, is not considered by any means up to the exigencies of the times. Mr. Stillman's lecture was not devoted to considering either the morality or immorality of Mormonism, but to a presentation of the question whether or not Congress had jurisdiction over the territories, Utah among the rest. He held that it had no such jurisdiction. He could find no clause in the Constitution delegating to the general government the power to legislate for the people of the territories. Mr. Stillman pointed out that the Constitution was ordained and established "for the United States of America," not for the United States and Territories, and certainly that document contained no reference, either direct or implied, to the relation of the sexes as involved in the question of polygamy. The argument of the speaker was made with a design to establish these propositions, and from the facts given and quotations made from the Constitution and decisions of the courts, the attempt appeared successful.

Mr. Hunn, a prospectiv member of the club, though handicapped by the fact that he was recommended to the audience by Dr. Kinget, made quite an agreeable impression. He did not believe there was a man on top of the earth who was a polygamist by choice. It was natural for the human heart to seek "some one to love, some one to caress"—not half a dozen. Psychological affinity was necessary between two married people. The Rev. Mr. Gallagher, a week ago, had spoken of the happiness of a man who could look into his wife's eyes and see her whole soul looking back at him. That was not always the case. The wife was sometimes dead mashed on some other man. In such instances, the speaker maintained, psychological affinity failed to exist, and discontent was liable to prevail to a greater or less extent.

Dr. Weeks agreed with the speaker of the evening, that the Constitution gave Congress no power to legislate for the territories. If such permission had been contained in that instrument, the subsequent enactment of laws with regard to Utah would not hav been necessary. The very fact that these laws were necessary showed that the authority which they conferred upon Congress was an assumption and did not previously exist. The doctor was about to go on and explain from a temperamental point of view why polygamy and polyandry were necessary to the happiness of some men and women, but the demonstrations of a number of uncivilized persons in the rear of the hall interrupted him. He desisted.

Mr. Andrews held that if Congress had no power to legislate for the territories, it had done wisely in assuming such power, and he would admonish the lecturer that he had undertaken a difficult and hopeless task in endeavoring to convince people to the contrary. The fundamental question of sociology raised by polygamy, the speaker held, was, What may an individual do without authorizing the intervention of the community? We must define accurately the line separating the right of the individual from the right of the community. By the speaker's definition of that line no state or person had the right to punish polygamy any more than they had to punish Shakerism. This was a matter of individual development, and must be left to the sphere of the individual.

Mr. Eccles made a most absurd speech, presenting the proposition that the majority ruled. He was willing to do as the majority said. "Might is right!" he said, with all the emphasis, apparently, which he was capable of putting upon the assertion. At present, he was opposed to polygamy, but when the majority of the citizens of this country decided that it was right, he would say to every person who now differed with him, "My friend, shake hands; polygamy is right."

Mr. Wakeman considered the question of Mormonism in three aspects—constitutional, moral, and political. On constitutional and moral grounds we could not interefere with Mormonism; but it was the part of the wise politician, the statesman, to consider whether we could afford to allow this cancer to continue growing in our country. Mormonism was a hierarchy and opposed to our institutions. There was a limit to toleration. Mormons had reached that limit. They were to be regarded as aliens to this country, and should not be allowed to increase. We hav excluded the Chinese; cannot we exclude the Mormons? They should be denied the ballot. If Catholics organized in the same manner as the Mormons had done, Mr. Wakeman held they should be disfranchised in the same manner. As for Mr. Eccles's speech, Mr. Wakeman thought it the worst one he had ever heard.

Mr. Stillman, in replying to his reviewers, maintained consistently the stand which he had taken at the start, that Congress had no jurisdiction over the territories. He would say further that any state had a right to secede from the Union, just as much as a man had a right to secede from a church. Herbert Spencer also held that opinion. The measures proposed for the extermination of Mormonism were necessarily ex post facto laws, and laws of attainder, which were expressly prohibited by the Constitution. He did not expect to secure a reversal of the decision of the Supreme Court in these matters, because he did not believe the judges composing that court would make a reversal, even if they were convinced that he was right, unless they thought it policy to do so. Still his cause was not altogether hopeless. It was never to late to right a wrong. He had led a forlorn hope before. In 1868, when a member of the Rhode Island legislature, he had made a speech in favor of woman suffrage, and was not encouraged. As for the speaker himself, he said he had, as much as possible, seceded from the government. He had no hand in making the Constitution. He found it here when he came into the world in 1840. He found himself a subject of this government without having been previously consulted as to his wishes in the matter. Mr. Stillman is, like Capt. S. P. Putnam, practically an anarchist.

At the next meeting Madam Delescluze will speak upon "A Mad World." It is well-known that she regards the world as altogether off its base, and the Liberal Club particularly so.

Goldwin Smith on Evolutionary Ethics.

In the controversy which rages to-day around the doctrin of evolution, especially in its application to the sphere of morals, the position occupied by Mr. Goldwin Smith is a somewhat peculiar one. He has more than once expressed his general acceptance of that doctrin as,upon the whole, the most satisfactory interpretation at present attainable of the natural history of the globe and its inhabitants, including man. At the same time it is evident that he has so accepted it, not willingly, but rather upon compulsion. His attitude toward it somewhat resembles that assumed by De Tocqueville toward democracy. The eminent Frenchman saw that democracy was inevitable, and he spoke as many fair words about it as possible; but he did not love it for all that. So to Mr. Goldwin Smith, evolution, as a physical theory at least, seems inevitable, but he does not love it. One concession he steadily refuses to make to it; he will not allow that it furnishes any adequate basis for morals. He seems to say, prove if you like that man, after the flesh, had a simian ancestry; prove that the world is what it is to-day by virtue of certain processes to which you apply the term evolutionary; but unless you can provide mankind with other motivs to right conduct than this scheme of thought will furnish, the moral future of humanity is dark.

At the same time Mr. Smith does not take up this position in the interest of orthodox theology. He tells Mr. Herbert Spencer very bluntly that he (Mr. Smith) is "no more orthodox than he is." He says that, in his belief, the proof of miracles ever having occurred has failed, and that therefore he sets aside "all theological dogma respecting the trinity, the incarnation, the scheme of redemption, and the atonement." Even so he feels it to be his duty to try and show that a belief in God and a future life is essential to the moral integrity of the human race, or at least that without a belief in these doctrins no justification can ever be found for the practice of any greater or higher virtue than each individual may find convenient.

The orthodox churches of the land (if more than one church can properly be called orthodox) while they mourn over Mr. Smith's feebleness of faith, rejoice that his powerful pen is employed in assailing one very important aspect of the evolution theory. His article in the February, 1882, number of the Contemporary Review, entitled "Has Science Yet Found a New Basis for Morality?" was received with much satisfaction; and the one published by him in the last December number of the same periodical under the title of "Evolutionary Ethics and Christianity" will, we doubt not, be hailed with equal approval. "If this world," says Mr. Smith in the last mentioned article, "is merely a state of existence, it is a fearful failure, even in comparison with the works of man who economizes material, and tries to spare labor and avoid inflicting pain. If it is a theater of action, and a school of preparation for something higher, its imperfections may be capable of explanation."

We hav said that the position occupied by Mr. Goldwin Smith in relation to these momentous controversies is peculiar; we go further and say that it does not seem to us a very consistent one. He finds the world, as it reveals itself to ordinary apprehension, imperfect—so imperfect that it does not suggest either a wisdom or a goodness equal to that of man. The orthodox Christian who forms a similar conclusion, falls back at once and with confidence upon a revelation which tells him that this world is not all—that being but part of a much vaster scheme it does not and cannot tell the story of that scheme—that interpreted apart it must seem imperfect, if not unmeaning. For this view of the matter the believer can quote chapter and verse of an inspired book. Inspiration involves miracle, but miracle presents no obstacle to faith; on the contrary, it is the appropriate aliment of faith. But Mr. Smith, if he holds that the proof of the miracle has failed, must hold, we should judge, that the proof of inspiration has failed. The Bible therefore, however venerable it may still be in his eyes, can no longer speak to him with authority. What it says or hints in regard to the government of the world, or the significance of human life, can only be accepted as the utterance of this or that ancient sage upon questions really too vast for any individual wisdom to grapple with. What is the opinion of any mere man worth on such a question as whether this earth is "a mere state of existence" or "a school of preparation for something higher?" Manifestly upon such a question we can know nothing unless it be revealed to us. Now Mr. Smith's position appears to us to be inconsistent in this, that while he repudiates for his own part the knowledge which the ordinary Christian professes to hav in regard to these great matters, and contents himself apparently with mere conjecture, he yet accepts the responsibility of throwing discredit upon those theories of human duty and morality which other writers hav constructed and are constructing upon a naturalistic basis. We can understand the theologian and his disciples doing so, for they say, "We know that the naturalistic basis is not the true one; we know that another foundation has been laid, and that its maker and builder is God." But Mr. Smith, who has nothing to go upon but his own conjecture, supported by what to him are the mere speculations of ancient writers, should not, it seems to us, seek to make these conjectures or speculations the basis of anything so important as human morality—anything which so imperativly requires to rest upon solid facts. Better, it seems to us, from his point of view, to make the most of the naturalistic basis, to build upon it whatever can be built, and then, if the structure is criticised as incomplete, to to say: "Well, it is the best I can do on the basis of what is really known? Choose your ground and build better and more nobly if you can." This, we think, would be worthier of a great mind than querulously to persist in wishing to build upon ground that it has virtually abandoned.

The further question arises whether even the churches should not look more kindly than they do upon the evolutionary schools of morals. Of course if the churches are to be governed by mere party spirit they will seek to cast discredit upon everything done by those who are not with them; and evolutionary morals, like all the other works of the enemy, or supposed enemy, will come in for their share of partisan abuse. But if the churches can rise above the plane of mere party strife, they will be disposed to encourage all efforts, by whomsoever made, to inculcate the reality of moral obligation, and strengthen the sense of duty. The evolutionist—Mr. Herbert Spencer, Mr. Leslie Stephen, or Mr. Fiske—may not start from the point you would wish, but if each in his own way is laboring to show the unity of moral truth, and to consolidate the moral frame-work, so to speak, of human life, surely, so far, we may wish them god-speed. If, when they hav all done their best, their work stands manifestly imperfect, needing the crown which doctrinal Christianity alone can place upon it, the triumph of the latter will only be the more signal for the fair opportunity afforded to its rival. If, on the other hand, the evolutionists are jeered at, and thwarted, and misrepresented, the world may miss to some extent the good work which they are prepared to do, while the real difference between morality as constructed upon a naturalistic or positiv basis, and morality as constructed upon the basis of revelation, may not be so instructivly or clearly brought to light.—Communicated to the Ottawa Free Press.

Benefactions of an Evoluted Baptist.

George J. Holyoake, writing to a Boston paper, givs this account of his visit to the late Samuel L. Hill, the well-known philanthropist, of Florence, Mass.:

Afterward, I visited Mr. Samuel L. Hill, the chief founder of Florence. He was a man of good stature, a good forehead, and of impressiv countenance. In the middle of this century, he had been a chief leader and promoter of a social community in the neighborhood of Florence, which has an instructiv history. He subsequently acted upon the high principle of associativ life which he professed. He subscribed $20,000 toward the erection of the Cosmian Hall, in Florence, and subscribed $1,500 a year to the support of the preacher. A house he had built for himself he gave up to be used as a "Kindergarten" school for children. The upper room, with two bay-windows looking over verdant gardens, was very beautiful. It was well supplied with means of instruction. The teachers resided in the house, and all the establishment was supported by Mr. Hill's generosity. In the winter, when snow fell, he sent a large, light wagon from the farm, which went round to the homes of the little pupils. When school was over, this wagon came for them and again left each at home. The morning wagon, gathering clean-faced, rosy children, and driving them laughing from house to house, until it was full of little Kindergarteners, was a sight as pretty as a prayer. Mr. Hill was a Quaker; but, marrying a bright-eyed Baptist, he joined that church, and became deacon at Willimantic, Conn. He set himself against slavery in its dangerous days, but he was soon "admonished that the church could not be used to address the people on that subject." He was afterward found with those engaged in the bitterest fight for the freedom of the negro. His philanthropy was not sentimental at one corner only; it was of an all-round, robust quality. He was also for the welfare of all in his employ. He wanted every man to be permanently well off. He assisted them to get houses and land of their own. It has been said lately in the Springfield Sunday Republican that probably half the buildings in Florence came to be thus owned by his aid. He owned himself the steam silk-mills of Nonotuck. He was a co-operator of the old school, who hav nearly all died out. He gave $25,000 to a fund to enable workmen to get houses, and 27,000 to erect a great school-house. To the school superintendent he paid $1,000 a year, in order that he might receive $2,000 salary, as he well knew that there is no folly like that of stinginess and parsimony toward those whose brains you need to do good-work. In all things, he was a co-operator, with the spirit of a gentleman, who knew that knowledge was a good investment, and took care that all who labored for him by hand or brain had "a good time of it." His merit was that he did not look for profit, but for improvement, or rather that was the profit he had in view. He lived himself in what we should call a plain villa residence. I think, with pleasure, that I spent some time with him the last night he passed in it. He set out next day for Citronville, Ala., for change of air, but died on his arrival, at the age of seventy-five. Many were the fugitivs from slavery of body, of capital, and of opinion, who had found shelter in his hospitable house in the evil days of progress. These were "actions of the just," which "smell sweet and blossom in the dust."

Editorial Notes.

THE Chinese hav evidently a poor opinion of the Christian religion. When Sir R. Alcock bade adieu to Prince Kung, the latter said, "Now you are going home, I wish you would take with you your opium and your missionaries."

SHAPIRA, the man who claimed to hav discovered an ancient manuscript of the book of Deuteronomy, has committed suicide. Mr. Shapira would hav died less under a cloud if he had committed this last act previous to making his remarkable discovery.

SIR JOHN BENNETT accuses the corporation of the city of London, which he knows pretty well, and perhaps too well, of "opposing national education," and being a "senseless enemy" of the people. This is the corporation that prosecuted the three Freethinkers whose portraits we printed last week.

THE Rev. Dr. Potter, who gets his living by lecturing all over England against the iniquities of Roman Catholicism, says "it is no infringement of liberty to restrain such blasphemers as Foote and Bradlaugh." That is good Christian doctrin, but Dr. Potter's frankness will be apt to prejudice some people against his church.

IN the prelude to his lecture of March 10th Jo Cook affirmed that "numerous obscure and infamous Infidel organizations advocate doctrins which undermine the permanence of the family and the sanctity of home." Is there any ground for this charge? Cook should giv names, "not necessarily for publication, but as a guarantee of good faith."

MR. WAKEMAN, at the last meeting of the Liberal Club, made the astonishing proposition, if we may believe our reporter, that the Mormons at present inhabiting this country should be regarded as aliens and disfranchised accordingly. This was followed up with another quite as electrifying: "We hav excluded the Chinese; cannot we exclude the Mormons?" Certainly; but it would be an act as much at variance with American notions of liberty as any measure advocated by the Mormon hierarchy.

MR. MOODY, the evangelist, has circulated, or permitted to be circulated, a statement that he has recently converted "an avowed Infidel, prominently associated with Mr. Bradlaugh in the Freethought movement." Mr. Bradlaugh invites Mr. Moody to giv the name and address of the alleged convert, and says that Mr. Moody has more than once announced conversions which hav turned out to be purely imaginary or to hav been conversions of persons already really or nominally Christians. He adds that Mr. Moody must be either very careless or excessivly inaccurate.

ANY one wanting a good crayon portrait drawn should write to F. E. Sturgis, box 14, Upper Sandusky, Ohio. He is a Liberal in very needy circumstances, the care of a sick wife and a large family of small children having reduced him to financial straits. We can conscientiously recommend his work, for last year he executed a life-size crayon of the founder of THE TRUTH SEEKER which all pronounce to be the most life-like picture ever made of Mr. Bennett. We believe Mr. Sturgis to be a thoroughly honest gentleman, and it givs us pleasure to testify to his great skill with the pencil.

THE Italian papers report that after an examination with closed doors, the Austrian courts at Trieste hav sentenced Michele Vigna to five months' imprisonment with hard labor, and to expulsion thereafter from the Austrian territory, for being connected with the Societa Atea of Venice, of which Baron Swift is president, of which Gen. Garibaldi was honorary president, and of which Professor Buchner and Charles Bradlaugh are honorary members. The sentence is for disturbing religion. The editor of L'Adriatico winds up his notice by asking: "Is this justice? Is it law? Is it possible?" The story seems so monstrous, comments the National Reformer, that we wait for some further light on it.

MR. JUSTICE STEPHEN has published in the Fortnightly Review an elaborate essay on "Blasphemy and Blasphemous Libel," in which he points out that "everybody who sells, everyone who lends to his friend a copy of Comte's 'Positiv Philosophy,' or of Renan's 'Life of Jesus,' commits a crime punishable with fine and imprisonment;" and that the late William Rathbone Greg, who "was not only a distinguished author, but an eminent and useful member of the civil service," if convicted of "publishing his opinions, or even of expressing them to a friend in private conversation," might hav been "adjudged incapable and disabled in law to hold any office or employment whatever," and on a second conviction imprisoned for three years and practically outlawed. The judge further declares that it is because no one can dislike the blasphemy law more profoundly than he that he prefers to state it "in its natural naked deformity." He contends that the blasphemy law can only be explained and justified on "the principle of persecution;" for, "if the law were really impartial, and punished blasphemy only because it offends the feelings of believers, it ought also to punish such preaching as offends the feelings of unbelievers." In Judge Stephen's opinion, blasphemy and blasphemous libel should cease to be offenses at common law at all, and the statute of William III. should be repealed.

IN Aberdeen, Scotland, according to the Aberdeen Express of February 28th, the testimony of Atheists is not received in court. A case came up in which James Reith was charged with having sold liquor on Sunday. The first witness called was objected to by Reith's counsel on the ground that he did not believe in a God. The court sustained the objection, and the suit was brought to a sudden close. This action places the Presbyterian judge in a funny attitude. He had either to let Reith go unpunished for desecrating the "Sawbath" by liquor selling or take the testimony of an Atheist. He chose the former, therein being consistent with the rigorous faith that maintains the denial of God to be the worst crime in the universe; but how the morality of Aberdeen would suffer if all the bibulous population were Christians, and the abstaining complainants were Atheists!

IT will be remembered that the blasphemy of which Mr. Foote was convicted consisted of publishing wood-cuts caricaturing the Christian idols. During his imprisonment their publication has been suspended. They will, however, now that he is released, be again a feature of his paper, and appear regularly until he "goes to prison again." That contingency Mr. Foote does not regard as probable, for it strikes him "that the bigots hav had enough of the game for a good while." We cannot praise too highly Mr. Foote's pluck and heroism, but really we would like to see him employ a better artist in making his cuts. We hav no supercilious criticisms to make on his "taste," for we regard ridicule as a legitimate and powerful weapon to be used against the Jewish mythology; but his paper would hav a wider circulation, and so do more good, if his artists were better workmen.

CAPT. LOYD, of New Rochelle, once remarked at a Paine meeting that his neighbors were "so blue that they left a yellow streak behind them." This intense blueness is paralleled by the people of Orange, N. J., the home of Soap-boiler Colgate and other eminent Baptists. But their Christianity could not stand the test of the Salvation Army, which invaded the town the other day, appropriately hiring a hall over an undertaker's establishment. The first night the Army was forced to silence by the catcalls, hootings, and shameless remarks of the rough element that gathered to see the new sensation. The general applied the next day to the mayor for protection, but that worthy declined to interfere and ordered the policemen to keep away from the hall. This refusal to protect was prompted by a desire to drive the humble workers in the vinyard from the aristocratic precincts of Orange, and was taken by the "boys" as a license to work their will upon the preacher, which they did with rotten eggs and harder missils. And now the whole town may go plumb to hades for all the efforts that army will make. One of the females of the troop contributed her quota to the demoralization of the town by allowing herself to be led astray by one of the young Christians who rotten-egged the preacher. A missionary to civilize and moralize the lower stratum of Orange society would get a good subscription from the few Infidels of the town, and one to teach justice, humanity, and charity, would find plenty of work among the lip-serving accidents of wealth who pass in Orange for Christians.

THE Rev. Dr. J. A. Gordon laments with bitter tears, and almost without hope, the worldliness of the church of Jesus Christ. He cries out in this way:

"Oh, for a faith to abandon utterly the devices of naturalism, and to throw the church without reserve upon the power of the supernatural! Is there not some higher degree in the holy spirit's tuition into which we can graduate our young ministers, instead of sending them to a German university for their last touches of theological culture? Is there not some reserved power yet treasured in the church which is the body of Christ—some unknown or neglected spiritual force which we can lay hold of, and so get courage to fling away forever these frivolous expedients on which we hav so much relied for carrying on the Lord's work?"

If the Rev. Mr. Gordon can find something besides the devices of naturalism that will draw a congregation and keep it awake; if the Holy Spirit will giv clergymen a tuition which will enable them to speak grammatically; if he can discover something besides frivolous expedients that will fill the contribution-box, pay the pew-rents, and enable the preachers to liv well and dress well, it doesn't look as if he had suggested a very difficult scheme. Everyone would like to see the church run as he suggests. We are all willing to dispense with grab-bags, and to allow the oyster which has done service in so many stews, to be permanently retired. It would also be universally gratifying to see some of the "reserved power treasured up in the church" devote itself to paying taxes on a few million dollars' worth of church property. The community is growing despondent over fairs, lotteries, and pound-parties. The worldliness of the church affects the world quite as much as it does the church.

WRITING from Japan, a correspondent of the Evening Post confirms the report of the spread of Freethought in that land which we chronicled last week from the unwilling lips of a returned (would we could say reformed) missionary. The correspondent says: In the year 1881 there was organized in the city of Kioto the Kiukuwai Society, an Infidel association having for its object the opposing of Christianity. It was brought into being largely through the efforts of the Buddhist priests, who were offended at the planting of a Christian college for young men right in the sacred city of Japan. Recently I secured a copy of one of the publications issued by the society, and will make some selections from it for this letter, since it shows in what grooves the Japanese mind is running, and may be surprising to not a few. The pamphlet is published in Japanese, with the exception of the preface, which appears in English:

"The brutalizing and degrading tendencies of the Christian religion are not so apparent now as formerly, but they still exist, as the foreign newspapers attest in the accounts which they giv.

"One of the assassins who attempted the life of the emperor of Germany a few years ago was reported to be a religious monomaniac. Guiteau, the assassin of the president of the United States of America, was formerly a leader in a Christian church.

"The history of the Christian church in past ages is one narrativ of bloodshed from beginning to end. The Roman Catholics, being the most powerful, perhaps, hav committed the most of these atrocities, but the Protestants, as I shall be able to prove, were not backward in doing their share as far as they had the power.

"Although in the present day science has laid the Christian religion a captiv at its feet, all the elements which incite to evil still exist in it, but are held in strong subjection to modern thought.

"Here and there in times past noble men hav striven to shake off this horrible religion, and although their efforts were not successful in their generations on account of the great power of the Christian priesthood opposed to them, the seed which they planted has taken deep root, and now the end is near—in fact, the complete downfall of the Christian religion is seen by men of learning and discernment to be not far distant. The most learned men of modern times, historians, philosophers, etc., hav openly condemned it or quietly ignored it."

The writer then goes through the catalog of Hume, Gibbon, Darwin, Huxley, Spencer, Mill, father and son, etc., and ends as follows: "We certainly consider it a great misfortune that the people of England hav not the Buddhist religion, for if they were so fortunate as to hav it they certainly would not be so indifferent to it as they appear to be to the Christian religion."

Answers to Inquirers.

RICHARD CONWAY.—Thanks for the paper sent. We hav utilized it.

A. G. SCHULTE.—We will try and find the book you speak of. If unsuccessful, should much like to hav you copy it for THE TRUTH SEEKER. Your motiv is appreciated and help thankfully received.

JOSEPH LAKE.—We can furnish you "The Old Testament in the Jewish Church," by W. Robertson Smith, for 20 cents. The Post and Tribune is a violently partisan sheet, and you will do well to take its allegations with a grain or two of allowance.

F. G. LEITH.—We hav forgotten the name of the person who offered to giv ten acres of land in Florida to anyone who would settle on it, and hav not the time to look through four years' files to ascertain. Perhaps, if these lines fall under his eye, he will make the offer again.

PAT. F. GARRETT.—Thanks for club of subscribers. You hav taken one of the most effectual ways to spread Freethought. In every town where Liberal papers are taken our lecturers say they can get an audience, but a town destitute of such papers is poor territory for a white man.

JAMES HALE.—MS. at hand, but yet unread on account of its length. It was not necessary to dare us to print it. We giv all sides a hearing, trying to select the best from the large number of articles sent us, and threats hav no effect whatever. If we could we would print everything written for our columns.

WM. REYNOLDS.—Thanks for the magazines. It is difficult to see wherein Mormonism differs from Christianity. Mr. Cannon's Juvenile Instructor (what a misnomer!) defends the Old and New Testaments and lies about Paine in almost the same language the Christian press uses. As you say, the publication needs no comment; it is self-refuting to all intelligent people.

E. DICKERSON.—Christianity was introduced into Ireland in the fifth century. St. Patrick was its chief apostle. The story of his driving the snakes headlong from a cliff into the sea (the similarity to the New Testament hog story will noted) is without a shadow of foundation. In his search for the origin of the myth Moncure Conway found that no intelligent Catholics in Ireland believe the story, and even the priests, he says, discourage its repetition. The reason for the non-existence of snakes in Ireland is because of the cold, wet climate. Even in the Zoological Gardens at London snakes are only kept alive by blankets, and the outdoors of Ireland is altogether too much for the recipient of Jehovah's first curse.

Lectures and Meetings.

COL. INGERSOLL lectured in Chicago on the 19th. His subject was "Orthodoxy."

W. S. BELL'S address is 281 Mich. av., Chicago, Ill. Write to him for terms for lectures.

MR. W. F. PECK, who is conducting the Children's Lyceum for the Liberal Society of Ottumwa, Iowa., is also speaking each Sunday evening to crowded and enthusiastic audiences.

C. B. REYNOLDS would like some more lecturing engagements. He likes work and is happiest when making the orthodox unhappy. His permanent address is box 104 North Parma, Monroe Co., New York.

MRS. H. S. LAKE, who is speaking for the Liberal Society, of Flint, Mich., each Sunday of March, has been re-engaged for the month of April and may be addressed as above by Eastern societies desiring her services.

MEMBERS and patrons of the Institute of Heredity, and all friends of the movement, will please remember that the next Parlor Meeting of this winter's series will be held at the residence of Dr. E. B. Foote, No. 120 Lexington avenue, corner East Twenty-eighth street, on the last Thursday evening of March—the 27th—at eight o'clock.

Science.

The Use and Abuse of the Brain.

In a lecture before the Nineteenth Century Club recently, Dr. Wm. Hammond began by quoting the favorit saying of Sir William Hamilton, the Scotch metaphysician: "In this world there is nothing great but man; in man there is nothing great but mind." Dr. Hammond thought that this was not exactly right. It should read: "In man there is nothing great but brain." The brain makes the mind, and so it is the greater of the two. The lecturer then went on to describe the physical appearance of the brain, illustrating his remarks by means of a chart on which the white and gray matter were outlined. He referred to the white matter as of comparativly little importance contrasted with the real force stored up in the gray matter, and showed how, by means of convolutions, the latter was spread over a large surface. The doctor said he was not in the habit of idolizing anything, but if he should ever set up a god it would be a little bunch of this all-powerful gray matter.

Mind, he said, is the force developed by nervous energy. The force is evolved from the brain, and is not a simple force. Just as a ray of sunlight can be split up into its seven prismatic colors, so the mind force is a compound of four forces—the perceptions, the intellect, the emotions, and volition or the will. Speaking of the mind, the doctor wished it to be understood that he said nothing of the soul. That was something of which he knew nothing, but he did know something of the mind. Too little attention, he thought, was paid to the cultivation of the perceptions. It was only through these—through what the sense taught—that the mind was enabled to know anything. The old theory of innate ideas he held to be laughably absurd. Without perceptions one could not understand that 1 plus 1 made 2. Great stress was laid upon the importance of the proper cultivation of the perceptions in children. One of the best ways of teaching a child was to giv it a picture and ask it to observe carefully and to report what it saw. Great harm resulted from sending children to school at too early an age. The little ones should be only taught to observe, to gain ideas of things. No child should be sent to school before the age of ten years, and twelve is a better age. Kindergartens attempt to teach children to use their perceptions, but even these are not good. A child sent to school at ten or twelve will know more at fifteen than one sent at seven years. Adults use their perceptions too little, and should teach themselvs to observe.

One of the greatest safeguards against brain troubles is sleep. It is then that the brain makes good the waste incurred during the working hours. Even the heart rests one-third of the time—eight hours out of the twenty-four. One should sleep one-third of his life, work one-third, and spend the remaining third in recreation. Mathematicians are the hardest of intellectual workers, and they usually sleep long.

Dr. Hammond then spoke of the difference in the brains of the sexes. That there is a difference there is no doubt. though he would not venture to assert that the male brain was superior to the female. Before infancy this difference can be detected. With this difference in size and formation, the doctor thought it very improper to giv to both brains the same education. The girl's brain was of one kind, the boy's of another, and it was certainly not right to giv to different natures exactly the same training. As the bodies differ so do the brains, and so should the education and the mature life. The emotional nature of women may be the highest type of mental development, but it was not the nature of man, and the educational paths of the boy and the girl were not parallel.

The Sun: His Spots and Their Terrestrial Effects.

There is a periodicity about the sun-spots which is very peculiar. One hundred years ago observers had noticed that these spots were sometimes more numerous than at others, but no law upon the subject was evolved. In 1851, however, the Swiss astronomer, Wolff, stated that there was a rise and fall of sun spots, a maximum and a minimum, and that from one maximum to the next maximum, or from one minimum to the next, was 11 years and 11-100 of a year. The German astronomers showed that there was extreme irregularity in this period, which was sometimes shortened to seven years, and sometimes elongated to sixteen. But the grand average was as Wolff had stated, and the usual deflection from that was two years, making from maximum to maximum either 13 years 11-100, or 9 years 11-100. Now this periodicity was not analogous to planetary action, and could not, therefore, be caused by anv planet, as was the first supposition. Mercury and Venus were suspected of being connected with the matter because they were so near the sun, and Jupiter because of its immense size, and also because the period of its orbit was nearly coincident with the cycle of the spots. But this has never been made out. It is more probable that the cause is solar, and I hav conjectured that the forces in the sun accumulate and, as it were, boil over at recurring periods with the same irregular regularity as the spouting of a geyser. Is there any connection between the maximums of sun spots and terrestrial disturbances of any kind? Much surmise and also much serious investigation exist on the subject. It has been proved by our delicate instruments for measuring heat, that a sun-spot givs only one-half as much heat as another part of the sun's surface. This was shown by Professor Langley. But he also showed that the disturbed surface as a whole givs out rather more heat than less. I received last year a number of letters showing that the sun's maximum of spots then present was accompanied by cyclones, storms, tornadoes, etc., in our great West, and the writers were thoroughly convinced that some connection existed between the two facts. It was said that in 1870 there was also a maximum of sun spots, and an extraordinarily hot summer. But it was forgotten that observations to be conclusiv must cover the whole of the earth's surface, and not a part only. It so happened that in 1870 at our antipodes in New Zealand, there was at the time of our hot summer an intensely cold winter, something phenomenal for that region. But an unmistakable connection has been discovered between these maxims and aberrations of the magnetic needle. It is well established that the period of a maximum of spots is coincident with a period of greatest declination of the needle. It may be that the iron in the sun has something to do with this.

Ordinarily what we see of the sun is the photosphere. But outside of that and beyond it the sun has an envelope of gas and streamers 200,000 miles in extent, and sometimes a million miles, and even five or six million miles, are thrown out. This invisible part becomes visible at times of eclipse. Previous to 1868 a number of brilliant ruby-colored objects had been observed upon the edge of the eclipsed body of the sun. In 1868 the nature of these prominences was discovered. They were at every part of the photosphere, and there could be no doubt that there was a layer of them, which from the brilliancy of its coloring received the name of chromosphere. The spectrum showed that these were gaseous, and also that the gas was hydrogen. Jansen made the brilliant discovery that this chromosphere could be observed at any time, and that the astronomer need not wait for an eclipse to study it. Lockyer in England had found out the same thing.

I now come to the very interesting observations and hypothesis of Professor Hastings, now of Yale College, who accompanied the Caroline Island party for the purpose of examining the corona. He came to the conclusion that the gaseous envelope that givs the bright line in the spectrum was very narrow indeed, and its apparent enlargement was due to the diffraction of light. If the light were so diffracted the appearance of the halo would be vivid on the east side at the beginning of the eclipse and on the west side at the end. And that this is the case is absolutely certain. While I am not prepared to go so far as Hastings, his observations prove beyond much doubt that this atmosphere, or quasi-atmosphere, is not so great in extent as had been imagined, and can not be greater than from 25,000 to 50,000 miles.

But from the examinations of the chromosphere it is obvious that the prominences are projected into something beyond it, and this action has an extraordinary resemblance to the formation of clouds in our own atmosphere. They hav been seen at first low and not much beyond the chromosphere, and then in a few minutes they hav rushed out beyond it, so as to produce the appearance of a prairie on fire. Then they hav separated themselvs from their base, like clouds forming above a river in summer, and hav returned to it, like the same clouds falling in rain. There can be no question of the connection between the bright faculæ and the prominences. These prominences hav assumed shapes described as clouds, as diffuse, filamentary, stemmed, as horns, plumes, spikes, sheafs, and volutes, jets, vertical filaments, cyclones, eruptions, and flames.—Prof. C. A. Young.

The Sinking of the Earth's Crust.

The extreme sensitivness of the earth's crust to any changes in the distribution of weight upon its surface is, however, best exemplified by those local depositions and removals of matter which hav attracted more general attention at the present day. The chief of these is the transfer of matter by river action to large tracts, and its accumulation in such limited areas as plains, estuaries, and deltas. Borings of four to five hundred feet hav shown that these often consist of long successions of silts, which alternating layers of shells and of vegetable matter prove to hav been deposited at or near the sea-level, and the Wealden and eocene formations in the British area show that such accumulations may exceed one thousand feet in thickness. In the case of deltas, subsidence must keep pace almost foot by foot with the accumulation, and be confined to the area over which the sediment is being deposited, for any more rapid subsidence would check its growth and convert it into an estuary. This sinking is apparently of universal occurrence. A similar instance of the transfer of weight from larger areas and its precipitation on a very circumscribed area is seen in coral atolls and reefs. The explanation of their formation given by Darwin requires a gradual subsidence keeping pace with their growth, which takes place within twenty fathoms of the surface only. This theory, simple and admirable as it is, accounting satisfactorily for all the observed phenomena of coral growth, has been contested by Mr. Murray, who has shown that atolls might be merely incrustations of volcanic peaks. But his theory seems improbable by contrast, for it demands 290 volcanic peaks at the sea-level in the Pacific coral area alone, every foot of which has been completely concealed by coral growth, though few volcanic craters are known so near the sea-level outside this area. We seem thus to hav in coral growths another evidence of subsidence keeping pace with the increase of weight, sometimes, as soundings prove, to a depth of 1,000 feet or more. The replacement of a column of sea water 100 fathoms in depth by a column of limestone would increase the pressure per fathom from 619 1-2 tons to 1,487 tons, so that it is easy to realize how vast must be the increased pressure on such an area as that occupied by the great reef of Australia, 1,250 miles long and 10 to 90 miles broad. The sands, gravels, and clays, with marine shells and erratic boulders, prove that a great submergence took place during the glacial period, while Europe was under an ice-sheet 6,000 feet thick in Norway and diminishing to 1,500 in central Germany. The extent of the submergence has been perhaps understated at 600 feet in Scandinavia, and was at least 1,350 feet in Wales. A corresponding re-elevation accompanied the disappearance of the ice. It has often been supposed that the sinking of the west coast of Greenland is similarly due to its ice-cap.—Nature.

An Inexpensiv Filter.

Very many families desire some inexpensiv device for filtering rain and other water to be used for cooking and table use. A cheap and very efficient filter may be made by using a spirit or wine cask, placing it on end with the head removed, and having a faucet at the bottom to draw off the clear water. To fit it for the filter, take the removed top head of the cask, and with a small bit bore holes all over it, then place four clean bricks or blocks of wood on the bottom, and on these rest the perforated top. Now fill upon it about four inches of charcoal chopped into small bits the size of peas, and over this put a layer of sand six inches deep. Impure water poured into the cask on the top of the sand will become clear and sparkling after a little while, or as soon as all fine particles are worked out of the charcoal and sand. This filter will not need renewing oftener than once in two or three months.—Popular Science Monthly.

Use of Tobacco by Boys.

All high medical authorities agree that the use of tobacco is injurious to growing boys; and, this being true, no teacher can do his full duty who does not impress this fact upon the boys under his influence. The following from the Medical and Surgical Reporter is high authority, and will make good reading for the school in these days of extravagance and excess, when, aping the folly of those older than themselvs, so many hundreds of thousands of boys are becoming slaves to the destructiv habit:

"The use of tobacco by growing boys is so generally recognized as pernicious that it is extraordinary that more energetic measures are not urged by those having the care of youth to prevent the habit. Already it has been forbidden in the United States Naval Academy at Annapolis, in the United States Military Academy at West Point, in the Phillips Exeter Academy, and in various other enlightened educational institutions.

"This was not the result of prejudice or hobbyism. If any set of men are free from these vices of learning, it is the naval surgeons, and it was especially from these, and particularly from Dr. L. A. Gihon, U. S. Navy, that this attack on the weed began. The indictment laid against it charged: that it leads to impaired nutrition of the nerve centers; that it is a fertil cause of neuralgia, vertigo, and indigestion; that it irritates the mouth and throat, and thus destroys the purity of the voice; that by excitation of the optic nerve it produces amaurosis and other defects of the vision; that it causes a tremulous hand and an intermittent pulse; that one of its conspicuous effects is to develop irritability of the heart; that it retards the cell change on which the development of the adolescent depends.

"This is a formidable bill of particulars, and yet each of these charges is preferred by the best modern authority, and, what is more, each is substantiated by an abundance of clinical evidence. Testimony is also adduced from the class records of schools and colleges, which indicates very positivly that the effect of tobacco on the mental faculties is deteriorating. The best scholars are not tobacco users; and non-smokers take the highest rank in every grade."

What the Moon's Face Tells.

The moon's face, says Professor Proctor, tells of a remote youth—a time of fiery activity, when volcanic action, even more effectiv (though not probably more energetic) than any which has ever taken place on this globe, upheaved the moon's crust. But so soon as we consider carefully the features of the moon's surface we see that there must hav been three distinct eras of volcanian activity. Look at the multitudinous craters, for example, around the metropolitan crater of Tycho. They tell us of century after century of volcanic disturbance—but they tell us more. They mark a surface which varies in texture, and therefore in light-reflecting power in such a way as to show that the variations were produced long before the volcanic action began by which the craters were formed. For the variations of texture are such as to mark a series of streaks—some or them 2,000 or 3,000 miles in length, and many miles in breadth, extending radially from Tycho. Craters lie indifferently on these brighter streaks, and on the intervening darker spaces, and some craters can be seen which lie right across a bright streak with parts of their ring on the darker regions on both sides of the streak. This proves that the craters were formed long after the great streaks. When the streaked surface was formed, it must hav been tolerably smooth; for we see the streaks best under a full illumination, and there is no sign of any difference of elevation between them and the darker ground all around; they are neither long ridges nor long valleys, but mere surface markings. Yet must they hav been formed by mighty volcanian disturbance, such, indeed, as we may be certain went on at an early stage of the moon's history to which these radiating streaks must be referred. It seems clear that, as Nasmith has illustrated by experiment, they belong to the stage of the moon's history when her still hot and plastic crust parted with its heat more rapidly than the nucleus of the planet, and so contracting more quickly, was rent by the resistance of the internal matter, which, still hot and molten, flowed into the rents, and spreading, formed the long broad streaks of brighter surface.

Infidel Philosophy.

Gen. viii, 5: "In the tenth month, on the first day of the month, were the tops of the mountains seen." 9. "For the waters were upon the face of the whole earth." Vii, 19: "And all the high hills that were under the whole heavens were covered." 20. "Fifteen cubits upward did the waters prevail."

Here is a plain statement that the waters covered the face of the whole earth, and that a number of months passed by before the waters went down so that the tops of the mountains could be seen. Where did all this water come from? No more water could come down from the clouds than was taken up from the earth.

Gen. vii, 11: "The fountains of the great deep were broken up." What "great deep?" Tell me, ye squabblers on the walls of Zion, what is meant by the "great deep." Suppose all the waters of the ocean had been taken up and let down again, there would be no more water on the earth.

Did this water come from Venus or Mars, or from the sun or the stars? And where did this vast amount of water go to when the flood subsided?

Again, suppose by some hocus-pocus operation a sufficient quantity of water had been obtained to rise fifteen cubits above the highest mountains, what would hav been the consequence? The equilibrium between the centrifugal and the centripetal forces would be at once destroyed.

If the amount of matter which the earth contains should be augmented, the sun by its attractiv influence would take hold of it with increased power corresponding with the additional amount of matter. The centripetal force would then be more powerful than the centrifugal, and the earth would fall to the sun.

Again, the tops of the highest mountains are covered with perpetual snow and ice. Now, if the water rose to the hight spoken of, it must hav congealed, and the old ark would hav been stuck in the ice—a pretty fix for the boys, Shem, Ham, and Japheth, with not a pair of skates in the ark.

The flood was a great failure. It left God in just about the condition of Beecher, when he said that he had not done anything wrong, but at the same time promised that he would not do so any more.

God knew he had been guilty of a scurvy trick, although he did not confess as much; but we can easily imagin his hang-dog look when he said (Gen. viii, 21), "I will not curse the ground any more for man's sake, neither will I again smite any more every living thing as I hav done."

Now, when a god begins to choke and swallow, and sticks his thumb in his mouth like a boy who has been stealing melons, and promises that he won't do so any more, I think it is only fair to let up on him a little. Besides, it must be remembered that he was not an old, experienced God, who had been long in the business of world-making. Our world was the first one he ever tried his hand on, and a little crooked steering is not to be wondered at.

If he did make an egregious blunder in not killing the devil, and if he did miss it in not trotting out his savior instead of bringing the flood, so long as he promises to do better, I don't believe it to be quite right to be too rigidly exact with an inexperienced God. He might hav been a little unmindful of the welfare of those whom he had created, and let a few billions or trillions of human beings slip through his hands into hell, or he might hav been a little loose in his calculations about the salvation scheme; but then it is encouraging to know that he has promised to do better.

Gen. x, 5: "By these were the isles of the gentiles divided in their lands, every one after his tongue."

If words sustaining their proper relations in a sentence hav any meaning, the passage above proves that there was a diversity of tongues; yet in the first verse of the next chapter will be found the plain declaration that the whole earth was of one language and one speech.

Gen. xi, 5. "And the Lord came down to see the city and the tower which the children of men had builded."

Does this sound like talk from a God? Would not a man talk in precisely the same manner? Where is the "all-seeing eye" that can count every hair in our heads, and see every sparrow fall? Couldn't tell anything about the city; had to come down and see just as a man would. With you there is a difference between a great big hair or sparrow and a very small city. If the Lord is everywhere and fills the immensity of space, how could he "come down," or what was the use of his coming down? He could see as well from one point as another. Everything that man has ever done bears the marks of imperfection. God had to move about and go and see just as a man would, because he is a man-made God.

Gen. xviii, 21: "I will go down now and see whether they hav done altogether according to the cry of it which has come unto me, and if not I will know."

Splendid talk for a God! The more I read about him, the more I think I am like him, or rather the more I think he is like me, because man created God in his own image. 14: "Is there anything too hard for the Lord?" Of course there is, for he could not tell whether the reports from Sodom were true or not, and he had to go down and see about it, just as any short-sighted mortal would. Man never showed his weakness in such a marked degree as when he attempted to create and manage an infinit god.

There are many passages in Genesis which I could not recommend to the perusal of any ladies except Sunday-school teachers.

It is a strange fact that woman has been ground down and most degraded by Bible teaching, and yet she is the most engaged in teaching it, especially to the young. In all this broad land few mothers can be found who would call the attention of their young daughters to this holy filth. Although we are commanded to "search the scriptures," yet there is much that every prudent mother would fain cover up and hide from her child. And why is this so? Because calling obscenity holy does not make it any the less disgusting.

Now, my lady friends, you who are engaged as Sabbath-school teachers, dare you say to the young misses in your classes that this scum of filth is the holy word of God? If it is too vulgar and nasty for your daughters, is it fit for anybody else? Did you ever stop to consider that every time you speak of the Bible as the word of God, you indorse this filth and slime?

Go by yourselvs, lady teachers, where nobody can see you blush, and read the passages; then ask yourselvs if such disgusting stuff is the outcome of "the holy spirit." Settle this matter fairly with yourselvs, and find out whether God has made it incumbent upon you to smear the minds of the young with disgusting accounts of acts which even the brutes perform in secret.

Gen. xxii, 10, 11, 12: "And Abraham stretched forth his hand and took the knife to slay his son. And the angel of the Lord called unto him from heaven and said, Abraham, Abraham: and he said, Here am I. And he said, Lay not thine hand upon the lad, neither do thou harm unto him, for now I know that thou fearest God, seeing that thou hast not withheld thy son, thine only son, from me."

Now, isn't this the silliest thing a God ever did. Must he absolutely try an experiment on old Abraham before he could tell what the outcome would be? I am not much of a God, but I can do as well as that. I can tell whether a friend will sacrifice anything for me after I try him. "For now I know that thou fearest God." Yes, after he had tried the experiment, not before. 'Cute God that!

In all the sacred writings, so-called, which men hav ever written, the gods hav proved a great fizzle, because it is utterly impossible for short-sighted, finite man to create a God, and clothe him with infinit knowledge and power, and then manage him him so as to make him a success.

The language which they put into his mouth will not become him—will not prove characteristic. The things which they make him do will be beneath the dignity of a god. When men fully come to realize the great blunders they hav made with their gods, they will learn the important fact that it is better to > "Let gods attend on what the gods must know, > Man's chiefest care relates to things below."

Think of an omnipresent God going round to see what is going on, as in the case of the tower of Babel, and Sodom, and Gomorra; of an unchangeable God repenting; of a God of infinit wisdom trying experiments as with Abraham; of a God clothed with almighty power backing down on account of a few "chariots of iron." No, no, the god business can never be made a success. When men let gods alone, and turn all their attention to the bettering of the condition of the race, there will be far less suffering, and the gods will fare no worse.

Gen. xxv, 23, 24, 25, 26. These verses contain a little more Sunday-school literature. If lady teachers consider these lessons profitable, they will be particular to call their classes to notice them. Don't forget to make it plain that these verses are the word of God. Then ask yourselvs if the low slang and indecent stories indulged in, in the dive-holes and dug-outs way down under ground, where the sun is ashamed to shine, where Paddy O'Ryan and Barney O'Flaherty get their vile whisky, are not the word of God too.

Verse 27: "And the boys grew." How astonishing! How important to know that boys grew three thousand years ago just as they do now! How could we hav possibly found out that important fact if it had not been for the Bible? "Holy Bible, book divine!"

Gen. xxx, 1–25. Here will be found another holy bouquet for young girls in a Sabbath-school. And I would like to inquire of honest wives of the present day how they relish the transaction between Rachel and her handmaid Bilhah, and her husband Jacob. It is evident that Rachel and Leah, and the wives of those days, were far more accommodating than the wives of the present time.

My Christian lady friends, how do you like the idea of a holy man like Jacob having two legitimate wives, and, in addition, to hav the freedom of the handmaids tendered to him? How do you like the idea of God making a pet of such a disgusting old libertin?

In view of these transactions, I want you to think of God's promis to this special old moonshiner (Gen. xxxviii, 15): "Behold I am with thee and will keep thee in all places whither thou goest."

Is it any wonder the Mormons believe that they are under the special protection of heaven? Who shall say that God has not shoved Brigham Young right into the heavenly king-row?

David and Solomon, and most of the Bible worthies, kept a regular harem, and were approved of God. And how, my Christian lady friends, do you know that God is not smiling on Mormonism to-day?

If the Christians ever succeed in getting God into the Constitution, and making the Bible the foundation of law, to be consistent, they must make Mormonism the pet institution of the country.

Couldn't God find something of more importance to write about than the manner of producing ring-streaked, speckled, and grizzly cattle? O lady teachers, from your youth up, you hav been imposed upon by this holy balderdash. Will you, in turn, impose upon others that which "sickens all it touches?"

Many send their children to Sabbath-school because they believe there is associated with it a moral influence. O my countrymen, is it possible that such teaching can refine or elevate the minds of the young, or in any way tend to improve their morals? The very relation of things, from first to last, must be changed before filth and falsehood can benefit any one. I may lack charity, but I really believe that those who teach the young that the apple and snake story, and the silly story of the flood, and that of beastly old Lot and his daughters, are a part of the word of God, do so from some motiv besides that of benefiting the race.

The time has come when the well wishers of the race must point to a new star. The curses, wars, robberies, filth, and abominations of the Bible will never do as a standard of morality. But the Christian will reply that some of the grandest moral lessons ever taught are to be found in the Bible. And it must be admitted, at the same time, that it contains some of the most loathsome and sickening slush and obscenity anywhere to be found.

Would the Christian consent to hav his daughters associate with the lowest and most abandoned wretches, one-half of the time, on the ground that there is decent company in the community? Wipe out the filth and dirt, the obscenity and absurdity of the Bible, and we will indorse all that is good, true, pure, noble, and elevating as heartily as the Christian.

A Little Progress in Iowa.

On the 8th inst. the Iowa Senate passed a bill

"Limiting the exemption of church property from taxation to buildings used for public worship, with the grounds on which located, and providing that residence property owned by church, school, or college institutions, and used by clergymen, teachers, and professors, be taxed for the assessed value over $3,000."

This the Dubuque Telegraph says is "a concession to the Freethinkers of the state, who for a long time hav been persistently demanding the taxation of church and private school property."

The bill has now gone to the House, where it will meet with very spirited opposition, and every Freethinker in Iowa should without delay urge his representativ to support and pass it. It is not all that Freethought asks for; it is not even and exact justice, but it is a step in the right direction, and when the people of Iowa shall hav witnessed its good effects they will be the more ready to impose impartial taxation upon all property.

The passage of this bill will raise a large sum for the various town and county treasuries of Iowa, and enable the rate on farm and manufacturing properties to be lowered. According to the Telegraph no less than nine Catholic institutions in Dubuque alone will be obliged to walk up to the tax-collector's office and settle. These include three academies conducted by the "Sisters of Charity," a college run by clergymen, an academy supervised by nuns, a parochial school, an orphan asylum, and other similar institutions. Everyone knows just what these "academies" and "asylums" are, and it will be perceived that the measure hits just the ones that need hitting.

The reasoning of the Telegraph in opposition to this bill is well calculated to bring a smile to the faces of intelligent people. It presumes that the taxing of these schools would close them, thus entailing upon the community the expense of erecting public school buildings and hiring teachers. Next, it says, "Few Catholics are opposed to the public school system. Indeed, the great majority of them are warm advocates of that system." This is rich. In the first place, the Catholics maintain parochial schools because of their church's fierce and unalterable opposition to our "godless public schools." This hostility has been authoritativly voiced by ecclesiastical councils, by encyclicals from the pope, by pastoral letters, and by denunciation from the pulpits of the priests. A writer who deliberately says that Catholics are not opposed to our system of education is ill-informed or an unscrupulous falsifier. It is not at all likely that these sectarian schools will be closed so long as the laws of our land permit of their maintenance, which we trust will ever be, for a Catholic has the same right to revere the Virgin Mary as the Protestant has to invoke the blessings of her son, or the Freethinker to denounce them both as superstitious idols.

But the question is one in which dollars and cents hav no business to be considered. It is purely a matter of principle, and a vital and fundamental one. It affects the stability and permanence of our institutions, for in all history we read of no government that has lasted which gave special privileges to religious sects, and the weakest governments existing today are those by which the church is recognized as a political factor, and knelt to as of supernatural origin, deriving its power from forces beyond the people. Russia and Spain may be cited in proof.

But if the schools were closed in consequence of being required to pay taxes, it would be a public blessing. Under our constitution the church has no right to expect favors, and if on those she has illegally wrung from the people she has built more schools than she can support, the collapse is her own fault. A smuggler might as well expect relief from the government because, detected and forced to pay duty, his business fails for want of means to go on in a rightful and legal manner. Considering Catholic schools apart from Protestant prejudices, and in the light of correct principles of government, they are not only absolutely without merit, but are dangerous in their tendency. The Mormon hierarchy is a harmless fire-cracker compared to the immense weapon the church has in her protectories, asylums, and parochial schools, which teach the subordination of earthly governments to the divine power of the pope at Rome. The closing of every sectarian school, if it should be brought about by the withdrawal of state patronage, would be an inestimable blessing to the republic.

The profession of priest or minister is as much a business as the profession of the law or of medicin, and it is immeasurably better paid than the various trades. Why then should the pastor and the priest be allowed a house free of taxation, as in Iowa, or hav fifteen hundred dollars' worth of personal property exempted, as in this state? The good they do, say you Christians? Then exempt the houses of such men as Peter Cooper, Felix Adler, Samuel Hill, George Peabody, and every other benevolent individual. But before going so far as this, the good the preachers accomplish must be shown. Do they prevent crime, reduce pauperism, or promote peace in the community? Everyone knows they do not; the assertion that they do is preposterous. The only true reason that can be advanced to defend such practice is that it saves money for the parishes; and the perpetuation of the custom must be at the expense of the minority, and by an overriding of the rights of the few by the many.

The power of the church has always been used to uphold despotism. The pope aids the czar to keep his people in slavery; the Vatican has helped Bismarck tyrannize over the Germans; and it is Catholicism that unfits Ireland for self-government. Her "statesmen" are puppets worked by wires from Rome, and when did Rome ever free a people?

Religious schools can hav no possible claim to exemption from public burdens except such claim as a thief may hav to his plunder. They are built and maintained to benefit sectarian societies, and the people of Iowa will take a long step toward establishing a government of right principles when they shall tax every institution of the kind in the state.

Vicious Exaggeration.

Going the rounds of the religious press is this paragraph, with variations:

"There are said to hav been 500,000 Christians in the world at the end of the first century, 10,000,000 in the time of Constantine, 30,000,000 in the eighth century, 100,000,000 at the time of the Reformation, and 450,000,000 in 1883."

The variations are mostly upon the last number. It is given at 400 million, at 450 million, and some put it at 480 million. The religious editors hav written innumerable editorials based upon these estimates; exhorters hav rolled them out with sonorousness; a few secular paper hav been awed by the size of the numerals; and some writers of education hav been misled into quoting them as statistics. In his recent lecture at St. Joseph, Talmage repeated the statement, and enlarged upon it as a miraculous growth and a direct and incontrovertible proof of divine favor. He read it backwards, forwards, sideways, and cornerways, dilating upon it each way, drew from it the most astonishing inferences, and defied the world to gainsay it.

But, for all that, the estimate is a falsehood. It is not ascertainable with any degree of certainty just how many Christians there were at any given time since the first century, nor just how many there are at present. The United States is put down as containing over fifty millions, when there are in both Protestant and Catholic churches barely seventeen million communicants, and these figures include infants, backsliders, "moved aways," and other unreliable quantities. But if the Christian statisticians are allowed to rake the globe, the greatest number of adherents they can find is something over one hundred million. The ridiculousness of the four-hundred-million claim was admitted but a short time ago by one of the fairest religious papers published—the Independent. A writer in its columns asserted that four hundred million Christians could be counted. He was disputed, and, as became a Christian, retreated from the position on the vicarious plan. He asserted that the printer had used a 4 where he wrote a 1, and he wanted it distinctly understood that hereafter neither he nor the Independent would be responsible for any estimate over one hundred million.

If every person in the world were a Christian, or if there were not a Christian in the world, it would make no difference as to the truth or falsity of the system. Talmage is possessed of brains enough to see this, and his elongated argument can only be the result of his desire to mislead his hearers. He and all the other jumping-jacks of orthodoxy should be crowded into their boxes and the covers hooked down. Christianity cannot be saved by a lie.

The Editor and the Parson.

The difficulties in the path of Parson John P. Newman appear to thicken. The plot coagulates. The party with letters has turned up. He is the Rev. J. M. Buckley, editor of the Christian Advocate, and one of the breeziest and most refreshing productions of creativ sagacity. The Rev. Mr. Newman will be remembered as having been chaplain of the United States Senate in 1869–74. He appeared, or rather disappeared, later as inspector of American consulates in Europe and Asia. The field of literature is also not unknown to him, for he wrote a work entitled, "From Dan to Beersheba." He then accumulated further honors as the spiritual adviser of Gen. Grant. All this was achieved under the banner of Methodism. In 1881 Parson Newman thumped for the last time the pulpit of the Central church in this city, after having assaulted it every Sunday for three years. The disciplin of the Methodist church calls time on pulpit and pastor at the end of three years. If within that period neither of the combatants is knocked out the match is decided a draw. But the people of the Central church were loth to part with their preacher. He had become popular with them. They liked the way he had of cutting a letter G in air with one hand and a figure 8 with the other. His method also of kicking his leg straight out and presenting the sole of his luxuriant foot to his congregation had grown into the affections of his hearers. It was attempted to conceive of a plan that would permit of his staying a fourth year, but it is testified to by high Methodist authority that the scheme fell through at both ends. A scheme that falls through at both ends is supposed to be impracticable. It was then endeavored to remove pastors "worthily closing their second year" in order to insert Mr. Newman in their place. This scheme also, it is believed, fell through either at one or both ends, or at a mean distance from both, as it is on record that it did not succeed. With regard to this Dr. Buckley intimates rather threateningly that he has "remarkable facts" in his possession.

In the next chapter of events the Rev. Mr. Hepworth wore himself out under hard work and a big debt at the Madison Avenue church. The Rev. Mr. Davis picked up his hand and eventually passed from Methodism to Congregationalism. What change a minister necessarily goes through in this passage is unknown except to those who hav experienced it. A gratifying difference in salary and perquisits is sometimes instanced as a cause of Congregationalism appearing in a more favorable light than the doctrins of Wesley. The Rev. Mr. Davis in retiring suggested the Rev. Mr. Newman to the committee to fill his place. The committee negotiated.

It is the letters that passed between different parties to the negotiation in this matter that Dr. Buckley now brings forward, alleging that when the Rev. Mr. Newman got the call in his hands he "responded at variance with what he had said." Here it is perhaps appropriate to suggest that when a man is charged with having responded at variance with what he has said, dishonesty is implied. Nevertheless, the Rev. Mr. Newman was installed as preacher in the Madison Avenue church, from the pulpit of which he has abused Freethinkers in a way that should justify the Rev. Mr. Buckley in suppressing the "remarkable facts" in his possession, overlooking the Rev. Mr. Newman's dishonesty, and withdrawing the charge. This the Rev. Mr. Buckley had probably done up to the time of the present "trouble" in the Madison Avenue church. Here he made the mistake of presenting the compromising letters to the enemies of the Rev. Mr. Newman. A church council was called, which sat upon the case of the pastor, many belligerent members of which evinced a decided inclination to sit upon the pastor's person as well. Before the council the Rev. Mr. Newman appeared and said, addressing the chairman:

"Sir, whatever respect I may entertain for Wesley R. Davis, I hav long since ceased to honor, either for his honorableness or for the manner he introduced that letter into this council—I hav long ceased to respect the Methodist meddler who brought that letter here."

The term "Methodist meddler" applied to the Rev. Mr. Buckley, editor of the Christian Advocate, there present. The indiscreet Dr. Newman could hardly hav realized what he was bringing upon himself when he uttered those words. When the Rev. Mr. Buckley got back to the office of the Advocate he grasped his pen with both hands, and wrote to the council these words:

"To the Rev. H. M. Dexter, M.D., Moderator of the Council, Sir: This morning the council received in silence an attack upon me. I respectfully submit to the council whether I am not entitled to its protection.

"Yours in Christian regard, J. M. BUCKLEY."

He then prepared for the next issue of his paper an article in six chapters, entitled, "The Recent Relations of Dr. John P. Newman to Methodism and to Congregationalism." In this categorical statement he sets forth that the subject of his remarks is a schemer, a dishonest man, aiming at the death of Congregationalism, and one who would be regarded in a court of law as not responsible. He also makes dire hints about a postal card, the publication of which would be damaging in the extreme to the Rev. Mr. Newman. He has, furthermore, other documents with which, if he was only inclined to meddle, which he is not, he could "ignite a bombshell." Dr. Newman's Congregationalism is, as he expected, like the iron and the clay in Nebuchadnezzar's image. All these facts Dr. Buckley brings out, not, of course, in the spirit of unchristian enmity, but because they are necessary, in his opinion, to the formation of a correct judgment, and because to do otherwise "would be an act of faithlessness to the trust reposed in the Editor of an official organ by the highest authority of the Methodist Episcopal church."

In this melancholy condition the affair now stands. The council, after a prayer by the Rev. Mr. Dexter for "wisdom, guidance, unity, and a proper spirit," and after several scrapping matches, in which Deacon Hopkins called Deacon Corley a "tramp and an idiot," and other light oratory was dispensed, reached a conclusion. This conclusion is that "Dr. Newman is still in full connection with the Methodist Episcopal church and amenable to its disciplin as a located preacher;" and further, "Dr. Newman cannot be regarded as Congregationally pastor of the Madison Avenue Congregational church." The peculiarity of the Rev. Mr. Newman's position must be painfully apparent to himself. The Congregationalists refuse to recognize him as one of them, and he has trodden upon the coattails of the "Editor of an official organ" of the Methodist church. This Editor has control of a sixteen-page paper and a stenographer. Those who know what kind of a man Mr. Buckley is, are convinced that the stenographer shall make pothooks night and day, and every page of the Advocate shall be filled with italics, rather than that the imputation that he is a Methodist meddler should go without a fitting rebuke.

That Preachment.

The Sermon on the Mount has been long venerated as the concentrated essence of wisdom, beauty, and charity, and has been regarded as Christ's plainest directions for getting to heaven. It will, therefore, pain many Christians to hear that Mr. Beecher has said these things of it:

"The literal following of the Sermon on the Mount would destroy order, morality, law, and human nature itself."

"If you literally accept the Sermon on the Mount you hav got to giv to every man who asks, and lend to every man who wants to borrow. I would like to see Wall street act on this precept for about an hour."

"Ultimately the ideal man will come to a state in which animal force won't be necessary, I believe; but in the administration of human life, and in all the economies of society, is this the meaning of the Sermon on the Mount, that goodness must lie down while badness walks over it?"

"The people who believe in a literal interpretation of the Bible hav no right to hav one single cent ahead. They hav no right to accumulate little properties that can be used to meet the exigencies of coming days. Yet universal poverty would be the result, and universal poverty is animalism."

"The law of development is the law of industry and of property accumulation. There is morality in this; there is government in it; there is happiness in it, and everything else that builds up."

"Take the flowers of the field. It is true that they don't weave or spin, and yet God clothes them with beauty. Very good. A flower has to develop. There isn't a flower in all the wilderness, nor in all the gardens, that does not work for a living."

"I suppose that more than one-half of the suffering of humanity is suffering on account of things that never happen."

The similarity of these sentiments with those many times enunciated by THE TRUTH SEEKER is very plainly apparent. Mr. Beecher is to be congratulated on the rapidity with which he is leading his congregation out of the arid desert of mythological nonsense. He himself has seen the promised land for many years.

The Vincents Victorious.

By the last number of the American Nonconformist we see that the Vincent family hav conquered the professors of Tabor College and the syndicate of deacons, and regained their type and presses. Hereafter the Nonconformist will be issued regularly, and will not cease to expose the wickedness of Christian professors and to show the fallacy of Christian theology.

This brave coming out of the woods is owing to the help of friends, the justness of Mr. Vincent's cause, and the splendid devotion of his wife.

Send them five hundred new subscriptions as a reward for the good fight they fought. It is richly deserved.

Books.

Owing to the pressure of valuable reading matter upon our columns, we hav not room to advertise from week to week in THE TRUTH SEEKER a tenth part of the desirable books which we hav on sale. We advise those wishing a list of these books, with prices, to send to this office for our Catalog, which will be mailed free of charge. Let our readers also remember that we can furnish any book that is in the market, whether in our Catalog or not.

Converting a School-house into a Church.

A curious state of things was revealed in the trial of a suit at Watertown, N. Y., the other day. The suit was in relation to a school-house at Tremaines Corners in the town of Rodman, which, for the past sixty years, has been used as a meeting-place for religious denominations, latterly at the approval of the defendant, who is sole trustee of district No. 12. in which the house is situated. About a year ago Recorder Purcell granted an injunction against Parsons, the defendant, restraining him from letting the school-house for religious purposes. Shortly after this, Judge Churchill, at Syracuse, removed the injunction, and the suit was again brought to secure another injunction.

T. H. Breen appeared as counsel for the plaintiffs and John Lansing and Maxon & Ramsdell took seats as attorneys for the defendant.

Mr. Breen, in his opening, spoke of the meetings in the school-house, which, he said, were injurious to the property. The desks were broken, the fuel of the district was burnt, the floor was covered with spittle, and the ceiling was ornamented with tobacco cuds, as a result of the religious fervor which pervaded the occasions. Many of the taxpayers of the town had requested the defendant to prevent the holding of the meetings, which he had refused to do.

"Well," said Mr. Breen, "the meetings were continued, and it became necessary to enlarge that school-house, although there were but twelve or fifteen scholars in that district, and we allege that they remodeled and rebuilt it into a church—more for a church than for the accommodation of the school. During the time in which the repairs were being made, the trustees of the district went about among the inhabitants and notified those who had contributed as members of the society or donated money towards the repairs, to meet at the school-house for the purpose of determining how they wanted the money that they had donated expended, and it was there decided that it was to be expended in rearching the ceiling, making it, as we claim, a church instead of a school-house.

"There were other taxpayers who went to that meeting, and they were informed by the defendant in this case that they were not wanted there—only such parties as had donated money were wanted and desired at that meeting, and it was expressly understood at the meeting, in the presence of these plaintiffs and others, that these repairs were to be for a church and that the money was to be donated and expended for that purpose."

Mr. Breen said that the state superintendent had been applied to, and he had replied that if the majority of the taxpayers wished to hold meetings in that school-house, they should be allowed to do so.

Mr. Lansing moved that the case be dismissed on the ground that there were not facts enough in the case to constitute a suit, and that the plaintiffs, as taxpayers and residents in the district, had no more ground for complaint than any other resident or taxpayer, and such being the fact no action can be maintained. The plaintiffs, he argued, not being peculiarly or particularly interested, the action belongs to the people to decide.

This motion was argued at some length, and much law was expounded by the learned counsel pro and con.

Judge Vann then granted the motion to dismiss, saying that the plaintiff had no capacity to sue, as he was not injured any more than the other taxpayers in the district. He had no right to personal damages or any peculiar or special right to claim injuries. "But if it came to the merits of the case," said Judge Vann, "I should be very reluctant to award an injunction. In the school districts in this state, time out of mind, the school-house has been the place where the people of the district assembled for meetings for any lawful purpose, and so long as the legislature has permitted it, I think any court of equity would be reluctant to restrain the parties in anything of the kind. Of course the defendant in this case, in common with all trustees, has no right to allow waste to be committed or to allow his privilege to be abused, or the fuel of the district to be burnt or destroyed, or the walls, or floors, or any part of the school-house, to be defaced. If he does, as he is custodian or guardian of the property, an indictment would lie against him. I know of no other remedy. This case must be dismissed with costs. Experiments of this kind ought not to be encouraged."

M. E. Rose, of East Rodman, who sends us the above account, makes also some reflections upon the decision. He says: "When judges depart from the constitution and law in making their decisions (which is a marked characteristic of Republican judges), either from interest or sympathy, justice fails and anarchy reigns. I honor the judge who, understanding the law, performs his duty regardless of selfish desires or personal sympathies. But a decision now means only the state of feeling or personal interest of the judge making it. Law seems to be breaking down. Individual rights are disregarded, and really church and state are becoming gradually united, certainly and surely—practically if not legally (according to Judge Vann's ideas).

"And I charge the existing state of things to the rule of the dominant party. It was born of sympathy for the oppressed, and appealed to the sympathies rather than to reason of the masses; and its rule has been one of sympathy (turned to selfishness), instead of by organic law. Bennett's persecution was of that nature, as also many others. I believe that the constitution and laws, if wrong, should be changed by the evolution of the masses, or education, through their proper, defined courses. Every official is sworn to observe the constitution and laws, and to carry out their provisions, and if my observation is worth anything, Republican officials hav a way of their own that makes it extremely dangerous for opponents to come before them for justice, and through Christian shrewdness the party has become the tool of the church, and consequently of other monopolies, and any Republican official who attempts to do his official duty regardless of party effects, signs his political death-warrant, if not his physical one also.

"While Liberals are watching the church to keep her from changing the organic laws of the country, the church is accomplishing her aims by ignoring the constitutional laws. The country will take a long step backward in the next twenty-five years if the order of things is not materially altered."

CLOSELY following the exposure and suicide of Shapira, who claimed to hav discovered the original manuscript of the book of Deuteronomy, there comes to this country from Constantinople a copy in Greek of another batch of manuscript asserted to bear the date of about 1056, and referable to the middle of the second century. This manuscript was "discovered" by one Philotheos Bryennios, metropolitan of Nicomedia, and announced to the world in 1875. It contains what purport to be epistles of Clement, Barnabas, and Ignatius, the synopsis of John Chrysostom, and the teaching of the apostles. A list of the books of the Old Testament is also included, the books being placed in an order altogether different from that in which they are given in the Bible. The Independent swallows this manuscript whole as genuin, and hails its advent as calculated to "smite with crushing power the sectarian prejudices of the several churches of Christendom." The manipulators of this manuscript hav apparently played their cards with consummate skill. It is made to emanate from Constantinople, perhaps the present center of Greek learning. Its publication was delayed until a breastwork of alleged references to its existence in early Christian writings could be thrown up, and until the most probable objections to its authenticity could be provided against. The whole business, however, has too close a resemblance to the finding of the book of the law by Hilkiah, in the reign of Josiah, and the modern imposture of Shapira, to be accepted off-hand as altogether above doubt. The idea that a manuscript could exist unmentioned from the year 150, or even 1056, to 1875 has in itself difficulties which are not to be easily overcome.

Letters from Friends.

SAN FRANCISCO, March 9, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: The excellent feature of THE TRUTH SEEKER, edited by Miss Susan H. Wixon, givs great pleasure to the young folks. It is just what was needed to make your journal a complete family newspaper. Miss Wixon has endeared herself to all children who hav read here pure and splendid work, "Apples of Gold," and through THE TRUTH SEEKER she is rapidly adding to her happy family. Parents of rationalistic faith rejoice that their children are under such noble tuition.

AGNOSTIC.

HOPKINTON, R. I., March 5, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I notice that you threaten to leave us without a paper unless we pay up. I think you are entirely right about that. I understand perfectly that you need the money to pay your own bills. I hav not time to explain the why's and wherefore's of this long neglect to pay up. Suffice it to say that we don't propose to get along without THE TRUTH SEEKER just yet. The children are very much interested, and in a great hurry to learn the fate of Cupples's baby, so please find inclosed $5.50 for 1883-4. P. KENYON.

GRAND RAPIDS, MICH., March 15, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Please send me THE TRUTH SEEKER ALMANAC for 1884, for which find money inclosed. I am, as you are aware, a regular subscriber to your paper. Now, will you be kind enough through your columns to ask the good preachers to explain this problem: that if Jesus Christ had drowned the devil inside of the two thousand innocent hogs, would it hav been necessary to hav Christ hung or to hav kept ever since a standing army of priests, with barracks free of taxation, and which Freethinkers are obliged to help protect with their police and fire department? ADRIAN DE YOUNG.

COHOES, March 10, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I am behind with THE TRUTH SEEKER. Please excuse me; you deserve better treatment. I heard from you by our friend Bennett when I was visiting him in Albany. I hav still a letter that he wrote to me when he was about getting out; I keep it as a relic. I went to see him out, and by the fault of my driver I was about five minutes too late, and I do not like that driver since. I hope to go and see you some day and hav a talk with you and make your acquaintance. We had a lecture in Troy yesterday by George Chainey. He is pretty good. He comes there every month.

Here inclosed please find $5 toward my dues to THE TRUTH SEEKER. Your brother in the faith, PETER GRANDJEAN.

HUNTSVILLE, ALA., March 15, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: In you edition of the 8th inst., Rev. Newman, who has Grant's soul at heart, says erroneously, that it takes $12,000,000 to feed the "preachers in the United States." The fact is this: It takes $5,000,000 a week to feed the 75,000 preachers, or $260,000,000 a year, which makes on an average $3,466 a year to every preacher in the United States; $66 a week. Rev. Taylor, N. Y. Tabernacle, has $16,000; some twenty preachers in Brooklyn, N. Y., hav $10,000 each; while others, as in Huntsville, Ala., eke out an existence on from $600 all along up to $3,000. The average is $1,000. The annual liquor bill is $50,000,000, and not $800,000,000, as the holy man puts it. Respectfully, HENRI PALING.

OREGON, Mo., March 10, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: A few more articles on vivisection such as that published in your issue of the 8th inst. would ruin the Universalist church. After reading of the hellish crimes of that Italian, Mantegazza, any person of ordinary sensibility will conclude that if there is no hell one ought to be created for such a soul. The very earth ought to yawn and swallow him up. However, if it damages Universalism it equally injures Unitarianism. As much as such awful cruelty calls for a hell, it annihilates God. No being capable of interfering could refrain. Doubtless the monster of our race was pious; the probabilities are all that way. I hav sometimes tried to believe that there may be some influence in religion to restrain some men from evil, but the following, from the Western Christian Advocate, tends to destroy that belief. That pious sheet, through Bishop Pierce, denounces the higher education of negroes as a positiv calamity, "as it would only increase the friction between the races, produce endless strife, elevate negro aspirations above the station he was created to fill." For cruelty, malignancy, and narrow mind the author of such sentiments can take the palm. One who cannot see that the ballot, once given, necessarily carries all else, may well believe that the God of the universe lends him his special attention when he howls at him a Methodist prayer. C. I.

BINBROOK, ONT., March 8, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find 25 cents for THE TRUTH SEEKER ALMANAC, also find clippings from the Hamilton Spectator for the author of "Crimes of Preachers." This book should be circulated through this part of the country, as a great many of the people here are so superstitious that they are afraid of committing some terrible sin to even doubt what their preachers or the bad old book tells them. There has been a Methodist protracted meeting going on here lately. The preacher has been making some speeches which would bring to anyone's mind the first part of Graves's "Biography of Satan." Well, between the preacher, the devil, and Jesus Christ they hav succeeded in coaxing, scaring, or dragging about a dozen poor, soft young girls up to the penitent bench. I am sure there must be rejoicing in heaven over such a bonanza. There are about one dozen Freethinkers here. The Christians seem to dread discussion, well knowing the result. I like THE TRUTH SEEKER very much. I would not be without it, and will try to get you some subscribers. J. LOVELL.

ITHACA, N. Y., March 17, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: You seem to be an interpreter of conundrums. Can you tell me the difference between Mother Church and the daughter Freethought? For mere inquiry, I will say, does not the mother depend upon her animal senses for knowledge by a theory wrought out through priests, her leaders; and does not her daughter (Materialists and Spiritualists) depend wholly upon her animal senses for knowledge through ex-priests and wise men of the East; and what is the difference? I can see none; except the daughter believes she has, through evolution and scientific knowledge, attained to a sixth sense (as a mere matter of belief, without any knowledge of facts), but this extra sense, through a mechanical invention, givs her power to control the other five senses, and giv them complete liberty of thought. And the first and only thought she seems to entertain is to drive her mother church out of the universe of nature. Thus I hav to confess I can see no difference, except the daughter professes scientific knowledge, the liberty of equality and humanity, but carries out neither; but is equally sectarian. Like thus begets like by heredity in the animal kingdom. ZENAS KENT.

WAYLAND, MICH., March 8, 284.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find 25 cents, for which please send me the FREETHINKER'S ALMANAC.

The revivalists are working hard to save souls in Dorr and neighborhood. Dorr is a little village near here. The people come for miles most every second evening. I went there one evening to see what they were doing. The most that I heard was "Come to Jesus;" "Giv your heart to Jesus;" "Repent, serve God;" "Serve the glorious gospel." Lazarus was so many days dead, and Jesus called him to life again, healthy and sound. O glorious gospel! Amen, Amen. Almost everyone around here joined the church, except myself and a few whom I lent THE TRUTH SEEKER and my books to. Many joined whom I always thought had some brains and common sense. It is generally the case, women go first and the men hav to follow, or there is trouble in the house. We few Liberals in this county cannot gain any ground except we work on the same principle as the revivalists. First, we need some female Liberal lecturers to lecture in every schoolhouse or hall where we can get admission. Call on the females to come, and draw a parallel between the Bible and common sense in plain English. A good many men would mind the baby and do some other work if their wives would go and hear the lecture. We need lecturers to lecture to mixed audiences, whoever will come, and giv them milk first, until their stomachs get stronger. I believe, to get at the root of superstition, we must commence with the females, laborers, and farmers, and if we could make headway in that direction heaven would soon come on earth, and hell would go where it belongs.

JOSEPH WENZEL.

ELMIRA, KAN.

MR. EDITOR: I am glad to be able to report that the prohibitionists in Mitchell county, Kansas, are seeing to it that men who hav been selling intoxicating liquors with impunity, and in violation of the law, for others to get drunk on, are being prosecuted and fined, and we expect to make prohibition a success in Kansas. We read a great deal about liquor reform in Liberal periodicals, both pro and con, and I envy men who hav got the manhood to advocate their convictions, without bigotry, but with courtesy to each other. One man inquires: "If the Liberal League Congress had adopted prohibition, would it not hav been a tool for the church?" We think like Ingersoll; as far as the church and the Bible are right, we say Amen, and so far as they are wrong we censure. The idea of rejecting a reform because the church advocates it would not harmonize the two elements as soon as we hav hoped. If we ever get real temperance by advocating prohibition, we will do well; and if our women had the electiv franchise the highest obstacle would be surmounted. We demand the expunging of that seventh plank at the next congress, and if those who meet in that congress cannot indorse temperance in any form they had best be silent on this subject. If there is any reform more needed in this nation than the suppression of drunkenness, will some one rise and name it? Any measure that redounds to the greatest good of the greatest number is on general principles one that is conceded by every reasoning Liberal. Would it not be better for the masses not to hav a drop as a beverage than to hav the distress, degradation, crime, and misery caused by the cursed stuff?

We hear ministers at temperance meetings offer prayers to the God of the Bible to restrain and do something to abate drunkenness. With all respect to them as men and women, we would say to them: Do not bore us longer with such nonsense; spend your time in logical reasoning that will lead to some legislation to effect the desired end. Your Jehovah God has provided for drunkenness, human slavery, the defiling of women, the useless sacrifice of brutes and humans, the robbing of the innocent for the pleasure and lust of the guilty; has fostered polygamy and every other crime without humanity on his side. Any one can learn this by reading the Bible. If he was worth the paper his name is written on, he would help people that cannot help themselvs.

Some of the sky-phantom worshipers had the courage to agree to meet us in debate, the proposition being that the doctrin of the Bible was better for the people than the doctrin of Infidelity; but when the time came they backed out.

Please send me THE TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL.

JOEL MCCALLISTER.

HOTCHKISS P. O., COL.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed five dollars for four FREETHINKERS' ALMANACS for 1884, and the other works named. I am circulating Freethought literature over this part of the country, and I think we will be able to form a Freethinkers' Club in a short time. I would be pleased to hav you giv me some instructions how to proceed in case we can get the number of men enrolled. At present meetings are being held here by a Baptist minister, but so far he has failed to get one convert, and it now looks doubtful whether he gets even one. I hav persuaded him to read several of your tracts, including the Besant-Hatchard debate. I hav had some talk with most of his congregation. The best informed ones are reading Paine's and Ingersoll's works, and they are dropping off from going to church. One of the leaders has read everything that I gave him, and now he has commenced the "Round-the-World" trip. E. T. HOTCHKISS.

RICHBURG, March 12, 284.

MR. EDITOR: Your much esteemed paper comes to hand invariably on time every Saturday, and is gladly received. Although but a subscriber since the first of the year, I could not do without it, it contains so much knowledge and good reading matter. Mr. Reynolds delivered a lecture here—"What Liberalism Teaches"—on Monday last, which was appreciated very much by those who heard it, and it did a great deal for the cause; for we hav gained some converts. Quite a number purchased Liberal works, the "Age of Reason" among others, and I regard that as a clincher. I purchased quite a number of books, among which was Bennett's "A Truth Seeker Around the World," which I consider is a grand work. Of course there has been considerable of an after-clap among the orthodox people; I attended church to hear it. One brother made a terrible fuss about a man denying the savior, and said it made his heart bleed, and a sister said she had prayed earnestly to God to hav the lecture stopped; but strangely enough it came off all right. We hope to make their "hearts bleed" again in the near future. There is quite a number of Liberals here, and we expect to form a society of Truth Seekers immediately, upon the earnest solicitation of Mr. Reynolds, which I think could be carried on successfully. R. P. BARTON.

LACROSSE, WIS., March 1, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I see Mr. Thompson has got an article on Spiritualism in THE TRUTH SEEKER of February 9th. Now, Mr. Editor, if you will allow me a little space in THE TRUTH SEEKER to make a few remarks, I will be as brief as possible.

Mr. Thompson says: "I believe in a spirit life-principle." If so, I want you, Mr. Thompson, to giv me proof positiv that your spiritual life-principle exists. I want us to come down to the bed-rock on this subject. I do not want to know what you believe or assert, but what you can prove positivly.

You add, "Mr. Winter deals altogether in assertions." Now, it cannot be required of Mr. Winter or any one to prove a negativ, for the principle of logic is this: Whoever makes a statement or assertion must bring proof positiv that the thing brought forward exists. I want no shuffling, either, until this is fairly settled and understood.

For you Spiritualists state it is the cause of all the spiritual phenomena. Therefore, it should be the very first thing to be proved. It is high time for the people to stop believing in ghosts, hobgoblins, spooks, spirits, gods, and all such nonsense, for to my view they hav set the people back hundreds of years, and made them perfectly crazy zealots and bigots. I think the spiritual-God policy is the greatest fraud and the biggest curse in the world, and the little time I hav to liv I want to do all I can to annihilate its cursed influence.

Hoping my good friend will find the evils of it before he has studied another thirty years. I am

Your well-wisher, J. PETTY.

MR. EDITOR: Allow me some remarks on "Realistic Freethought in America." Soft soap must be very cheap in some parts of the world, to judge from the manner in which it is used by Charles Watts in regard to R. G. Ingersoll. All honor to this great reformer who is doing such valuable work in loosening the fetters with which the church binds human souls to her footstool. But to call Col. Ingersoll "the greatest Freethinker the world has produced" is, I think, a very fallacious statement. Something more than devotion to secularism is necessary to make one the greatest Freethinker of the world. Such a title is all-embracing; anyone aspiring to it must be a Freethinker in science, philosophy, theology, and ethics. One of the few who, in my estimation, hav reached this lofty platform is Stephen Pearl Andrews. Charles Watts is very emphatic in speaking of Ingersoll's "gigantic intellect." But are not the products of that intellect remarkable rather for their happy coloring than for their vastness, weight, and novelty? Col. Ingersoll's success is due to his eloquence and humanitarianism; more touching than any of his speeches are the accounts of his kind acts toward his fellow-men. Were he to giv up his share of worldly goods, then he might be compared to Buddha or Jesus, but not to men of gigantic intellect. At a mental symposium the brain evolutions of the latter would be the nourishing food, those of Ingersoll the exhilarating wine. We are daily reaping the fruits produced from seed that was sown in the field of reform by just as great and zealous workers as Ingersoll, but few are as lucky as he is in getting their reward. His efforts are crowned with honor and wealth, while in most cases the world pays reform work with ostracism, or the poorhouse, insane asylum, prison, or scaffold. Far from desiring to undervalue the merits of Ingersoll, these remarks hav been prompted by love of justice—"Not that I love Cæsar less, but that I love Rome more." Mr. Andrews says "love and justice are opposed to each other." If such is the case, O prince of reconciliation, can there ever be peace in the mind of a mortal? Mr. Andrews would no doubt benefit us by making that statement of his the subject of an essay in THE TRUTH SEEKER.

MR. EDITOR: Your interesting "Letters from Friends," it seems to me, hav but a small, too small, percentage from the Old Bay State. Maybe some of us are at fault, or perhaps the hitherto Parent of Ideas has thrown the burden upon the younger members of the family. The Hub, and Massachucetts generally, is not backward in correcting Puritanic authority, which said, "Don't think till I say when." Her schools hav proved to be the "tree of knowledge," which knowledge is fast supplanting church dogmas. Let a man preach hell-fire in the old way of dealing it out fifty years ago, and public opinion would try him as by fire, supplemented with brimstone, maybe. The tree of knowledge is easy and safe to approach, regardless of the "flaming sword which turned every way" to circumvent the spirit of progress. The spirit that stirs up thought is no longer accounted the devil's platform of labor, except by a few bigots, who say go it blind, we will lead the way.

It will not be long before that fabled book analyzed by Paine in his "Age of Reason" will be cataloged with other like traditions in the ancient library of effete literature, a witness of God's infancy and man's foolishness, and cease forever to be that sacred and canonical book of authority so long claimed for it.

"One by one fall ancient errors,
Reared by might and propped by wrong,
And earth wonders when they perish
That they stood the test so long."

God never punishes a man for using his reason, but man defrauds himself when he neglects to use it. It is said that he who believes nothing that he cannot understand—only what appeals to his reason—has a very short creed.

When on the school committee I discouraged the use of the Bible in the schools, and in the full knowledge of it was reelected. So the world moves. A book about which no two agree seemed to me unfit to induct into the minds of the young.

I said to one teacher, "If you will read from the scriptures, I would suggest that you select the verse, 'Jesus wept.'" Your abiding friend of universal mental liberty,

ELIJAH MYRICK.

EXPERIENCES OF AN OLD MAN.

WELLAND, ONT., March 12, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Being in the seventy-ninth year of my age, and having been accustomed to an activ life, but now unable to do manual labor, I cannot be idle. And as I hav often been benefited by reading in THE TRUTH SEEKER the views of our Liberal friends contributing to its pages, I now wish in return, and I hope for the benefit of others, to giv expression to some of my experiences through the same paper.

I find but few people here whose minds hav become sufficiently enlightened to enjoy a conversation above that of tittle-tattle or money-making. I am left to my own thoughts, and if I would giv expression to them it must be upon paper, and it is possible they may some day be read with interest when the mind that expressed them and the hand that wrote them are silent in death, and, as I apprehend, that time is not far distant. It is now seven years since the death of my dear wife, and six years ago I gave up my house and home to my son and family, more for their accommodation than my own. Since that time I hav had to find a home as best I could amongst my children. And although I hav done reasonably well, there has not been that home and home feeling you would be likely to experience in your own house. I hav five children; all hav homes of their own. They all differ in their characteristics, and I differ more or less from any of them, partly on account of age, and partly on account of my further advancement in the science of things.

Ignorance has but little sympathy or charity for that which it cannot comprehend, and the more ignorance the less charity. Ignorance and superstition can dwell together, but intelligence has to be very cautious, even how she knocks at the door of their dwellings, if she would not excite their wrath and vengeance. It is a most difficult problem to get even an entering wedge into an ignorant and superstitious bigot. As well try to split one of the worst of the pepperage-wood trees.

I hav one son about as Liberal as myself, and two sons about half Liberal, but very careless. They appear to care but little whether the dog gets the hare or the hare gets the dog. My two daughters are religious bigots, though neither of them very practical in living up to the Christians' creed they profess, yet are ready to oppose any views at variance with its dogma, and would fight for the faith once delivered to the saints, though it is of extremely small value to them. Such being the case, I hav found it somewhat difficult to find a home with them, where we could be at home with each other, and there has been quite a demand for charity on both sides, and what one side lacks the other has to make up, and that generally falls to my lot; and I am fortunate in having a rather large supply of it. Indeed I manufacture it out of the raw material. Seeing that I am to-day just what I am from my organization at birth, and the circumstances surrounding me since that time, and believing every person to be what they are from causes over which they had no control, although we may be very different in our views, we are but little entitled to credit or blame for being what we are, circumstances having transpired to make us what we are. Viewing things in this light enables me to manufacture the amount of charity required. We read in a certain book of faith, hope, and charity, and the greatest of these is charity. Now, to be in possession of a patent for the manufacture of one of the greatest of Christian virtues certainly ought to be a source of wealth to its possessor. But as I am an old man, and hav given up the pursuit of money-making, and hav adopted the religion of humanity, I make the whole race welcome to my discovery, and recommend it as worthy of adoption by the people of every race, creed, and color. J. R.

RICHFORD, VT., Feb. 16, 284.

MR. EDITOR: I am an old man, and a confirmed Atheist. I thought of trying to tell my TRUTH SEEKER brethren how I came to be so. The teaching of priests had an influence on my young, ignorant mind to make me greatly fear what I knew nothing about, only what they told me. They said God, devil, original sin, soul, hell, endless fire after we are dead, to make me groan and howl in ceaseless pair, and nevermore behold the light; and never, never rise again! Under the influence of such orthodoxy, I got me into the Methodist class-meeting, and was overrun by a class-leader some ten years, and I never got one particle of real information to remove the doubts that would arise in my mind about the truth of my theory. I concluded to examin the whole thing. First, the creed Wesley made for the class. Art. 1. "There is one only true and living God, everlasting, without body or parts, of infinit power, wisdom, and goodness; the maker and preserver of all things, visible and invisible." "And in unity of this God there are three persons of one substance, power, and eternity." Never since I soberly considered Wesley's Methodist God hav I believed in such a God. Wesley made his Methodist God of old Athanasius' God, A.D. 333. My opinion is that all gods in this world are only priests' forged names personified. There is but one God, says Wesley, of three persons, equal in substance, power, and eternity. "Lords many and gods many" throughout our Bible. "Made man in our own image, after our likeness, male and female," without body or parts! Rested and was refreshed. Repeated the God name twenty-seven times—"he" six times, "our" and "us" three times (Gen. i, 26). Then made man of the dust, woman from a rib-bone (Gen. ii). Made a garden man-taap, without body or parts. He knew man would get into it, by which all children would be born sinners exposed to endless hell for what their parents did. Then to remedy the evil, went to a Jew girl without body or parts, and begat a baby. So, they say, Joseph dreamed the angel told him (Matt. i, 20). This son must die to save a few, and damn all the rest of mankind. I think Wesley's God is no better than any priest-forged name. The Jewish God was a great stickler for his name, ten of them. But there was no God until the English language made it of an Anglo-Saxon word they used to express good in general (Adam Clarke). Our mystagog liars put it in our Bible to express location in particular. Such men as John Wesley made our Bible, the greatest book of falsehood ever on the earth. The character of the Jewish God, as described in our Old Testament, is worse than all the devils ever preached of. And Christians, as a body, to-day are the most lying, treacherous, murderous, criminal, dishonest curses in their government and church, and outside of both; worse than Jews and pagans. They are proud, haughty, tyrannical, money-loving followers of a priest-fabricated Jesus Christ, not one of whose commands do they regard, only, "Go ye into all the world" and tell lies in a pulpit to every creature, for a large salary. He that believeth your lies, and pays your salary, shall be saved; he who won't do it shall be damned, and damned if he does. One only good passage in the Bible covering the whole ground of natural morality, "All things ye would hav men do to you, do ye even so to them," is no more Christian than Eskimo. Every man, whatever his practice, wants others to do by him as everybody himself would be done by. Priestcraft, with their ceremony, God, devil, Christ, hell fire, gabble, fright, hav made our world what it is, since the quarreling Council of Nice, A.D. 325; hav murdered five hundred millions, in all manner of frightful ways, in support of orthodox Christianity, an outside show. The Bible is now being turned into a play—a game of eucher, to support all sects. If there ever was a personal God in the universe, "he," "our," and "us" would hav made himself known to all mankind positivly, instead of having six hundred differing John Wesleys to make gods for the ignorant to accept by faith, or go to brimstone fire eternal. The word "religion" has no definit meaning in the world, except the worship of falsehood.

Your leader of Feb. 9th in THE TRUTH SEEKER is splendid and just.

Inclosed find $1.50, for which continue the paper, and send me THE TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL. JOSEPH NOYES.

CENTERVILLE, UTAH, March 7, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Please send me THE TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL, Mr. Remsburg's "False Claims," and "God and the State." I see a letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER of December 29, 1883, over the name B. E. Fair, bearing date, Salt Lake City, Dec. 10, 1883. I hav thought it was too mean and contemptible to notice, but as your readers hav read my letter published in THE TRUTH SEEKER of November 17, 1883, I am not going to deny one word of what I said, for it is true. Mr. Fair says: "Now, the town from which your correspondent writes is a quiet, well ordered village, and the people are quite prosperous generally. The settlement is pleasantly located, and it has always kept pace with the many other successful little farming towns of Utah." Now, as for this place, far from being well ordered, it is fully under the control of the Mormon priesthood, and the place was as pleasantly located in 1857 when the head butcher of the Mountain Meadow Massacre, J. D. Lee, came up from Iron county after helping to murder 132 innocent men, women, and children in cold blood. He came to Centerville, and came into the Mormon meeting-house on Sunday, and was called to the pulpit to preach the gospel of Jesus Christ to us, and Brigham Young gave him an extra wife from this place at that time. Yes, it was as pleasantly located then as now.

The writer continues: "As far as I can learn, the writer of the letter to which I refer is a poor man, and it would seem that common sense would prompt more careful comment than he makes upon his neighbors on whom he depends to some considerable extent for his livelihood."

Well, this creature seems to me to be either a Mormon priest or a Liberal jack. I hav not been dependent upon my neighbors for my livelihood, for I am a miner, and I hav had to get my living by working in the the mines ever since they started in this territory. And I will say right here, that in the former days of this priest-ridden territory, Brigham Young made it as much as a man's life was worth to prospect, and try to open up the mines here. He seemed to hav a spite and animosity against us ungodly miners, but those days are gone, and old Brig too, and the gentiles continue to open up the mines finely, and I say amen to it. True, I am a poor man, but I do not consider that any disgrace to me, although I find it mighty inconvenient. Then this mighty man of brains says, "I believe in Freethought and free speech, but I also believe in cool temper and good judgment, and I submit to you that, in my opinion, this communication to which I refer lacks the most important elements. No matter how true the statements might be, any reasonable person might know that such abuse of an entire community would not be likely to help your correspondent's condition financially. If I am not mistaken, it is not long since the writer of that letter belonged to the church at which he hurls so may stinging adjectivs, and, from my own knowledge, I can assert that the church was no better then than now. Without doubt, at that time, he was as much a 'saintly, beastly thug' as any other of the members, and I hesitate not to say that he then would hav resented such charges with as much vehemence as any Mormon would now." Well, in reply to some of the falsehoods in the above statements, I will say I am not a beastly thug, nor ever was, and as for the belonging to the Mormon church but a short time since, is a falsehood, for it is now about fourteen years since I left the beastly and murderous outfit, and, like many more, I was dissatisfied with it long before I left it, but it would not hav been safe for me to say so. When I left it I struck for my mental liberty. I did not stop to consider the "most important elements." It was enough for me to know and understand, after due reflection, that the system that I with many more had been decoyed into, was a vile infamous fraud, and a wicked imposture, and every man that preaches it is an impostor, from old J. Taylor and Smoothbore Cannon, down to the lowest ignorant scrub. And I say still that this infernal Mormon outfit is a sore curse to this grand and delightful territory, besides a disgrace and reproach to the general government. Then Mr. Fair says: "I should hav paid no attention thereto, only that I hav a keen eye for illiberal Liberals. I think them the most contemptible beings on the face of the earth—that is, I would think so if I did not know better." Well, I will say that the influence under which that letter was written to THE TRUTH SEEKER is the same that put the late D. M. Bennett in the Albany penitentary, and put Mr. Foote and his companions in prison in England, for their fearless Freethought utterances. I shall expect next to hear of this man turning his keen illiberal eye on Mr. Charles B. Reynolds and Mr. George Chainey and others, for their fearless utterances against the priestcraft of Christianity, as Christianity was no better when they belonged to it than it is now, but I admire the sayings of such men as Mr. Reynolds and Mr. Chainey, and what you hav published in THE TRUTH SEEKER of the sayings of Mr. Reynolds of late, I must tell you I admire it, and I expect all of your numerous readers do, and I say, Go ahead Mr. Reynolds; let your tongue and pen be as a sharp cutting sword against all the Christian frand, and the clergy in particular. I must tell you, Mr. Editor, I drew the contrast between this correspondent that belies his name and that worthy man, Mr. H. L. Green, of Salamanca, N. Y., who admired my letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Nov. 17, 1883, so much that he wrote me a good letter and told me so; also, he made me a present of a certificate of membership of the Freethinkers' Association of the State of New York, and he has appointed me an agent in the community I am among, to get new names for it, but this place is so priest-bound I stand but a poor chance of getting many names. I hav shown several round here the paper of Articles of Association Mr Green has so kindly sent, but nary a name can I get yet, but I shall try, try again. I hav had letters sent me from other parties that liked my letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and told me to make use of them as I thought proper, to vindicate myself against that fellow with his keen illiberal eye. One letter asks the question, if this man has got brains to sell, and if so, does he sell, and how, by liquid or dry measure? Mr. Fair says: "I do not mention the name of your correspondent, because I do not wish to make this letter personal." To the above I will say, the person that wrote it is a fit subject to become a member of Taylor's church, if he's not already. I am not ashamed of my name. I hav always paid people their honest rights in my past life, and my name is William Williams, this I wish all the readers of your paper to know who hav read B. E. Fair's letter. Somehow I think the name is a fiction. I hope, Mr. Editor, you will forgiv me for tresspassing on your time and patience in my long letter to you, but I hav done so to vindicate myself in the cause of Freethought and mental liberty, though it has been somewhat unpleasant for me to do so.

I admired the letter of Mr. Walter Walker in the last TRUTH SEEKER; it has the true and right ring with it. It seems the holy priesthood has frozen him out from Farmington. Never mind, Mr. Walker, write what you know of this Utah abomination, and let it be published in your paper and other fearless journals. I send $1 for THE TRUTH SEEKER. I will close by saying, Success to the fearless TRUTH SEEKER and its host of readers, and I remain, as ever,

Yours for the truth, WILLIAM WILLIAMS.

The Four-leafed Clover.

A SONG, BY NATHANIEL J. MORTON
(Lost in the City of Columbus).

There's a tiny little blossom growing in the country fields,
Where butterflies are roving all day long;
And the new-mowed hay is scented with the perfume that it yields,
And butterflies around it love to throng.
'Tis said a magic power
Lurks in the fragrant flower—
Each country maiden in the charm believes;
And when the lads are mowing,
Through the meadows they are going,
To find a spray of clover with four leaves.

CHORUS—And all the world over,
Where'er grows the clover,
'Tis eagerly gathered and prized like a gem;
Good luck will attend you,
And fortune befriend you,
If four leaves are clustered upon the green stem.

There's a legend that the fairies dine upon the clover-bloom,
And swing their cobweb hammocks in its shade;
And when the closing roses will not giv them sleeping room,
'Tis there the little fairy-beds are made.
It has the fairies' blessing,
And any one possessing
A clover-spray should never with it part;
For friends will ne'er forsake you,
Misfortune ne'er o'ertake you,
If you wear a four-leafed clover next your heart.

Rosa Bonheur.

The greatest painter of animals and pastoral scenes in the world to-day is a woman. Rosa Bonheur is an artist of rare genius, and stands at the very pinnacle of her profession. Her name is symbolical of herself, and could not be more appropriate. Bonheur is French for good luck, success, happiness; all of which belong to the wonderful French woman, who was born in Bordeaux, France, in 1822. She inherits her artistic genius from her father, a drawing-master; her love of harmony and sweet accord from her mother, who was a music teacher. The offspring of two such artists could not be other than Rosa Bonheur.

Her mother died when she was seven years old, and her father placed her at school in Paris with her two younger brothers. But Rosa did not like the restraints of the school-room. She was a child of nature, and she used to run away from school and wander out to the Bois de Boulogne, a rough but beautiful young forest, which has since been transformed into a lovely park. It was nice and shady there, and Rosa thought it the loveliest place in the world, as she lay stretched full length on the ground listening to the linnets, and watching the sunlight straying through the branches of the trees, or counting the floating white clouds as they went sailing by like ships on a sea of blue.

They tried to make a seamstress of little Rosa, but she wouldn't and she couldn't be a living sewing machine, and then she was placed in a strict boarding school for young ladies, where her father gave lessons in drawing to pay for her board and tuition. There she kept the scholars laughing at her roguish tricks. She would cut out of paper perfect likenesses of the teachers and scholars. attach them by threads to what in school-boy parlance are termed "spit-balls," and send them flying to the ceiling, where they would hang dangling like so many jumping-jacks. Of course the scholars would laugh, and Rosa would be punished, while the teacher gathered up the caricatures and put them in her album to keep. Rosa was poor then, and wore the plainest clothes, and drank her water from a pewter mug, while her schoolmates wore handsome silk and velvet, and had silver cups to drink from. They often made her feel the difference in their social position, and at last her father took her to their own humble abode of four small rooms in the sixth story of a house in an unpretentious street, and here she commenced to study in earnest. She had no great love for books, but she adored nature, and she commenced sketching country scenes, and the animals that she came across in her wanderings in the fields and woods. Their rooms opened out upon a terrace, and here she kept a sheep amid flowers and trailing vines of green, which served as a model for two years.

Her studies and ambition gave her courage to visit the slaughter-houses, where she went thrice a week, and made pictures of butchers and animals. When, at lenth, she exhibited her paintings, she rose at once to fame. Wealth began to flow into her lap, and her reputation became world-wide. The aristocratic little schoolmates who once scorned her for her poverty are forgotten, while she, the woman of genius, is praised in every land and receives the homage of kings and princes.

But she is still the same Rosa Bonheur, devoted to her art, and finding her dearest companions in the dumb creatures whose natures and habits hav been her life-long study. She dresses simply and, when visiting markets and farm-yards, wears male attire, and a big, slouching hat, as this dress is more comfortable. In this garb she looks like a farmer, and, indeed, she says she was born to be a farmer, but that fate decided otherwise. She livs in a tasteful, pretty home, "a miniature castle," with everything about her that she desires, and, whereas once she kept her solitary sheep on the terrace of a sixth-story tenement, now she has spacious grounds, a large barn, and handsome horses, sheep, cows, dogs, and other animals to her heart's content. She is of medium stature, has a fine face, indicating great force of character, and wears her hair short. She receives immense sums for her pictures, but she will not permit herself to become wealthy. She is extremely generous, and givs away large sums every year.

She has achieved a career of which all women should be proud. Through many obstacles she has pursued her course with one purpose in view, until now, she is, for many years, the recognized equal of the best, and, in her particular line, superior to all.

In her we may perceive that mind is of no sex—that genius abides not less in woman than in man, and that in any department, a purpose, clearly defined and steadily pursued, must, eventually, achieve success. Goethe says, "It is energy of will that makes the difference between the great and small mind," and while all may not be artists like Rosa Bonheur, all may put into their undertakings a steady perseverance, enthusiasm, and a plodding industry that will accomplish wonders. If one does not possess these qualities in the degree that Rosa Bonheur originally did, he may, at least, cultivate them to some extent, in whatever vocation he may be called. No matter how trivial the employment, let it be done correctly. Whatever is worth doing at all is worth doing well.

Correspondence.

RICHFIELD, March 9, 1884.

DEAR MISS WIXON: My mother takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and it is just splendid; and the Children's Corner is ever so nice. I solve nearly all the puzzles, charades, and crosswords. The answer to Benny Diction in Feb. 23d is George Washington. Answer to R. O Bert, in March 1st, is Constantinople; to Mrs. Upham, is THE TRUTH SEEKER. But she has a mistake in it—in exchange, not in return, should be in sink, not in swim. I hope you will not be offended at my pointing out the mistake. The answer to Herbert O. Powler's, in March 8th, first, is kitchen; next, is coal-oil. Answer to J. K. P. Baker, first, is bedstead; progressiv square,

I am going to write to you again, if this does not tire you too much. I like to write very much. Will send some puzzles soon.
So good-bye for this time, GEORGIE HALE.

CAMERON, Mo., March 10, 1884.

To MISS WIXON, Dear Friend: I like the Children's Corner in THE TRUTH SEEKER very much. Father has been taking THE TRUTH SEEKER for four or five years, and he likes it very much. When he commenced taking it I was too young to care much for it; but I like to read it now, and I think it is more interesting since the Children's Corner has been put in. There are not many Liberals here. With thanks for the Corner, I remain,
Your friend, MAGGIE LIVENGOOD.

BY D. M. BENNETT,

Late editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, author of "A Truth Seeker in Europe," "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," "Champions of the Church," etc., etc.

Handsomely bound in red cloth, $6.50; in leather, red edges, $9.50; in morocco, gilt edges, $10.50.

Readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER know the circumstances nder which this work was written. The last words penned by the great author were for the fourth volume which was nearly completed at his death, and which will now contain an account of his world-lamented death and burial. MR. Bennett was a very patient and faithful chronicler of the habits and customs of the different peoples of the many places he visited. The every-day life of all nations is laid before the reader by one who has visited them and beheld them with his own eyes. Particular attention is paid to the progress of Freethought in the various countries he visited, and the morality of so-called pagan nations is contrasted with the morality of Christian countries, much to the detriment of the latter The work is a

Freethinker's History of the World.

This work and "A TRUTH SEEKER IN EUROPE" should be in every Liberal's library Besides its intainsic worth it is a memento of one of the greatest Freethinkers the world has known—of one who ranks with Voltaire and Paine in the force and clearness of his writings.

33 CLINTON PLACE, NEW YORK CITY.

Among the reforms THE TRUTH SEEKER aims to effect are:

Total separation of church and state, including the equitable taxation of church property; secularization of the public schools, abolition of Sunday laws, abolition of chaplaincies, prohibition of public appropriations for religious purposes, and all other measures necessary to the same general end.

Its sixteen large pages are filled every week with scientific, philosophic, and Freethought articles and communications by the ablest Freethinkers in the country. It givs all the Liberal news, and keeps its readers posted on current secular and theological events. It is the armory from which hundreds draw their weapons in contests with priesthood. All the Liberal papers are good, but THE TRUTH SEEKER is

THE BEST AND LARGEST.

It is conducted in a broad and truly liberal spirit, and givs everyone a hearing upon all subjects pertaining to the welfare of the human race.

OPINIONS REGARDING IT.

A paper like THE TRUTH SEEKER is something more and better than an advocate of truth. Through it its subscribers touch elbows with each other. Each reader knows that he is one of a goodly company who find comfort and inspiration in its pages. If they should meet each other they would feel like brothers and sisters. They hav lived under one intellectual roof, felt the glow of the same fireside, and broken together the bread of life. Such a paper is to thousands a substitute for the church.—GEORGE CHAINEY, in This World.

THE TRUTH SEEKER, founded by D. M. Bennett, is to-day perhaps the strongest foe with which superstition has to contend, and a long future of great usefulness is, we trust and believe, before it.—Winted, Conn., Press.

There ought to be five hundred subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER in this county, just to rebuke the infamous church bigots who are using force and fraud to suppress Liberalism.—Worthington, Minn., Advance.

This sterling and widely-circulated Freethought journal has won its way deep into the hearts of its readers. THE TRUTH SEEKER is a great paper, and deserves the most generous support of the Liberal public. The recent numbers received are splendid in every respect.—San Francisco Universe.

THE TRUTH SEEKER has gathered its resources, and will be a stronger, better, and brighter paper than ever.—Liberal League Man.

THE TRUTH SEEKER has become a necessity to the Liberal cause.—Kansas Blade.

BIBLE MYTHS

AND THEIR

Parallels in Other Religions.

Being a Comparison of the Old and New Testament Myths and Miracles with those of heathen nations of Antiquity, Considering also their Origin and Meaning. With numerous illustrations.

The object of the work is to point out the myths with which the Old and New Testaments abound; to show that they were held in common with other nations; and then trace them to their evident origin and explain their meaning.

"It has long been acknowledged by the most eminent biblical students that the Hebrew scriptures contain a large mythical element; but, so far as we know, the present is the first complete and scholarly atttempt to trace these myths to their source, and ascertain their original signification."—Boston Courier.

"Never before has there been given a volume to the reading world that shows the research for the origin of these myths as does this one just published by J. W. Bouton, of New York."—Boston Times.

"It is unquestionably true that the results of a rationalistic study of the Christian scriptures are nowhere else so accessible as they are now made in the work before us.—N. Y. Sun.

SPELLING REFORM AND HOW TO HELP IT. Price 10 cents. Burnz and Co. For sale at this office.

This is a pamphlet of sixteen pages which includes two addresses by Mrs. Eliza B. Burnz, who is one of the most energetic spelling reformers we know. These addresses were delivered at Toronto, Canada, last August at the meeting of the International Congress of Stenographers. The latest systems of shorthand are based on the idea of leaving out silent letters, and spelling by sound, and thus phonography leads naturally to spelling reform. Mrs. Burnz givs in one address a very interesting history of the inception and maintenance of the free classes in shorthand at the Cooper Union of this city during the past ten years, and in the other she presents the many reasons why phonographers and everybody else should join in aiding the spelling reform, by the use, in writing and printing, of the "Five Rules for New Spelling," adopted and recommended by the American, English, and Canadian spelling reform associations. The five rules are as follows, and their effect on the printed page is shown by the pamphlet, which is spelled throughout in accordance with them: 1. Use e for ea when equivalent to short e. 2. Omit silent e after a short vowel. 3. Use f for ph. 4. Omit one letter of a final double. 5. Use t instead of ed when it represents the sound of t. Mrs. Burnz advocates the general use of a few amended spellings, as is done in THE TRUTH SEEKER, without waiting for any perfected alphabet, which, if made, people are not ready for.

ANTI-PROHIBITION. An address delivered in Paine Hall, before the New England Freethinkers' Convention, Jan. 28, 1884. By W. S. Bell. Price, 10 cents. For sale at this office.

There are, says Brother Bell, three things which prohibitionists fail to recognize, namely: 1. That vices are not crimes; 2. That government has no moral function; 3. That personal liberty is inviolable. Mr. Bell rightly maintains "that any legislation which assumes to regulate the conduct of the individual, except in so far as it directly and immediately affects the rights or interests of others, is entirely beyond the legitimate scope and function of government. I hav said," he continues, "that there is no short cut to the development of morality, and now I would affirm that there is no short cut to the welfare of society. But our patent-policy people wish to reach that end speedily, and hence they are in favor of passing laws against every species of wrong, forgetting, as they always do, the distinction between moral rights and legal rights. Prohibitionists do not see that it is wretchedness and despair which plunge so many men into the career of intemperance. They do not perceive that they hav begun at the wrong place in the social system to reform it. Let them learn the lesson of human rights—study the problem of liberty, investigate the wrongs which the millionaires hav done and are still doing the people who toil the long, dreary hours of the day—and every day—for the mere pittance which givs them a morsel to eat and wretched hovels in which to liv, in which through exposure, over-crowding, and bad ventilation, they contract diseases, become a burden to their friends, and after a brief and blasted existence die. We say, let our prohibitionists turn their attention to the real criminals of society and the true cause of intemperance, and there may then be some hope that by and by the toiler will get the just rewards of his labor, and will rejoice in the comforts and joys of a happy home and a temperate life."

Mr. Bell's pamphlet is a vigorous effort, and we commend it to our friends on both sides of the question. That the prohibition movement is a sentimental rather than a logical one he clearly shows. The questions to be decided, after all, are whether society has any rights the individual is bound to respect, and shall the individual be allowed to abuse himself if he chooses to without interference by others? Those who believe in a "consensus of the competent" as against individualism will not agree with our author. Mr. Walker's friends, however, will hail this book as a clincher.

Mr. Bell has removed to Chicago, and the Liberals of the Northwest are requested to keep him busy teaching Liberalism.

THE AGNOSTIC ANNUAL. Second edition. Edited by Charles A. Watts (Charles Watts's son). London: Cattell & Co. For sale at the office. Price 25 cts.

The first edition of this Annual was noticed by THE TRUTH SEEKER on its appearance. It was in every way an interesting, and, owing to Professor Huxley's correspondence, important contribution to Agnostic literature. The second edition derives its further interest from the fact that Professor Huxley saw fit to deny the authority of the editor to publish his contribution, the professor alleging that his letter was a private answer to Mr. Watts's inquiries. To this Mr. Watts responds that the circular he sent out was sufficient in itself to warn the recipient that whatever reply he chose to make would be published, and that of all the scientific and literary persons receiving it only Mr. Huxley and one other misunderstood its purport. The correspondence between Professor Huxley and Mr. Watts on this point is given in full in the preface to this second edition, and some of the words used are quite sharp. The distinguished scientific gentleman allows his temper to betray him into characterizing the publication of his letter as dishonorable, a charge Mr. Watts resents as a "wild accusation," alike "insulting and discourteous." A perusal of the whole correspondence will lead to the conclusion that Professor Huxley is wrong, for it would seem that no person could fail to see by Mr. Watts's original circular that he meant to print in the "publication entitled 'The Agnostic Annual,'" which he had "undertaken to see through the press," whatever reply he might get to his appeal for contributions to its pages. The judicious will grieve that this petty conflict has arisen among the English brethren, but they cannot help absolving Mr. Watts from all blame in the matter. Mr. Huxley's aversion to appearing to affiliate with his more humble fellow-believers probably arises from that arrogance which holds that those who walk with royalty are superior to those who walk with the people. Too many Englishmen are snobs in the presence of "me lud" or "'is royal 'ighness," and Professor Huxley is president of a scientific society patronized by the Prince of Wales.

THE APOSTLE OF LIBERTY. An address delivered in Paine Hall, before the New England Freethinkers' Convention, on the 147th anniversary of Thomas Paine's Birthday. By John E. Remsburg. Price, 10 cents. For sale by THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Of the many good pamphlets printed by friend Mendum, this speech is one of the best. On its delivery Mr. Remsburg was as heartily cheered as at the conclusion of his address on "False Claims." The essays on Paine are very numerous, and most of them hav merit. The masterpiece, of course, is the lecture of Col. Ingersoll. Next to it, as an oratorical effort, will rank the one under review. As a keen analysis of the man, his motivs, and the influence of the times upon him, Mr. S. P. Andrews's speech on the occasion of the 146th anniversary of Paine's birthday approaches the nearest to perfection. But that, unfortunately, was not preserved in book form.

Mr. Remsburg's "Life of Paine" is a defense; this oration is a tribute. Though to Liberals it is the old, old story told again, it is lit up with such flashes of genius, it is so poetical and picturesque, that one never wearies of hearing it. To Freethought, ever gathering recruits from the hordes of the church, it will be a pleasant revelation of a man they hav uninterruptedly heard abused by those actuated by bigotry and unacquainted with the life of the object of their hatred. Paine's life and work for America are too familiar to our readers to need another setting forth at this time, and we hav room for only one or two extracts from the pamphlet. Mr. Remsburg's rebuke of bigotry deserves a wide reading in the Christian church:

"I pity the man whose soul is so small that he cannot rise above the level of his creed to do justice to those whose religious opinions hav not been gaged by his particular standard. I am no Christian; but may I never become so ungrateful as to ignore my obligations to those who are. When war was desolating our fair land, and my young heart yearned to enlist in its defense, a Christian mother printed a kiss upon the cheek of her only boy, and bade him go; Christian hands made the grand old flag we followed; Christian women visited our hospitals, ministering to the sick, or wiping the death-damp from the brows of the dying; Christian generals led their troops on many a hard-fought field; and to-night, the stately oak, the drooping willow, and the moaning pine stand sentinel by many a Christian soldier's grave. But they are not alone. Beside his Christian comrade—beneath the shadows of the same trees—a martyr to the same cause, sleeps the unbeliever. And would you strew with flowers and moisten with tears the grave that enfolds the one, and trample with scorn the turf that grows upon the other? Side by side they grandly marched to war; side by side they bravely fought; side by side heroically they fell; and in the murmuring stream that wanders by their resting-place was heard the funeral chant of no religious creed, but nature's sweet, sad requiem to all.

And none the less do these poetic periods:

"Ungrateful Athens bade her savior drain the poisoned cup. It did its work, the spark of life was quenched; but the name of Socrates shines on, undimmed by the flight of more than twenty centuries. Columbus languished in chains, forged by the nation he had made renowned; but no chains can bind the towering fame his genius won. Religious zealots sealed the lips of a philosopher; but could they stop the revolving earth? Could they control the scientific tide rolling across the boundless sea of human thought? No! the earth went round, the wave swept on. To-day, the very church that persecuted Galileo, reveres his name, accepts his teachings, and through his telescope, the instrument she once condemned, her votaries with eager eye and throbbing pulse explore the starry fields of heaven. It is ever so.

"Truth crushed to earth shall rise again."

Each fierce Thermopylæ she meets but proves the inspiration for some crowning Salamis. The wrongs of Thomas Paine shall be avenged. In vain his country passed to him the bitter cup; the fetters forged to chain his noble spirit to the dust were forged for naught; loving lips whisper, 'It still moves!'"

DIVORCE. A Review of the Subject from a Scientific Standpoint, in answer to Mgr. Capel, the Rev. Dr. Dix, the New England Divorce Reform League, and others who desire more stringent divorce laws. By Edward B. Foote, M.D., author of "Plain Home Talk," etc. Price, 25 cents. For sale at this office.

This is Dr. Foote's lecture before the Liberal Club, the objections of his critics, his reply to them, and in addition the opinions of eminent men upon the subject of marriage and divorce. The doctor is in favor of free divorce, and would lay the obstacles, if any are to be laid, in the way of marriage. At present the marriage relation is a deep, dark pit, with all paths converging toward it, easy to fall into, but with hardly a help up its sides for the feet of those who find it unpleasant and wish to get out. His experience as a medical man has made the author acquainted with much marital misery, and perhaps has led him to take a too pessimistic view of the subject; but there can be no question that most, if not all, his points are well taken; certainly they are well sustained, for Dr. Foote is an able man, and makes an exhaustiv examination of whatever problem he undertakes to solve.

In examining the position of the papal emissary the doctor uses language and cites facts that must convince Mgr. Capel that his assertion that it was the Catholic church that "raised up Europe from its degradation and gave woman her true position," is false. Up to the year 1884 woman nowhere holds her true position, which is that of an equal of man in all the affairs of life. She is a partner in his passions, his griefs and pleasures, and ought to be recognized as his equal before the law in the conduct of business, and in holding office and voting. The church has been the real enemy of woman, in assigning her a subordinate social position, telling her to be an obedient wife, a good mother, and to keep silent when the head of the household opes his mouth. Crusty old Paul, who went visiting the coppersmith's wife, was mistaken in his estimate of woman's capacity, as Helen Gardner would convince him if he could hear her lecture.

Dr. Foote makes a novel proposition to the people. Twenty-five years ago he proposed this plan, and he thinks that it is now just the scheme for the times. He would "do away with the present system of legalizing marriage, and substitute therefor a board of physiologists well versed in the sciences of temperaments, physiognomy, and phrenology, composed of an equal number of men and women, whose function shall consist in the power to examin into the mental and physical characteristics of candidates for matrimony; to grant or refuse marriage licenses according to the congeniality of the parties presenting themselvs, and to grant divorces to those who are miserably mated in wedlock. A board of this character should hav its sittings at stated periods in every county seat in the state or the district to which it belongs. I would hav a provision added that no man under thirty or woman under twenty-five should become a parent without a license from this board."

With such a system as this in force, the doctor thinks there would be no need of courts or referees, as all questions relating to the expediency of divorce in a given case, and to a proper division of property, could well be left to such an intelligent body of arbitrators, as the marriage and divorcing board would really be. Scattered through the book are a host of ideas, some sound, and others, in our opinion, erroneous. Space will allow only one more quotation, and with this we can more nearly agree than with the advisory board scheme. "But what of the home?" asks the doctor; and replies:

"There are those who express great solicitude for the home unless we hav stringent divorce laws. Now, you cannot break up a genuin home if you try. There is too much cohesion in it. Affectional glue is the stickiest glue ever made, and it often holds mistaken people together when it would be far better if they were to be taken apart. But when this affectional glue is absent, and the family would disintegrate without the hoops of law, it becomes a home quite unfit for children. Better break it up than to hav more children born into it. There is something far more threatening to the home than divorce. It is the cupidity of our rich men. In ancient times homes were practically prevented from being formed by the monopoly of women by opulent polygamists, who scoured the country and bought up all the good-looking girls; but now the home is threatened by the monopoly of land and the wherewithal to raise a family. Land and bread are quite as necessary with which to maintain a well-ordered home as faithful wives and temperate husbands. In our large cities we hav a few places on our most-fashionable streets which admit of the establishment of homes; but how is it in our cheap, unlighted flats and tenement-houses, which fairly swarm with human beings? We find in these no such home as the poet portrays or the moralist advocates. The true home has many factors: a sufficient number of square feet to giv room to a growing family; a domicil fitted with all modern conveniences, and well lighted and aired; the divinity presiding double-headed—both male and female—not single-headed and masculin only; and this human nest for younglings must be presided over by affection so pure and strong as to require no legal patchwork to hold it together. A home which does not contain these elements of convenience, beauty, love, and union has no business with the production and rearing of the young, and may better be broken up through the disintegrating agencies existing within it than to be held together by the strong arm of the law, to become a nest of vipers to prey upon society. A home held together only by law can only, in the nature of things, be a hotbed of vice, disease, and undesirable progeny. It produces minds which can suffer all the horrors of delirium tremens without the aid of alcohol. It produces bodies which disease consumes as readily as the flames lick up storehouses of petroleum. It is strange that our Capels, Dixes, and others like them, cannot see the swelling leech on the end of the nose as well as the musketo in the angle of the eye!"

HOW TO READ

CHARACTER:

A NEW ILLUSTRATED Hand-Book of PHRENOLOGY and PHYSIOGNOMY, for the use of Students and Examiners; with a Descriptive Chart for marking, and upwards of 170 Engravings. Price, post-paid, in muslin, $1.25; in paper, $1.

One who wishes to get a practical knowledge of Phrenology and Physiognomy in the shortest possible time, and without burdening his mind with theoretical speculations, will find this just the work he needs. It begins at the beginning; describes the brain and the skull; illustrates the temperaments; shows how the organs are grouped together in the cranium; points out the location and function of each organ, with the corresponding physiognomical signs; gives practical direction for the cultivation or restraint, as may be necessary, of each organ; explains fully the "Art of Character Reading," showing how to proceed in an examination, how to find the organs, how to distinguish temperaments and other physiological conditions.

The work is thorough, methodical, carefully considered in every part; and at the same time simple, concise, popular in style, and adapted to the comprehension of all. It does not claim to be exhaustive; but we can confidently assert that so much truly useful matter on the subject treated, with so many fine illustrations, can nowhere else be found in the same compass or for so small a price

DETY ANALYZED

AND

THE DEVIL'S DEFENSE.

By Col. John R. Kelso, A.M.

Not since Hudibras has there been such damaging blows given to these old myths and fables. The colonel has made the sacredness of the scriptures appear as absurd as Cervantes made that of the knights of the age of chivalry. The singular audacity with which he attacks the foundations of Christianity shows the earnestness of his own convictions in regard to its fabulous origin.—L Hutchison.

CHRONIC DISEASES

Embracing those of the blood and Nerves, the Diseases of Men, the Diseases of Women, and the various causes, physical and social, leading to the many plainly treated by that plainest of books, PLAIN HOME TALK, EMBRACING MEDICAL COMMON SENSE—nearly 1,000 pages, 200 illustrations, by Dr. E. B. FOOTE, of 120 Lexington ave., New York, to whom all letters from the sick should be addressed. In its issue for Jan. 19, 1878, Mr. Bennett's TRUTH SEEKER thus speaks of Dr. FOOTE and his medical publications: "We know him (Dr. Foote) personally and intimately, and we say with all the assurance that knowledge imparts that he is a man of the highest incentivs and motivs, whose life has been spent in instructing and improving his fellow-beings by giving such information as is well calculated to enable them to be more healthy, more happy, and to be better and more useful men and women. His medical works possess the highest value, and have been introduced and thoroughly read in hundreds of thousands of families, who to-day stand ready to bear willing testimony to the great benefit they have derived from the physiological, hygienic, and moral lessons which he has so ably imparted."

Gems of Thought.

WHEN the ancient gods and religions were in their glory it was firmly thought to be a great merit to believe in them; faith in them was counted a virtue; and to be considered a moral man was to blindly accept all the claims with regard to these gods and religions. A greater fallacy, however, could hardly be devised. There is at no time merit in believing unfounded assertions; there is no excellence in being deceived; there is no virtue or morality in believing a falsehood.—D. M. Bennett.

"I HATE to hear folks talk so," said the poor relation; "I don't see that you are any better than a heathen." "I wish I were half as good as many heathen," I said. Dying for a principle seems to me a higher degree of virtue than scolding for it; and the history of heathen races is full of instances where men laid down their lives for the love of their kind of their country, of truth, nay, for simple manhood's sake, or to show their obedience or fidelity. . . . Which seems to you nearest heaven, Socrates drinking his hemlock, Regulus going back to the enemy's camp, or that old New England divine [Jonathan Edwards?] sitting comfortably in his study and chuckling over his conceit of certain poor women who had been burnt to death in his own town, going "roaring out of one fire into another?"—O. W. Holmes.

WENDELL PHILLIPS.

He saw humanity in tears and chains,
Beaten and robbed, and by the wayside bleeding.
And priest and levite, passing by unheeding
The sufferer's cries and wounds and crimson stains,
And then, in eloquent and marvelous strains,
He spoke, and thrilled the nation with his pleading
Standing by justice, not one step receding;
"Scorning the gifts of fame," and golden gains,
That he might better aid the task of raising
The poor downfallen and downtrodden man.
The music of his speech the world is praising,
Made him the eloquent Samaritan,
Whose lips were at the altar touched with coals,
That melted hearts, and kindled kindred souls.
—George W. Bungay.

HELP us to save free conscience from the paw
Of hireling wolves, whose gospel is their maw.
—Milton.

THE BETTER LAND.

I know not where that city lifts
Its jasper walls in air,
I know not where the glory beams,
So marvelously fair;

I cannot see the waving hands
Upon that farther shore,
I cannot hear the rapturous song
Of dear ones gone before;

But dimmed and blinded earthly eyes,
Washed clear by contrite tears,
Sometimes catch glimpses of the light
From the eternal years. —L. M. Latimer.

CREDULITY is not a crime, but it becomes criminal by resisting conviction. It is strangling in the womb of conscience the effects it makes to ascertain truth. We should never force belief upon ourselvs in anything—Thomas Paine.

IF the love of Plato is a worthless ground for preferring error to truth, still more reprehensible is it to do wrong out of hatred and contempt for anyone, be he who he may. Could the father of lies speak truth, it would be our duty to believe him when he did so.—Guesses at Truth.

IN the interests of fair play, to say nothing of those of mankind, I ask, Why do not the clergy, as a a body, acquire, as a part of their preliminary education, some such tincture of physical science as will put them in a position to understand the difficulties in the way of accepting their theories, which are forced upon the mind of every thoughtful and intelligent man, who has taken the trouble to instruct himself in the elements of natural knowledge?—Huxley.

IN its mad, eager search for the real,
The age uses feet and not wings.
Does it too roughly treat the ideal—
Does it shatter too many dear things?
Are your idols all broken and battered?
Are there ruins of faith on each hand?
Yet precious the seed that is scattered
When harvest shall whiten the land,

Though we worship no more in their fashion,
Or walk where our fathers hav trod,
We are fuller of love and compassion,
And so we are nearer to God.
We hav taken the crown from the splendid
But bloodthirsty warriors of old,
And our homage and praise hav descended
To the thinker, untrammeled and bold.

The age turns aside from old byways,
We were taught to revere in our youth,
And finds the new beautiful highways
Lying bathed in the sunlight of truth.
Should we weep if some idols were shattered,
Some blossoms trod down by the way,
Since the seed that is everywhere scattered
Must yield a great harvest some day?
—Ella Wheeler.

Odds and Ends.

"DON'T forget the poor," urges a country editor. It isn't very often that an editor puts in a puff for himself, but occasionally he is driven to it by necessity.

"DO you believe in laying on hands?" asked a parishioner of the clergyman. "Certainly I do," he replied. "But if your child is very bad I would advise you to try a shingle."

"I THOUGHT I heard Fred kiss you on the piazza last night," said a father to his daughter the other morning. "Oh, no, pa," was the artless answer; "he only kissed me on the ear."

BY a new law in Arkansas, no saloon can be built within 640 rods of a church. But the natives dodge this law by building the saloon first. Then they erect the church right across the road.

A VERMONT man has a hen thirty-nine years old. The other day a hawk stole it, but after an hour came back with a broken bill and three claws gone, put down the hen, and took an old rubber boot in place of it.

A YOUNG mother, traveling with her infant child, writes the following letter to her husband at home: "We are all doing first-rate and enjoying ourselvs very much. We are in fine health. The boy can crawl about on all fours. Hoping that the same may be said of you, I remain, etc., Fanny."

AN order has been received in Boston for three pairs of shoes for a colored Methodist preacher. The measurements are as follows: 7 3-4 inches across the foot; instep measure, 19 1-2 inches; length of foot, 21 1-2 inches; width of heel, 7 1-8 inches. The wearer of these shoes weighs 410 pounds.

"FINE sermon, wasn't it?" said a man to a sleepy-looking brother, as they came out of church Sunday morning. "Yes, very fine gaped the other. "Were you not struck with the brilliancy of that passage beginning, 'Courage ye saints?'" "Oh, yes, but I was more forcibly struck with the passage beginning, 'Finally, brethren.'"

A LITTLE boy about four years of age was saying his prayers at his mother's knee, and when he had finished the Lord's prayer, she said: "Now, Willie, ask God to make you a good boy." The child raised his eyes to his mother's face for a few moments, as if in deep thought, and then replied: "It's no use, mamma. He won't do it. I hav asked him lots o' times."

PERSONS sometimes get answers they don't expect, even from children. One of them was questioning a Sunday-school class about the man who fell among thieves on the way from Jerusalem to Jericho. Bringing the story to a point, he asked: "Now, why did the priest and the Levite pass by on the other side?" A scholar held out his hand. "Well, my boy, why did the priest pass by on the other side?" "I know," said the lad. "Because the man was already robbed."

IF a man could liv a thousand years,
When half his life had passed
He might, by strict economy,
A fortune hav amassed.

Then, having gained some common sense,
And knowledge, too, of life,
He could select a woman who
Would make him a true wife.

But as it is, man hasn't time
To even pay his debts,
And weds to be acquainted with
The woman whom he gets.

A BOSTON paper says: "The punch-bowl from which the patriots drank, at the house of Samuel Edes, during the planning of the plot for throwing the tea overboard in Boston harbor, was presented by his descendant, Mrs. Long, to the Boston historical society, some years ago." That settles it. Then, instead of being a lot of pious patriots, who went prayerfully to work to destroy the tea of the enemy, the old duffers surrounded a punch-bowl till they got full. Then the patriotic act was only a common drunk, such as people indulge in nowadays. The patriots simply got their kegs full and went down to the boat whooping. There is a new name for it now days. They call it painting the town red.

A SUNDAY-SCHOOL teacher was telling her class about Noah and the flood, and she had just said he had a pair of everything in the ark, when a small boy held up his hand: "What is it, Tommy?" she inquired. "Are you sure Noah had a pair of everything?" "Quite sure, for the Bible says so." "Well, when I go home I'll tell my pap he don't know what he's talking about." "Why, Tommy, what did he say?" "Aw, he thinks because he is a deacon he's mighty smart, and when I was gettin' my lesson, last night, Mr. Jones was there, an' pap said he'd bet a nickel against the Sunday collection that Noah didn't hav a pair of aces in the ark, from cellar to garret. Pap bluffed Mr. Jones, for he ain't a church-member, and don't know much scripter, but you bet he can't fool a Sunday-school scholar like me."

A TALL, fine looking gentleman arrived at one of he leading hotels lately. He registered, and as the clerk was looking over the room board and the porters were looking after the gentleman's baggage he addressed the clerk as follows: "I wish, if you please, that in assigning me to a room you would use some discretion and place me, if possible, on the worldly side of the house." The clerk stammered a little, looked at his diamond pin, rang two or three bells nervously, coughed, fumbled a blotter on the desk and said he did not quite understand what the gentleman was driving at. "Well, my dear sir, the last time I was here you gave me a room on the religious side of the house. To be frank with you, I think I was put between two—well, two prayer-meetings, and I heard nothing all night but groans and amens. If you hav a worldly side of the house just giv me a cot there. To some men prayer will take the place of sleep. I am not one of that kind."

CINCINNATI, Dec. 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: As I feel greatly indebted to you for the benefit I hav received from your treatment, and the use of your Magnetic appliances, I can say without hesitation to those afflicted as I hav been that the effect was simply marvelous. Two weeks ago I was stricken with paralysis in my right arm and could not use it at all, but after wearing a suit of your MAGNETIC CLOTHING for one week, can use it quite as well as ever. I hav also been troubled with Dyspepsia and Kidney Complaint for a number of years, from which I hav suffered intensely, and, although doctoring all the time, never found but temporary relief. Since putting on your appliances I hav experienced great benefit, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav in the past two weeks, will soon be well. I would, therefore, recommend to those suffering as I hav your Magnetic appliances as the only means of effecting a sure cure. Yours respectfully,

WM. H. CLEMMER,
No. 80 Eastern avenue.

Remember that the same appliances which will effect a cure in a case of Paralysis will at the same time eradicate CATARRH or DYSPEPSIA in the same patient. We do not, like the Old School Physician, change medicins every day until, after dosing the patient almost to death, he may possibly strike something (if he is very skilful) that brings relief for the time being.

Neuralgia of the Heart of Six Years Standing Cured in Three Weeks.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., Dec. 11, 1882.

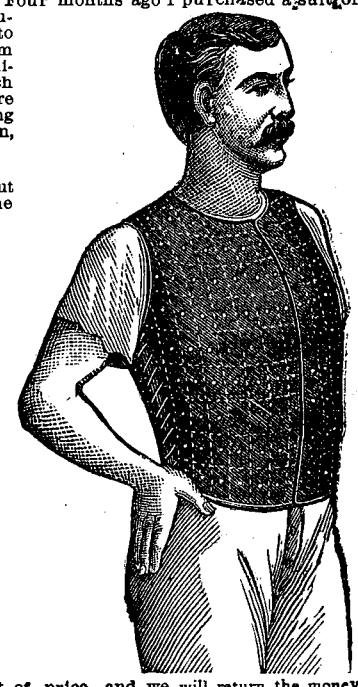
DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: After wearing one of your MAGNETIC VESTS for about three weeks, I was entirely cured of Neuralgia of the Heart and Side, which had been a source of misery to me for the last six years. I had tried numerous remedies before without benefit, but as soon as I put on the MAGNETIC VEST I got relief instantly. With unbounded gratitude, I remain

Yours respectfully,
H. A. BROWN.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been under drug treatment for eight years with nervous prostration and female weakness:

OSBORN, O., Dec. 15, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY: Your letter just received; also the Clothing on Tuesday last. Fitted perfectly. FELT BETTER FROM THE FIRST HOUR I HAD THEM ON. Am not joking, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav since Tuesday, will soon be well. Will report again soon. Respectfully yours, E. J. K.



This lady reports herself entirely cured in less than six weeks after putting on the garments, and, although in bed, unable to get out, when applied, she nevertheless was able to ride twenty miles in two days after the application. The lady's name can be had upon application at this office, by anyone desiring to communicate with her.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been suffering for two years with an Ovarian Tumor, and who had been told that nothing but the knife would save her life, and the chances were as 9 to 1 against recovery. In four months' time she is perfectly well, and has not taken a dose of medicin since putting on the appliances. Consult us when your physician tells you he can do nothinog for you; it will pay you.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., November 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY, Dear Sir: About two years ago my health began to fail me; I became nervous, lost all desire for food, and, in fact, began to fail rapidly, so that I became alarmed and consulted several physicians of St. Louis, at which place I was then stopping, all of whom declared that I had an Ovarian Tumor, and that the only thing that would save my life would be the knife. About six months ago I grew rapidly worse, and had about made up my mind to take the only course that seemed left to me, and submit to an operation, when my attention was called to the Eureka Magnetic Appliances. As a drowning man will catch at a straw, so did I catch at this faint hope of a cure. Four months ago I purchased a suit of your appliances. From the very first I felt invigorated, the tumor, which had extended entirely across my abdomen, began to decrease, my pains became less from day to day, until now I am as well as I ever was in my life. Since putting on the appliances I hav not taken a single dose of medicin. My bowels, which before were constipated, are now regular. I would therefore cheerfully recommend them to anyone suffering as I hav, believing that they will do all and more than you claim for them. I remain,

Gratefully yours, MRS. MARY J. STEWART.

Remember that these appliances are not worn next the skin, but over the under-garment, and, unlike all other appliances in the market, they impart no shocks and leaves no sores.

Children's garments upon application.

Any of the above garments sent to any address upon receipt of price, and we will return the money if they are not as represented in every respect. If you are uncertain as to what would best suit your case send us word stating symptoms, and we will advise you what would be best suited to treat you. While our appliances are offered at less than one-third of what others are selling worthless appliances for, yet we will guarantee that the magnetic quality is a hundred fold superior to any other appliance ever offered the public, and will outlast the garments themselvs. Every magnet is put through a particular process, and hav raised five times their own weight six months after being magnetized, while not a single appliance in the market will attract the smallest particle of iron, the majority of such worthless appliances having so-called magnets made of material no better than hoop-iron, and not capable of retaining magnetism for a moment. All of our garments are made from the very best material for the purpose, and will outlast any and all other garments now before the public. Every magnet is arranged in the garments upon scientific principles, and not haphazard as in all the others. We offer you therefore

The Only Scientific Magnetic Appliance Ever Constructed.

And challenge comparison with any of the so-called magnetic garments now offered under that head. At the same time the application of labor-saving machinery in our manufacture enables us to offer them about

ONE-THIRD THE PRICE HERETOFORE CHARGED,

So that we can say with truth, None are so poor that they cannot procure them, being but a trifle higher than ordinary clothing.

Remember that we are offering you the cheapest and best magnetic appliances in the market, and if upon receiving the garments they do not meet your expectation, return them at our expense and we will refund your money.

Ladies' Abdominal Jackets and Gentlemen's Vests are made to order, and a fit guaranteed.

Notes and Clippings.

A CHURCH in Connecticut, by resolution, forbids its members to drink intoxicating liquors—"explicitly excepting hard cider." That is their "particular kind of vanity," remarks the Advocate.

IN a recent Western political convention an ex-preacher, who is now a politician, offered the following resolution: "Resolved, That the meek shall inherit the earth; and, further, Resolved, That we are the meek."

OF Mr. Beecher and his visit to San Francisco, the Argonaut says: "His biblical vagaries hav ceased to amuse the irreverent, and his irreverences hav ceased to shock the religious. Nothing can save his next lecture season but a new doubt."

A BOSTON clergyman has had the temerity to advance the theory that the Garden of Eden was located at the North Pole. Heretofore, says the Chicago Times, the general impression at the Hub has been that this famous garden fronted on Beacon street.

THE prison reform committee of Massachusetts proposes a new plan of distribution of convicts which will put the most hardened by themselvs. And Mr. Buckley thinks the principle might be applied with advantage in some of the Methodist Sunday-schools.

THE recent formation of societies for the cremation of the dead in New Orleans, Chicago, Philadelphia, and Boston shows that the reform is spreading with some rapidity, and that before long the method of the disposition of the dead will be radically changed.

A BIG petition for giving colored children more rights in Massachusetts public schools was signed, without reading, by a large number of eminent judges, politicians, and clergymen without regard to color. The opening sentence was, "We, the undersigned, parents of colored children."

Texas Siftings says that "Monsignor Capel having amused himself and everybody else, during his visit to the United States, will soon leave for England taking his little playthings with him." The playthings assigned to the monsignor are a bag of gas and a little tin lion on wheels labeled "Leo."

HENRY IRVING, the actor, met an old lady in Scotland who had so much respect for the Sabbath that she condemned the queen for boat-riding on it. She added: "I've read the Bible since I was so high, an' I knaw ev'ry word in't. I knaw things the good Lord did, but I want ye to knaw, too, that I don't think any the more e'en of him for a-doin' it!"

GENERAL GORDON'S example in recognizing slavery as a legal institution has been followed by Admiral Hewett, who has ordered that runaways be restored to their masters, on the ground that the Egyptian convention allowing slavery remains in force. And so England's load of infamy grows day by day. No wonder Gladstone breaks down trying to carry the burden.

A CLERGYMAN was devoutly reading the holy scriptures to his congregation, when he came to certain words in the lower right hand corner to which he desired to giv great emphasis. So he read with a loud voice, "I am"—turned over two leaves and continued—"an ass, the foal of an ass"—then, seeing his mistake, found the right place, and added, "that I am," which, of course, nobody would deny.

THE pains and penalties of perjury present themselvs in a rather muddled form to the youthful Philadelphian. A very little boy was called as a witness, says the Times of that city, in the quarter sessions. He was all over trembling. "My boy," said Assistant District-Attorney Kinsey, smiling like a good father, "do you know the nature of an oath?" "Oh, y-yes, sir," answered the boy. "Well, if you should tell a lie and die, what would become of you?" "I should become a mummy, sir."

MARTIN O. VAN FLEET—suggestiv name—was treasurer of Huron county, Ohio, and also treasurer of the Presbyterian church, of Norwalk. Recently he faded from public view and so did the funds which he had in his charge. The amount of available assets which flitted with Fleet amounted to about $70,000. As he was an "exemplary Christian gentleman," the good people of Norwalk are at a loss to account for his disappearance. There was nothing mean about him, however; he gave the combination of the lock to his wife and left the empty safe in the office.

IT is high time for the workingmen of the United States to rescue themselvs, by their own brain and brawn, from the accursed system that is crushing them into slavery and misery. Blast the vampires of capital, who drain the life-blood of their victims! Blast the greedy monopolists and corporations, who devour the substance of the poor upon whom they prey! Blast the land-grabbers, whose breath blasts the earth; the gambling lawmakers, who blast the public prosperity; the false priests, who blast the skies; the foul judges, who blast justice in the interest of the rich; and whosoever or whatsoever blasts the life or liberty of man, let him and it be blasted!—John Swinton.

THE Rev. Henderson Davis, pastor of the M. E. church at Coxsackie, N. Y., is causing his flock great distress. A husband of a female parishioner has openly denounced the pastor as a wolf in sheep's clothing. He claims to hav a letter in his possession which he found in the work-box of his wife, signed by the accused clergyman, in which Henderson addresses her as "dearest Emma," and speaks of the yearning of his heart to see her, and how when he met her upon the arm of her husband he became almost frantic. With this epistle the husband visited the minister's house and handed it to him for identification. The pastor destroyed the paper, and was thereupon kicked and cuffed by his suspicious parishioner. The matter will be brought before the church authorities and the courts.

THE Bartholdi statue pedestal committee estimated the whole cost of the pedestal at $250,000, $140,000 of which is in hand, but now they find that the granit alone will cost at least $240,000. That is, the whole pedestal will cost not less than $340,000, for they hav thus far spent $70,000 upon the concrete foundation, and it is but little more than two-thirds finished. The funds come in very slowly, and though great efforts hav been made to interest the rest of the country, and committees hav been appointed in the chief cities, not more than $500 had been received from them. The feeling doubtless is that the statue is to be New York's, and New York should pay for it. The 250,000 French people who paid for the statue itself, however, meant it as a gift to the whole American people.

BY Queen Victoria's special command, a divorce suit brought by Lady Colin Campbell against her husband, the brother-in-law of the Princess Louise, is to be heard by the English divorce court in "strict secrecy." The emperor of Germany has sent for the president of the Reichstag and informed that officer that a vote cast against the bill to continue the Anti-Socialist law will be regarded as an act against his imperial majesty. So the bill, which was virtually defeated, will now be successful. Prince Bismarck has ordered the Bremen Senate to ask for admission to the Imperial Customs Union. The Senate is unwilling to do so, but must yield. In a single day these three instances of royal and autocratic bulldozing occur. What an illustration of the liberty enjoyed by the people of Europe! A queen, to hush up scandals coming very near to her family, if not involving some of them, seals up the doors of a court and the lips of all its officers. A kaiser, finding a public measure liable to defeat, bullies the parliament of the people into passing it by making a vote against it an offense to the crown. An insolent minister orders a senate to do his bidding and it is forced to comply. Yet what will be the ultimate effect? The English people will imagin scandals more disgusting, perhaps, than the divorce case will disclose. The Socialists will lay up another wrong against the old emperor. The Bremen Senate will hate Bismarck more bitterly than ever.

THE excessiv modesty of the residents of Atlanta, Ga., has been greatly shocked during the past week by a very small matter. An enterprising picture-dealer to whose eyes classic works of art hav long been familiar put in his show-window a picture of Lady Godiva taking her noonday ride through Coventry. At once ladies began to shun the place, and some crossed over the street rather than look upon the horrid picture. Some of the older and bolder maidens gave expression to their indignation, and through them the police were called on to hav the object removed. The dealer very promptly took it down, but this gave rise to a discussion concerning the hypercritical tastes of certain people, in any one of whose houses could be found pictures fully as questionable. The antique maidens grew madder as their minds dwelt upon the incident, and it now seems as if it is destined to be a topic for some time. At several meetings the subject was gravely talked over and the opinion expressed that the world was growing worse, and that it behooved good people to make an open and activ fight for morality. One of the preachers in his sermon dwelt at some length on the transaction, going so far as to say that pictures, even when well-clothed, are but sensuous luxuries, and the money paid for them would be better employed if given to the missionary cause.

THE Boston correspondent of the Chicago Tribune writes to his paper: Among the records of the Boston Municipal Court the other day appeared this item: "Jeremiah Donnelly, for playing marbles the Lord's Day, fined $2 without costs." This did not happen in the year 1701, but took place last week before a judge who does not wear a wig. Jeremiah might hav gone up to the old Granary burying-ground on Tremont street (just beside the church where the Rev. Buckboard Murray used to delight great audiences) and spend Sunday gazing through the iron bars upon tombstone images which hav looked out upon passing crowds for 150 years or more; he might hav gone to hear the heretics lecture at Paine Memorial Hall; he might hav attended spiritual seances; he might hav gone to see the ancient Egyptian idols and the plaster of paris statues in the Art Museum; or he could hav walked softly along the sacred paths of the Common. All this could Jerry hav done without danger of trouble, but when it comes to playing marbles the Lord's Day the small boy's father must walk into court and rescue his sinful son with a $2 note. You hav got to draw the line somewhere. This little episode illustrates the peculiar Boston mind, which is liberal in spots, but cannot wholly break away from Puritan bigotry. A man can think and talk as he pleases as long as he observes the common rules of decency, and always find an audience, but he must not play marbles Sunday. He can expound all sorts of heretical doctrins the Lord's Day, and publish a paper threatening society with various kinds of destruction, and no one says a word about smashing his mouth or his printing-press, but when he dares to play marbles Sunday there is always a Puritan to point out the statute framed to punish such desecration, and the law says, "Obey the word of the fathers!" If the strict letter of the Massachusetts laws was enforced no man could hav peace, but still no one demands their repeal, and every little while a crank appears with the Bay psalm-book under his arm and the spirit of witchburners in his soul to cry out against the villain who plays marbles the Lord's Day. It is very small business, which would amuse everybody if it did not grow annoying, for the spirit of Puritanism crops out in many curious shapes and phases. Very likely it will die out with the elder generation of to-day, so that in 1900 small Jerry may play marbles on Sunday without fear of molestation.

News of the Week.

BISHOP MCNAMARA, of Brooklyn, is sued by his landlady for libel.

NEW revelations in the Rose Ambler murder case at Stratford, Conn., are promised soon.

PRINCE LEOPOLD, the Duke of Albany, Queen Victoria's youngest son, died on the 28th ult.

HIGH winds and cold weather hav made the last few days uncomfortable in and about New York.

THE Rev. Father Kearney, of Hempstead, Long Island, is sued for $5,000 for assault and battery.

BARNUM'S sacred white elephant is not white. The front part of it is pink and the rest slate-colored.

MR. CARL SCHURZ, ex-secretary of state, has declined a purse of $100,000 which his friends and admirers wished to raise for him.

THE women of Canton, Kansas, raided a saloon in that town one day last week and poured all the liquor found into the street. Their action is said to be indorsed by many good citizens.

THE trial of the Rev. Dr. Bristor, at Newark, N. J., is progressing, but nothing of importance has been elicited. The charge is immorality with several boys. The examination of witnesses is carried on in secret.

IT is thought not improbable that the Vatican (the pope's residence at Rome) and St. Peter's church will be confiscated by the Italian government. In that case, it is said, the pope will seek refuge in Austria.

PASTOR NEWMAN continues to occupy the pulpit of the Madison Avenue Congregational church, but is uncertain how long he will stay there. There are those who say he will remain, and others who think his engagement very brief.

STATE-SENATOR GRIGGS, of Minnesota, who has just returned from the Cœur d'Alene mining region, says that the yield of gold the coming season will be extraordinary. One man too poor at first to buy his outfit has taken $5,000 from a place six feet square. Another sold an acre and a quarter of his claim for $10,000. Miners who are working take out $40 per day. Many who are not working sit with gun in hand guarding their claims.

CHARLES L. KUSE, editor of the Gringo and Greaser, a paper published at Manzano, N. M., was shot and killed last Friday while sitting in his office. The assassin, who is unknown, fired through the window. Mr. Kuse was a Freethinker, and his paper was devoted to defending the state against the encroachments of the Catholic church. It is not necessary, perhaps, to look further for the cause of his assassination in a priest-cursed country like New Mexico.

IN the Episcopal church of the Holy Trinity in Brooklyn prayer was offered up last Sunday for the benefit of Queen Victoria, that she might be sustained in her recent severe bereavement in the death of her son. It would hav been the part of forethought for these sympathetic people to hav prayed a week or two earlier that the afflictions under which the good Victoria suffers might hav been averted. A prayer in time might save considerable suffering—if it was answered.

DISSATISFACTION over the verdict of a jury in a trial for murder has just precipitated upon Cincinnati, Ohio, one of the bloodiest riots ever known in this country, lasting from Friday, the 28th ult., until the following Monday. An attempt was made to lynch the murderer Berner, and failing in this the mob proceeded to all manner of violence. The court-house, which cost $250,000, containing valuable papers, was burnt Saturday night. All the troops in the state were ordered to the scene, and the mob dispersed. Between 75 and 100 persons were killed, many of them innocent bystanders who had nothing to do with the riot.

The Rostrum.

A New Lecture by Colonel Ingersoll.

ORTHODOXY DYING FROM SOFTENING OF THE BRAIN AND OSSIFICATION OF THE HEART.

It is utterly inconceivable that any man believing in the truth of the Christian religion could publicly deny it, because he who believes in that religion would believe that, by a public denial, he would peril the eternal salvation of his soul. It is conceivable, and without any great effort of the mind, that millions who don't believe in the Christian religion should openly say that they did. In a country where religion is supposed to be in power—where it has rewards for pretense, where it pays a premium upon hypocrisy, where it at least is willing to purchase silence—it is easily conceivable that millions pretend to believe what they do not. And yet I believe it has been charged against myself, not only that I was insincere, but that I took the side that I am on for the sake of popularity; and the audience to-night goes far toward justifying the accusation.

ORTHODOX RELIGION DYING OUT.

It givs me immense pleasure to say to this immense audience that orthodox religion is dying out of the civilized world. It is a sick man. It has been attacked with two diseases—softening of the brain and ossification of the heart. It is a religion that no longer satisfies the intelligence of this country; a religion that no longer satisfies the brain; a religion against which the heart of every civilized man and woman protests. It is a religion that givs hope only to a few; a religion that puts a shadow upon the cradle; a religion that wraps the coffin in darkness, and fills the future of mankind with flame and fear. It is a religion that I am going to do what little I can while I liv to destroy; and in its place I want humanity, I want good fellowship, I want a brain without a chain, I want a religion that every good heart will cheerfully applaud.

RELIGIOUS BIRTHS.

We must remember that this is a world of progress, a world of change. There is perpetual death, and there is perpetual birth. By the grave of the old forever stand youth and joy; and when an old religion dies a better one is born. When we find out that an assertion is a falsehood, a shining truth takes its place, and we need not fear the destruction of the false. The more false we destroy the more room there will be for the true. There was a time when the astrologer sought to read in the stars the fate of men and nations. The astrologer has faded from the world, but the astronomer has taken his place. There was a time when the poor alchemist, bent and wrinkled and old, over his crucible endeavored to find some secret by which he could change the baser metals into purest gold. The alchemist has gone; the chemist took his place; and, although he finds nothing to change metals into gold, he finds something that covers the earth with wealth. There was a time when the soothsayer and augur flourished, and after them came the parson and the priest; and the parson and the priest must go. The preacher must go, and in his place must come the teacher—that real interpreter of nature. We are done with the supernatural. We are through with the miraculous and the wonderful. There was once a prophet who pretended to read in the book of the future. His place has been taken by the philosopher, who reasons from cause to effect—a man who finds the facts by which he is surrounded and endeavors to reason from these premises and to tell what in all probability will happen in the future. The prophet has gone, the philosopher is here. There was a time when man sought aid entirely from heaven—when he prayed to the deaf sky. There was a time when the world depended upon the supernaturalist. That time in Christendom has passed. We now depend upon the naturalist—not upon the disciple of faith, but upon the discoverer of facts—upon the demonstrator of truth. At last we are beginning to build upon a solid foundation, and just as we progress the supernatural must die.

THE RELIGION OF RECIPROCITY.

Religion of the supernatural kind will fade from this world, and in its place we will hav reason. In the place of the worship of something we know not of, will be the religion of mutual love and assistance—the great religion of reciprocity. Superstition must go. Science will remain. The church, however, dies a little hard. The brain of the world is not yet developed. There are intellectual diseases, the same as diseases of the body. Intellectual mumps and measles still afflict mankind. Whenever the new comes the old protests, and the old fights for its place as long as it has a particle of power. And we are now having the same warfare between superstition and science, that there was between the stage-coach and the locomotiv. But the stage-coach had to go. It had its day of glory and power, but it is gone. It went West. In a little while it will be driven into the Pacific with the last Indian aboard. So we find that there is the same conflict between the different sects and different schools not only of philosophy but of medicin. Recollect that everything except the demonstrated truth is liable to die. That is the order of nature. Words die. Every language has a cemetery. Every now and then a word dies and a tombstone is erected, and across it is written the word "obsolete." New words are continually being born. There is a cradle in which a word is rocked. A thought is molded to a sound, and the child-word is born. And then comes a time when the word gets old, and wrinkled, and expressionless, and it is carried mournfully to the grave, and that is the end of it. So in the schools of medicin. You can remember, so can I, when the old allopathists reigned supreme. If there was anything the matter with a man they let out his blood. Called to the bed-side, they took him to the edge of eternity with medicin, and then practiced all their art to bring him back to life. One can hardly imagin how perfect a constitution it took a few years ago to stand the assault of a doctor. And long after it was found to be a mistake hundreds and thousands of the old physicians clung to it, carried around with them in one pocket a bottle of jalap, and in the other a rusty lancet, sorry that they couldn't find some patient idiotic enough to allow the experiment to be made again.

THEY DIE HARD.

So these schools, and these theories, and these religions die hard. What else can they do? Like the paintings of the old masters, they are kept alive because so much money has been invested in them. Think of the amount of money that has been invested in superstition! Think of the schools that hav been founded for the more general diffusion of useless knowledge! Think of the colleges wherein men are taught that it is dangerous to think, and that they must never use their brains except in an act of faith! Think of the millions and billions of dollars that hav been expended in churches, in temples, and in cathedrals! Think of the thousands and thousands of men who depend for their living upon the ignorance of mankind! Think of those who grow rich on credulity, and who fatten on faith! Do you suppose they are going to die without a struggle? They will die if they don't struggle. What are they to do? From the bottom of my heart I sympathize with the poor clergyman that has had all his common sense educated out of him, and is now to be thrown out upon the cold and uncharitable world. His prayers are not answered; he gets no help from on high, and the pews are beginning to criticise the pulpit. What is the man to do? If he suddenly changes, he is gone. If he preaches what he really believes, he will get notice to quit. And yet if he and the congregation would come together and be perfectly honest, they would all admit they didn't believe anything of it.

"HONOR BRIGHT."

Only a little while ago a couple of ladies were riding together from a revival in a carriage late at night, and one said to the other, as they rode along: "I am going to say something that will shock you, and I beg of you never to tell it to anybody else. I am going to tell it to you." "Well, what is it?" She says: "I don't believe in the Bible." The other replied: "Neither do I." I hav often thought how splendid it would be if the ministers could but come together and say: "Now let us be honest. Let us tell each other, honor bright—as Dr. Currie did in Chicago the other day—let us tell just what we believe." They tell a story that in the old time a lot of people, about twenty, were in Texas in a little hotel, and one fellow got up before the fire, put his hands behind him, and says he: "Boys, let us all tell our real names." If the ministers and their congregations would only tell their real thoughts, they would find that they are nearly as bad as I am, and that they believe just about as little.

THEY DON'T BELIEVE IT.

Now, I hav been talking a great deal about the orthodox religion; and, if after having delivered a lecture, I would meet some good, religious person and he would say to me: "You don't tell it as we believe it." "Well, but I tell it as you hav it written in your creed." "Oh, well," he says, "we don't mind that any more." "Well, why don't you change it?" "Oh, well," he says, "we understand it." Possibly the creed is in the best possible position for them now. There is a tacit understanding that they don't believe it. There is a tacit understanding that they hav some way to get around it, that they read between the lines; and if they should meet now to form a creed they might fail to agree; and the creed is now so that they can say as they please except in public. Whenever they do so in public, the church, in self-defense, must try them; and I believe in trying every minister that doesn't preach the doctrin as he agrees to. I hav not the slightest sympathy with a Presbyterian preacher who endeavors to preach Infidelity from his pulpit and receive Presbyterian money. When he changes his views he must step down and out like a man, and say, "I don't believe your doctrin, and I will not preach it. You must hire some bigger fool than I am."

QUESTIONING THE CREED.

But I find that I get the creed very nearly right. To-day there was put into my hands the new Congregational creed. I hav just read it, and I thought I would call your attention to it to-night, to find whether the church has made any advance; to find whether it has been affected by the light of science; to find whether the sun of knowledge has risen in the heavens in vain; whether they are still the children of intellectual darkness; whether they still consider it necessary for you to believe something that you by no possibillity can understand in order to be a winged angel forever. Now, let us see what their creed is. I will read a little of it. They commence by saying that they "believe in one God, the Father Almighty, maker of heaven and of earth, and of all things visible and invisible." I am perfectly willing that he should make the invisible if they want him to. They say, now, that there is this one personal God, that he is the maker of the universe and its ruler. I again ask the old question, Of what did he make it? If matter has not existed through eternity, then this God made it. Of what did he make it? What did he use for the purpose? There was nothing in the universe except this God. What had the God been doing for the eternity he had been living? He had made nothing—called nothing into existence; never had had an idea, because it is impossible to hav an idea unless there is something to excite an idea. What had he been doing? Why doesn't the Congregational church tell us? How do they know about this infinit being? And if he is infinit, how can they comprehend him? What good is it to believe in something that you know you don't understand—that you never can understand? In the old creeds they described this God as a being without body and parts or passions. I defy any man in the world to write a better description of nothing. You cannot conceive of a finer word-painting of a vacuum than a something without body and parts or passions. And yet this God, without passions, is angry at the wicked every day; this God, without passions, is a jealous God, whose anger burneth to the lowest hell. This God, without passions, loves the whole human race, and this God, without passions, damns a large majority of the same. So, too, he is the ruler of the world, and I find here that we find "his providence in the government of the nations?" What nations? What evidence can you find, if you are absolutely honest and not frightened, in the history of nations that this universe is presided over by an infinitly wise and good God? How do you account for Russia? How do you account for Siberia? How do you account for the fact that whole races of men toiled beneath the master's lash for ages without recompense and without reward? How do you account for the fact that babes were sold from the arms of mothers—arms that had been reached toward God in supplication? How do you account for it? How do you account for the existence of martyrs? How do you account for the fact that this God allows people to be burnt simply for loving him? How do you account for the fact that justice doesn't always triumph? How do you account for the fact that innocence is not a perfect shield? How do you account for the fact that the world has been filled with pain, and grief, and tears? How do account for the fact that people hav been swallowed by volcanoes, swept from the earth by storms, dying by famin, if there is above us a ruler who is infinitly good and infinitly powerful?

FROM THE RURAL DISTRICTS.

I don't say there is none. I don't know. As I hav said before, this is the only planet I was ever on. I liv in one of the rural districts of the universe. I know about these things just as much as the clergy. And if they know no more about the other world than they do about this it is not worth mentioning. How do they answer all this? They say that God "permits it." What would you say of me if I stood by and saw a ruffian beat out the brains of a child when I had full and perfect power to prevent it? You would say truthfully that I was as bad as the murderer. That is what you would say. Is it possible for this God to prevent it? Then, if he doesn't, he is a fiend; he is not good. But they say he "permits it." What for? So we may hav freedom of choice. What for? So that God may find, I suppose, who are good and who are bad. Didn't he know that when he made us? Did he not know exactly just what he was making? Why should he make those whom he knew would be criminals? If I should make a machine that would walk your streets and commit murder you would hang me. Why not? And if God made a man who he knew would commit murder, then God is guilty of that murder. If God made a man knowing he would beat his wife, that he would starve his children, that he would strew on either side of his path of life the wrecks of ruined homes, then I say the being who called that wretch into existence is directly responsible. And yet we are to find the providence of God in the history of nations. What little I hav read shows me that when man has been helped, man had to do it; when the chains of slavery hav been broken, they hav been broken by man; when something bad has been done in the government of mankind, it is easy to trace it to man, and to fix the responsibility upon human beings. You will not look to the sky; you need throw neither praise nor blame; you can find the efficient causes nearer home—right here.

THE LOVE OF GOD.

What is the next thing I find in this creed? "We believe that man was made in the image of God, that he might know, love, and obey God, and enjoy him forever." I don't believe that anybody ever did love God, because nobody ever knew anything about him. We love each other. We love something that we know. We love something that our experience tells us is good and great, and good and beautiful. We can not by any possibility love the unknown. We can love truth, because truth adds to human happiness. We can love justice, because it preserves human joy. We can love charity. We can love every form of goodness that we know or of which we can conceive, but we cannot love the infinitly unknown. And how can we be made in the image of something that has neither body and parts nor passions. "That our first parents, by disobedience, fell under the condemnation of God, and that all men are so alienated from God that there is no salvation from the guilt and power of sin except through God's redeeming power." Is there an intelligent man or woman now in the world who believe in the Garden of Eden story? If there is, strike here [tapping his forehead], and you will hear an echo. Something is for rent. Does any human being how believe that God made man of dust, and a woman of a rib, and put them in a garden, and put a tree in the middle of it? Wasn't there room outside of the garden to put his tree, if he didn't want people to eat his apples?

If I didn't want a man to eat my fruit I would not put him in my orchard.

THE "SNAKE STORY."

Does anybody now believe in the snake story? I pity any man or woman who, in this nineteenth century, believes in that childish fable. Why did they disobey? Why, they were tempted. Who by? The devil. Who made the devil? What did he make him for? Why didn't he tell Adam and Eve about this fellow? Why didn't he watch the devil instead of watching Adam and Eve? Instead of turning them out, why didn't he keep him from getting in? Why didn't he hav his flood first and drown the devil, before he made man and woman?

And yet people who call themselvs intelligent—professors in colleges and presidents of venerable institutions—teach children, and young men who ought to be children, that the Garden of Eden story is an absolute historical fact! Well, I guess it will not be long until that will fade from the imagination of men. I defy any man to think of a more childish thing. This God waiting around there, knowing all the time what would happen—made them on purpose so it would happen—and then what does he do? Holds all of us responsible; and we were not there. Here is a representativ before the constituency had been born. Before I am bound by a representativ, I want a chance to vote for or against him; and if I had been there and known all the circumstances, I should hav voted against him. And yet I am held responsible.

THE ATONEMENT.

What did Adam do? I cannot see that it amounted to much anyway. A God that can create something out of nothing ought not to hav complained of the loss of an apple. I can hardly hav patience to speak upon such a subject.

Now, that absurdity gave birth to another—that, while we could be rightfully charged with the rascality of somebody else, we could also be credited with the virtues of somebody else; and the atonement is the absurdity which offsets the other absurdity of the fall of man. Let us leave them both out; it reads a great deal better with both of them out; it makes better sense.

Now, in consequence of that, everybody is alienated from God. How? Why? Oh, we are all depraved, you know; we all want to do wrong. Well, why? Is that because we are depraved? No. Why do we make so many mistakes? Because there is only one right way, and there is almost an infinit number of wrong ones; and as long as we are not perfect in our intellects we must make mistakes. There is no darkness but ignorance; and alienation, as they call it, from God is simply a lack of intellect upon our part. Why were we not given better brains? That may account for the alienation. But the church teaches that every soul that finds its way to the shore of this world is against God—naturally hates God; that the little dimpled child in the cradle is simply a chunk of depravity. Everybody against God! It is a libel upon the human race; it is a libel upon all the men who hav worked for wife and child; it is a libel upon all the wives who hav suffered and labored, wept and worked, for children; it is a libel upon all the men who hav died for their country; it is a libel upon the human race. Leave out the history of the church, and there is nothing in this world to prove the depravity of man left.

Everybody that comes is against God. Every soul, they think, is like the wrecked Irishman. He was wrecked in the sea, and drifted to an unknown island, and as he climbed up the shore he saw a man and said to him, "Hav you a government here?' The man said, "We hav." "Well," said he, "I am ag in' it!" The church teaches us that that is the attitude of every soul in the universe of God. Ought a God to take any credit to himself for making depraved people? A God that cannot make a soul that is not totally depraved, I respectfully suggest, should retire from the business. And if a God has made us, knowing that we would be totally depraved, why should we go to the same being for repairs?

THE SECOND BIRTH.

What is the next? "That all men are so alienated from God that there is no salvation from the guilt and power of his sin except through God's redeeming grace."

Reformation is not enough. If the man who steals becomes perfectly honest, that is not enough; if the man who hates his fellow-man changes and loves his fellow-man, that is not enough; he must go through that mysterious thing called the second birth; he must be born again. That is not enough unless he has faith; he must believe something that he does not understand. Reformation is not enough; there must be what they call conversion. I deny it. According to the church, nothing so excites the wrath of God—nothing so corrugates the brows of Jehovah with revenge—as a man relying on his own good works. He must admit that he ought to be damned, and that of the two he prefers it, before God will consent to save him. I saw a man the other day, and he said to me, "I am a Unitarian Universalist; that is what I am." Said I: "What do you mean by that?" "Well," said he, "here is what I mean: the Unitarian thinks he is too good to be damned, and the Universalist thinks God is too good to damn him; and I believe them both."

THE CONGREGATIONAL CREED.

What is the next thing in this great creed?

"We believe that the scriptures of the Old and New Testaments are the record of God's revelation of himself in the work of redemption; that they are written by men under the special guidance of the holy spirit; and that they constitute an authoritativ standard by which religious teaching and human conduct are to be regulated and judged."

This is the creed of the Congregational church; that is, it is the result of the high-joint commission appointed to draw up a creed for their churches; and there we hav the statement that the Bible was written "by men under the special guidance of the holy spirit." What part of the Bible? All of it. All of it; and yet what is this Old Testament that was written by an infinitly good God? The being who wrote it did not know the shape of the world he had made. The being who wrote it knew nothing of human nature; he commands men to love him, as if one could love upon command. The same God upheld the institution of human slavery; and the church says the Bible that upholds that institution was written by men under the guidance of the holy spirit. Then I disagree with the holy ghost upon that institution.

This church tells us that men under the guidance of the holy ghost upheld the institution of polygamy—I deny it; that under the guidance of the holy ghost these men upheld wars of extermination and conquest—I deny it; that under the guidance of the holy ghost these men wrote that it was right for a man to destroy the life of his wife if she happened to differ with him on the subject of religion—I deny it. And yet that is the book now upheld in this creed of the Congregational church. If the devil had written upon the subject of slavery, which side would he hav taken? Let every minister answer, honor bright. If you knew the devil had written a little work on human slavery, in your judgment would he uphold slavery or denounce it? Would you regard it as any evidence that he ever wrote it if it upheld slavery? And yet, here you hav a work upholding slavery, and you say that it was written by an infinitly good, wise, and beneficent God! If the devil upheld polygamy, would you be surprised? If the devil wanted to kill somebody for differing with him, would you be surprised? If the devil told a man to kill his wife, would you be astonished? And yet, you say, that is exactly what the God of us all did. If there be a God, then that creed is blasphemy. That creed is a libel upon him who sits upon heaven's throne. I want—if there be a God—I want him to write in the book of his eternal remembrance that I denied these lies for him.

I do not believe in a slaveholding God; I do not worship a polygamous holy ghost. I will not get upon my knees before any being who commands a husband to slay his wife because she expresses her honest thought.

GOD NOT AN AUTHOR.

Did it ever occur to you that if God wrote the Old Testament, and told the Jews to crucify or kill anybody that disagreed with them on religion, and that God afterwards took upon himself flesh and came to Jerusalem, and taught a different religion, and the Jews killed him—did it ever occur to you that he reaped exactly what he had sown? Did it ever occur to you that he fell a victim to his own tyranny, and was destroyed by his own law? Of course I do not believe that any God ever was the author of the Bible, or that any God was ever crucified, or that any God was ever killed or ever will be, but I want to ask you that question.

Take this Old Testament, then, with all its stories of murder and massacre; with all its foolish and cruel fables; with all its infamous doctrins; with its spirit of caste; with its spirit of hatred, and tell me whether it was written by a good God. Why, if you will read the maledictions and curses of that book, you would think God, like Lear, had divided heaven among his daughters, and then, in the insanity of despair, had launched his curses upon the human race.

And yet, I must say—I must admit—that the Old Testament is better than the New. In the Old Testament, when God got a man dead, he let him alone. When he saw him quietly in his grave he was satisfied. The muscles relaxed, and a smile broke over the divine face. But in the New Testament the trouble commences just at death. In the New Testament God is to wreak his revenge forever and ever. It was reserved for one who said, "Love your enemies," to tear asunder the veil between time and eternity and fix the horrified gaze of men upon the gulfs of eternal fire. The New Testament is just as much worse than the Old as hell is worse than sleep, just as much worse as infinit cruelty is worse than annihilation; and yet the New Testament is pointed to as a gospel of love and peace.

THE REIGN OF TRUTH AND LOVE.

But "more of that hereafter," as the ministers say. "We believe that Jesus Christ came to establish among men the kingdom of God, the reign of truth and love, of righteousness and peace." Well, that may hav been the object of Jesus Christ. I do not deny it. But what was the result? The Christian world has caused more war than all the rest of the world besides; all the cunning instruments of death hav been devised by Christians; all the wonderful machinery by which the brains are blown out of a man, by which nations are conquered and subdued—all these machines hav been born in Christian brains. And yet he came to bring peace, they say; but the Testament says otherwise: "I came not to bring peace, but a sword." And the sword was brought. What are the Christian nations doing to-day in Europe? Is there a solitary Christian nation that will trust any other? How many millions of Christians are in the uniform of everlasting forgivness, loving their enemies?

There was an old Spaniard upon the bed of death, and he sent for a priest, and the priest told him that he would hav to forgiv his enemies before he died. He says, "I hav not any." "What! no enemies?" "Not one," said the dying man, "I killed the last one three weeks ago."

How many millions of Christians are now armed and equipped to destroy their fellow-Christians? Who are the men in Europe crying out against war? Who wishes to hav the nations disarmed? Is it the church? No; it is the men who do not believe in what they call this religion of peace. When there is a war, and when they make a few thousand widows and orphans, when they strew the plain with dead patriots, then Christians assemble in their churches and sing "Te Deum Laudamus" to God. Why? Because he has enabled a few of his children to kill some others of his children. This is the religion of peace—the religion that invented the Krupp gun that will hurl a bullet weighing 2,000 pounds through twenty-four inches of solid steel. This is the religion of peace, that covers the sea with men-of-war, clad in mail, all in the name of universal forgivness.

THE WARS IT BROUGHT.

What effect had this religion upon the nations of the earth? What hav the nations of the earth been fighting about? What was the Thirty Years' War in Europe for? What was the war in Holland for? Why was it that England persecuted Scotland? Why is it that England persecutes Ireland even unto this day? At the bottom of every one of these conflicts you will find a religious question. The religion of Jesus Christ, as preached by his church, causes war, bloodshed, hatred, and all uncharitableness; and why? Because they say a certain belief is necessary to salvation. They do not say, if you behave yourself pretty well you will get there; they do not say, if you pay your debts and love your wife and love your children, and are good to your friends, and your neighbors, and your country, you will get there; that will do you no good; you hav got to believe a certain thing. Oh, yes, no matter how bad you are, you can instantly be forgiven then; and no matter how good you are, if you fail to believe that, the moment you get to the day of judgment nothing is left but to damn you forever, and all the angels will shout "hallelujah."

What do they teach to-day? Every murderer goes to heaven: there is only one step from the gallows to God; only one jerk between the halter and heaven. That is taught by this same church. I believe there ought to be a law to prevent the slightest religious consolation being given to any man who has been guilty of murder. Let a Catholic understand that if he imbrues his hands in his brother's blood, he can hav no extreme unction; let it be understood that he can hav no forgivness through the church; and let the Protestant understand that when he has committed that crime the community will not pray him into heaven. Let him go with his victim. The victim, you know, dying in his sins, goes to hell, and the murderer has the happiness of seeing him there. And if heaven grows dull and monotonous, the murderer can again giv life to the nerve of pleasure by watching the agony of his victim. I am opposed to that kind of forgivness. And yet that is the religion of universal peace to everybody.

PREVALENCE OF THE KINGDOM.

Now, what is the next thing that I wish to call your attention to?

"We believe in the ultimate prevalence of the kingdom of Christ over all the earth."

What makes you? Do you judge from the manner in which you are getting along now? How many people are being born a year? About fifty millions. How many are you converting a year; really, truthfully? Five or six thousand. I think I hav overstated the number. Is orthodox Christianity on the increase? No. There are a hundred times as many unbelievers in orthodox Christianity as there were ten years ago. What are you doing in the missionary world? How long is it since you converted a Chinaman? A fine missionary religion, to send missionaries with their Bibles and tracts to China, but if a Chinaman comes here, mob him, simply to show him the difference between the practical and theoretical workings of the Christian religion. How long since you hav had a convert in India? In my judgment, never; there never has been an intelligent Hindoo converted from the time the first missionary put his foot upon that soil; and never, in my judgment, has an intelligent Chinaman been converted since the first missionary touched that shore. Where are they? We hear nothing of them, except in the reports. They get money from poor old ladies, trembling on the edge of the grave, and go and tell them stories, how hungry the average Chinaman is for a copy of the New Testament, and paint the sad condition of a gentleman in the interior of Africa without the work of Dr. McCosh, longing for a copy of the Princeton Review. In my judgment, it is a book that would suit a savage. Thus money is scared from the dying and frightened from the old and feeble. About how long is it before this kingdom is to be established?

THE RESURRECTION.

What is the next thing here? They also believe in the resurrection of the dead, and in their Confession of Faith hereto attached I find they also believe in the resurrection of the body. Does anybody believe that that has ever thought? Here is a man, for instance, that weighs 200 pounds, and gets sick and dies weighing 120; how much will he weigh in the morning of the resurrection? Here is a cannibal, who eats another man; and we know that the atoms that you eat go into your body and become a part of you. After the cannibal has eaten the missionary, and appropriated his atoms to himself, and then he dies, whom will the atoms belong to in the morning of the resurrection in an action of replevin brought by the missionary against the cannibal? It has been demonstrated again and again that there is no creation in nature, and no destruction in nature. It has been demonstrated again and again that the atoms that are in us hav been in millions of other beings; grown in the forest, in the grass, blossomed in the flowers, been in the metals; in other words, there are atoms in each one of us that hav been in millions of others, and when we die these atoms return to the earth, and again spring in vegetation, taken up in the leaves of the trees, turned into wood. And yet we hav a church, in the nineteenth century, getting up this doctrin, presided over by professors, by presidents of colleges, and by theologians, who tell us that they believe in the resurrection of the body.

They know better. There is not one so ignorant as not to know better.

THE JUDGMENT-DAY.

And what is the next thing? "And in a final judgment." It will be a set day. All of us will be there, and the thousands, and millions, and billions, and trillions, and quadrillions that hav died will be there. It will be the day of judgment, and the books will be opened, and our case will be called. Does anybody believe in that now that has got the slightest sense?—one who knows enough "to chew gum without a string?" "The issues of which are everlasting punishment for the wicked and everlasting life for the redeemed." That is the doctrin to-day of the Congregational church, and that is the doctrin that I oppose. That is the doctrin that I defy and deny.

MOHAMMED.

But I must hasten on. Now, this comes to us after all the discussion that has been, and we are told that this religion is finally to conquer this world. This is the same religion that failed to successfully meet the hordes of Mohammed. Mohammed wrested from the disciples of the cross the fairest part of Europe. It was known that he was an impostor. They knew he was, because the people of Mecca said so, and they knew that Christ was not, because the people of Jerusalem said he was. This impostor wrested from the disciples of Christ the fairest part of Europe, and that fact sowed the seeds of distrust and Infidelity in the minds of the Christian world. And the next was an effort to rescue from the Infidels the empty sepulcher of Christ. That commenced in the eleventh century and ended in 1291. Europe was almost depopulated. For every man who owed a debt, the debt was discharged if he put a cross upon his breast and joined the Crusades. No matter what crime he had committed, the doors of the prison were opened for him to join the Crusades. And what was the result? They believed that God would giv them victory over the Infidel, and they carried in front of the first crusade a goat and a goose, believing that both those animals had been blessed by the indwelling of the Holy Ghost. And I may say that those same animals are in the lead to-day in the orthodox world. Until 1291 they endeavored to get that sepulcher, until finally the hosts of Christ were driven back baffled, beaten, and demoralized—a poor, miserable, religious rabble. They were driven back, and that fact sowed the seeds of distrust in Christendom. You know at that time the world believed in trial by battle—that God would take the side of right—and there had been a trial by battle between the Cross and Mohammed, and Mohammed had been victorious.

HOW ART WAS SAVED.

Well, what was the next? You know when Christianity came into power it destroyed every statue it could lay its ignorant hands upon. It defaced and obliterated every painting; it destroyed every beautiful building; it destroyed the manuscripts both Greek and Latin; it destroyed all the history, all the poetry, all the philosophy, it could find, and burnt every library that it could reach with its torch. And the result was the night of the Middle Ages fell upon the human race. But by accident, by chance, by oversight, a few of the manuscripts escaped the fury of religious zeal; a few statues had been buried, and the result was that these manuscripts became the seed the fruit of which is our civilization of to-day. A few forms of beauty were dug from the earth that had protected them, and now the civilized world is filled with art, with painting, and with statuary, in spite of the rage of the early church.

THE DISCOVERY OF AMERICA.

What is the next blow that this church received? The discovery of America. That is the next. The Holy Ghost who inspired men to write the Bible did not know of the existence of this continent—never dreamed of it; the result was that his Bible never spoke of it. He did not dream that the earth is round. He believed it was flat, although he made it himself, and at that time heaven was just up there beyond the clouds. There was where the gods lived; there was where the angels were; and it was against that heaven that Jacob's ladder rested that the angels ascended and descended. It was to that heaven that Christ ascended after his resurrection. It was up there where the New Jerusalem was with its streets of gold, and under this earth was perdition; there was where the devils lived; there was where a pit was dug for all unbelievers, and for men who had brains; and I say that for this reason: That just in proportion that you hav brains, just in that proportion your chances for eternal joy are lessened, according to this religion. And just in proportion that you lack brains, your chances in proportion are increased. They believe under there that they discovered America. They found that the earth is round. It was circumnavigated by Magellan. In 1519 that brave man set sail. The church told him: "The earth is flat, my friend; don't go off. You will go off the edge." Magellan said: "I hav seen the shadow of the earth upon the moon, and I hav more confidence in the shadow even than I hav in the church." The ship went round. The earth was circumnavigated. Science passed its hand above it and beneath it, and where was the heaven and where was the hell? Vanished forever! And they dwell now only in the religion of superstition. We found there was no place for Jacob's ladder to lean against; no place there for the gods and angels to liv; no place there to empty the water of the deluge; no place there to which Christ could hav ascended; and the foundations of the New Jerusalem crumbled, and the towers and domes fell and became simple space—space sown with an infinit number of stars; not with New Jerusalems, but with constellations.

FIGHTING COPERNICUS.

Then man began to grow great, and with that, you know, came astronomy. Now just see what they did in that. In 1473 Copernicus was born. In 1543 his great work. In 1616 the system of Copernicus was condemned by the pope, by the infallible Catholic church, and the church is about as near right upon that subject as upon any other. The system of Copernicus was denounced. And how long do you suppose the church fought that? Let me tell you. It was revoked by Pius VII. in the year of grace 1821. For 205 years after the death of Copernicus, the church insisted that that system was false, and that the old idea was true. Astronomy is the first help that we ever received from heaven. Then came Kepler in 1609, and you may almost date the birth of science from the night that Kepler discovered his first law. That was the dawn of the day of intelligence—his first law, that the planets do not move in circles; his second law, that they described equal spaces in equal times; his third law, that there was a direct relation between weight and velocity. That man gave us a key to heaven. That man opened this infinit book, and we now read it, and he did more good than all the theologians that ever lived. I hav not time to speak of the others—of Galileo, of Leonardo da Vinci, and of hundreds of others that I could mention.

SPECIAL PROVIDENCES.

The next thing that gave this church a blow was statistics. Away went special providence. We found by taking statistics that we could tell the average length of human life; that this human life did not depend upon infinit caprice; that it depended upon conditions, circumstances, laws, and facts, and that those conditions, circumstances, and facts were ever activ. And now you will see the man who depends entirely upon special providence gets his life insured. He has more confidence even in one of these companies than he has in the whole trinity. We found by statistics that there were just so many crimes on an average committed; just so many crimes of one kind and so many of another; just so many suicides, so many deaths by drowning, just so many accidents on an average, just so many men marrying women, for instance, older than themselvs; just so many murders of a particular kind; just the same number of accidents; and I say to-night, statistics utterly demolish the idea of special providence. Only the other day a gentleman was telling me of a case of special providence. He knew it. He had been the subject of it. Yes, sir! A few years ago he was about to go on a ship, when he was detained, he didn't go, and the ship was lost and all on board. Yes! I said, "Do you think the fellows that were drowned believed in special providence?" Think of the infinit egotism of such a doctrin. Here is a man that fails to go upon a ship with five hundred passengers, and they go down to the bottom of the sea—fathers, mothers, children, and loving husbands and wives waiting upon the shores of expectation. Here is one poor little wretch that didn't happen to go! And he thinks that God, the infinit being, interfered in his poor little withered behalf, and let the rest all go. That is special providence!

THANKSGIVING.

You know we hav a custom every year of issuing a proclamation of thanksgiving. We say to God, "Although you hav afflicted all the other countries, although you hav sent war, and desolation, and famin on everybody else, we hav been such good children that you hav been kind to us, and we hope you will keep on." It don't make a bit of difference whether we hav good times or not—not a bit; the thanksgiving is always exactly the same. I remember a few years ago a governor of Iowa got out a proclamation of that kind. He went on to tell how thankful the people were, how prosperous the state had been; and there was a young fellow in that state who got out another proclamation saying: Fearing that the Lord might be misled by official correspondence, he went on to say that the governor's proclamation was entirely false; that the state was not prosperous; that the crops had been an almost entire failure; that nearly every farm in the state was mortgaged; that if the Lord did not believe him, all he asked: He would send some angel in whom he had confidence, to look the matter over for himself.

Of course I hav not time to recount the enemies of the church. Every fact is an enemy of superstition. Every fact is a heretic. Every demonstration is an Infidel. Everything that ever happened testified against the supernatural.

I hav only spoken of a few of the blows that shattered the shield and shivered the lance of superstition. Here is another one—the doctrin of Charles Darwin. This century will be called Darwin's century, one of the greatest men who ever touched this globe. He has explained more of the phenomena of life than all of the religious teachers. Write the name of Charles Darwin there (on the one hand) and the name of every theologian that ever lived there (on the other hand), and from that name has come more light to the world than from all those. His doctrin of evolution, his doctrin of the survival of the fittest, his doctrin of the origin of species, has removed in every thinking mind the last vestige of orthodox Christianity. He has not only stated but he has demonstrated that the inspired writer knew nothing of this world, nothing of the origin of man, nothing of geology, nothing of astronomy, nothing of nature; that the Bible is a book written by ignorance—by the instigation of fear! Think of the men who replied to him. Only a few years ago there was no parson too ignorant to successfully answer Charles Darwin; and the more ignorant he was the more cheerfully he undertook the task. He was held up to the ridicule, the scorn, and the contempt of the Christian world, and yet, when he died, England was proud to put his dust with that of her noblest and her grandest. Charles Darwin conquered the intellectual world, and the doctrin of evolution is now an accepted fact. His light has broken in on some of the early clergy and the greatest man who to-day occupies the pulpit is a believer in the evolution theory of Charles Darwin—and that is Henry Ward Beecher—a man of more brains than the entire clergy of that entire church put together. And yet we are told in this little creed that orthodox religion is about to conquer the world. It will be driven to the wilds of Africa. It must go to some savage country; it has lost its hold upon civilization, and I tell you it is unfortunate to hav a religion that cannot be accepted by the intellect of a nation. It is unfortunate to hav a religion against which every good and noble heart protests. Let us hav a good one or none. Oh! my pity has been excited by seeing these ministers endeavor to warp and twist the passages of scripture to fit some demonstration in science.

These pious evasions! These solemn pretenses! When they are caught in one way they giv a different meaning to the words and say the world was not made in six days. They say, "good whiles"—epochs. And in this same confession here of faith and creeds they believe the Lord's day is holy—every seventh day. Suppose you lived near the North Pole where the day is three months long. Then which day will you keep? Suppose you could get to the North Pole you could prevent Sunday from ever overtaking you. You could walk around the other way faster than the world could revolve. How would you keep Sunday then? Suppose we ever invent anything that can go 1,000 miles an hour? We can just chase Sunday clear around the globe. Is there anything that can be more perfectly absurd than that a space of time can be holy! You might as well talk about a pious vacuum. These pious evasions I heard the other night from an old man. He was not very well educated, you know, and he got into the notion that he must hav reading of the Bible and hav family worship; and there was a bad boy in the family—a pretty smart boy—and they were reading the Bible by course, and in the fifteenth of Corinthians is this passage: "Behold, brethren, I show you a mystery; we shall not all die, but we shall be changed." And this boy rubbed out the c in the "changed." So the next night the old man got on his specs and got down his Bible and said: "Behold, brethren, I show you a mystery; we shall not all die, but we shall be hanged." The old lady said, "Father, I don't think it reads that way." He says, "Who is reading this? Yes, mother, it says be hanged, and, more than that, I see the sense of it. Pride is the besetting sin of the human heart, and if there is anything calculated to take the pride out of a man it is hanging."

I keep going back to this book; I keep going back to the miracles, to the prophecies, to the fables, and people ask me if I take away the Bible what are we going to do? How can we get along without the revelation that no one understands? What are we going to do if we hav no Bible to quarrel about? What are we to do without hell? What are we going to do with our enemies? What are we going to do with the people we love but don't like? They tell me that there never would hav been any civilization if it had not been for this Bible. Um! The Jews had a Bible; the Romans had not. Which had the greater and the grander government? Let us be honest. Which of those nations produced the greatest poets, the greatest soldiers, the greatest orators, the greatest statesmen, the greatest sculptors? Rome had no Bible. God cared nothing for the Roman empire. He let the men come up by chance. His time was taken up by the Jewish people. And yet Rome conquered the world, and even conquered God's chosen people. The people that had the Bible were defeated by the people who had not. How was it possible for Lucretius to get along without the Bible? How did the great and glorious of that empire get along without it? And what shall we say of Greece? No Bible. Compare Athens with Jerusalem. From Athens comes the beauty and intellectual grace of the world. Compare the mythology of Greece with the mythology of Judea. One covering the earth with beauty and the other filling heaven with hatred and injustice. The Hindoos had no Bible; they had been forsaken by the creator, and yet they became the greatest metaphysicians of the world. Egypt had no Bible. Compare even Egypt with Judea. What are we to do without the Bible? What became of the Jews who had the Bible? Their temple was destroyed and their city was taken; and, as I said before, they never found real prosperity until their God deserted them. Now I come again to the New Testament. There are a few things in there, I giv you my word, I cannot believe I cannot believe in the miraculous origin of Jesus Christ. I believe he was the son of Joseph and Mary; that Joseph and Mary had been duly and legally married, that he was the legitimate offspring of that marriage, and nobody ever believed the contrary until he had been dead one hundred and fifty years. Neither Matthew, Mark, nor Luke ever dreamed that he was of divine origin. He did not say to either Matthew, Mark, or Luke, or to any one in their hearing, that he was the son of God, or that he was miraculously conceived. He did not say it. The angel Gabriel, who, they say, brought the news, never wrote a word upon the subject. His mother never wrote a word upon the subject. His father never wrote a word upon the subject. We are lacking in the matter of witnesses. I would not believe it now; I cannot believe it then. I would not believe people I know, much less would I believe people I don't know. I say that at that time Matthew, Mark, and Luke believed that he was the son of Joseph and Mary. And why? They say he descended from the blood of David, and in order to show that he was of the blood of David they gave the genealogy of Joseph. And if Joseph was not his father, why not giv the genealogy of Pontius Pilate or of Herod. Could they, by giving the genealogy of Joseph, show that he was of the blood of David if Joseph was in no way related to David: and yet that is the position into which the Christian world is now driven. It says the son of Joseph, and then interpolated the words "as was supposed." Why then do they giv a supposed genealogy. It will not do. And that is a thing that cannot in any way by any human testimony be established; and if it is important for us to know that he was the son of God I say then that it devolves upon God to giv us evidence. Let him write it across the face of the heavens, in every language of mankind. If it is necessary for us to believe it let it grow on every leaf next year. No man should be damned for not believing unless the evidence is overwhelming. And he ought not to be made to depend upon say so. He should hav it directly for himself. A man says God told him so and so, and he tells me, and I havn't any one's word but that fellow's. He may hav been deceived. If God has a message for me he ought to tell it to me, and not to somebody that has been dead 4,000 or 5,000 years, and in another language. God may hav changed his mind on many things; he has on slavery at least, and polygamy; and yet his church now wants to go out here and destroy polygamy in Utah with the sword. Why don't they send missionaries there with copies of the Old Testament? By reading the lives of Abraham, and Isaac, and Lot, and a few other fellows that ought to hav been in the penitentiary, they can soften their hearts.

CHRIST'S MIRACLES.

Now, there is another miracle I do not believe. I want to speak about it as we would about any ordinary transaction in the world. In the first place, I do not believe that any miracle was ever performed, and if there was you can't prove it. Why? Because it is altogether more reasonable that the people lied about it than that it happened. And why? Because according to human experience we know that people will not always tell the truth, and we never saw a miracle, and we hav got to be governed by our experience, and if we go by our experience it is in favor that the thing never happened; that the man is mistaken. Now, I want you to remember it. Here is a man that comes into Jerusalem, and the first thing he does he cures the blind. He lets the light of day visit the darkness of blindness. The eyes are opened and the whole world is again pictured upon the brain. Another man is clothed with leprosy. He touches him and the disease falls from him, and he stands pure and clean, and whole. Another man is deformed, wrinkled, bent. He touches him and throws upon him again the garment of youth. A man is in his grave, and he says, "Come forth!" And he again walks in life, feeling his heart throb and beat, and his blood going joyously through his veins. They say that happened. I don't know. There is one wonderful thing about the dead people that were raised—we don't hear of them any more. What became of them? Why, if there was a man in this town that had been raised from the dead I would go to see him to-night. I would say, "Where were you when you got the notice to come back? What kind of country is it? What kind of opening is there for a young man? How did you like it?" But nobody ever paid the slightest attention to them there. They didn't even excite interest when they died the second time. Nobody said, "Why, that man isn't afraid. He has been there." Not a word. They pass away quietly. You see I don't believe it. There is something wrong somewhere about that business. And then there is another trouble in my mind. Now you know I may suffer eternal punishment for all this.

Here is a man that does all these things, and thereupon they crucify him. Now, then, let us be honest. Suppose a man came into Chigago and he should meet a funeral procession, and he should say, "Who is dead?" and they should say, "The son of a widow; her only support," and he should say to the procession, "Halt!" And to the undertaker, "Take out that coffin, unscrew that lid." "Young man, I say unto thee, arise!" And the latter should step from the coffin and in one moment after hold his mother in his arms. Suppose he should go to your cemetery and should find some woman holding a little child in each hand, while the tears fell upon a new-made grave, and he should say to her, "Who lies buried here?" and she should reply, "My husband," and he should say, "I say unto thee, O grave, giv up thy dead!" and the husband should rise and in a moment after hav his lips upon his wife's and the little children with their arms around his neck. Suppose that it is so. Do you think that the people of Chicago would kill him? Do you think anyone would wish to crucify him? Do you not rather believe that everyone who had a loved one out in that cemetery would go to him even upon their knees and beg him and implore him to giv back their dead? Do you believe that any man was ever crucified who was the master of death? Let me tell you to-night if there shall ever appear upon this earth the master, the monarch of death, all human knees will touch the earth; he will not be crucified; he will not be touched. All the living who fear death; all the living who hav lost a loved one will stand and cling to him. And yet we are told that this worker of miracles, this worker of wonders, this man who could clothe the dead in the throbbing flesh of life, was crucified by the Jewish people. It was never dreamed that he did a miracle until one hundred years after he was dead.

THE RESURRECTION.

There is another miracle I do not believe—I cannot believe it—and that is the resurrection. And why? If it was the fact, if the dead got out of the grave, why did he not show himself to his enemies? Why did he not again visit Pontius Pilate? Why did he not call upon Caiaphas, the high priest? Why did he not make another triumphal entry into Jerusalem? Why did he not again enter the temple and dispute with the doctors? Why didn't he say to the multitude, "Here are the wounds in my feet, and in my hands, and in my side. I am the one you endeavored to kill, but death is my slave?" Why didn t he? Simply because the thing never happened. I can not believe it. But recollect, it makes no difference with his teachings. They are exactly as good whether he wrought miracles or not. Twice two are four; that needs no miracle. Twice two are five; a miracle would not help that. Christ's teachings are worth their effect upon the human race. It makes no difference about miracle or about wonder, but you must remember in that day everyone believed in miracles. Nobody had any standing as a teacher, a philosopher, a governor, or a king, about whom there was not something miraculous. The earth was then covered with the sons and daughters of the gods and goddesses. That was believed in Greece, in Rome, in Egypt, in Hindostan; everybody, nearly, believed in such things.

Then there is another miracle that I cannot believe in, and that is the ascension—the bodily ascension of Jesus Christ. Where was he going? Since the telescope has been pointed at the stars, where was he going? The new Jerusalem is not there. The abode of the gods is not there. Where was he going? Which way did he go? That depends upon the time of day that he left. If he left in the night he went exactly the opposit way from what he would in the day. Who saw this miracle? They say the disciples. Let us see what they say about it. Matthew did not think it was worth mentioning. He doesn't speak of it at all. On the contrary he says that the last words of Christ were: "Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world." That is what he says. Mark, he saw it. "So, then, after the Lord had spoken unto them he was received up into heaven and sat on the right hand of God." That is all he has to say about the most wonderful thing that ever blessed human vision—about a miracle great enough to hav stuffed credulity to bursting; and yet we hav one poor, little meager verse. So, then, after he had quit speaking, he was caught up and sat on the right hand of God. How does he know he was on the right hand? Did he see him after he had sat down? Luke says: "And it came to pass while he blessed them he was parted from them and was carried up into heaven." But John does not mention it. He givs as his last words this address to Peter: "Follow thou me." Of course he did not say that as he ascended. In the Acts we hav another account. A conversation is given not spoken of in any of the others, and we find there two men clad in white apparel, who said: "Men of Galilee, why stand ye here gazing up into heaven? This same Jesus that was taken up into heaven shall so come in like manner as ye hav seen him go into heaven." Matthew didn't see that; Mark forgot it; Luke didn't think it was worth mentioning, and John didn't believe it, and yet upon that evidence we are led to believe that the most miraculous of all miracles actually occurred. I cannot believe it.

CASTING OUT FITS.

I may be mistaken, but the church is now trying to parry, and when they come to the little miracles of the New Testament all they say is, "Christ didn t cast out devils; these men had fits." He cured fits. Then I read in another place about the fits talking. Christ held a dialog with the fits, and the fits told him his name, and the fits at that time were in a crazy man. And the fits made a contract that they would go out of the man provided they would be permitted to go into swine. How can fits that attack a man take up a residence in swine? The church must not giv up the devil. He is the right bower. No devil, no hell; no hell, no preach; no fire, no insurance. I read another miracle, that this devil took Christ and put him on the pinnacle of a temple. Was that fits, too? Why is not the theological world honest? Why do they not come up and admit what they know the book means? They hav not the courage.

NECESSITY OF BELIEF.

Now, their next doctrin is the absolute necessity of belief. That depends upon this: Can a man believe as he wants to? Can you? Can anybody? Does belief depend at all upon the evidence? I think it does somewhat in some cases. How is it that when a jury is sworn to try a case, hearing all the evidence, hearing both sides, hearing the charge of the judge, hearing the law, and upon their oaths equally divided, six for the plaintiff and six for the defendant? It is because evidence does not hav the same effect on all people. Why? Our brains are not alike—not the same shape; we hav not the same intelligence or the same experience, the same sense. And yet I am held accountable for my belief. I must believe in the trinity—three times one is one, once one is three—and my soul is to be eternally damned for failing to guess an arithmetical conundrum. And that is the poison part of Christianity—that salvation depends upon belief—that is the poison part, and until that dogma is discarded, religion will be nothing but superstition. No man can control his belief. If I hear certain evidence I will believe a certain thing. If I fail to hear it I may never believe it. If it is adapted to my mind I may accept it; if it is not I reject it. And what am I to go by? My brain. That is the only light I hav from Nature, and if there be a God it is the only torch that this God has given me by which to find my way through the dark and the night called life. I do not depend upon hearsay for that. I do not hav to take the word of any other man nor get upon my knees before a book. Here in the temple of the mind I go and consult the god—that is to say, my reason—and the oracle speaks to me, and I obey the oracle. What should I obey? Another man's oracle? Shall I take another man's word, and not what he thinks, but what some God said to him?

WOULDN'T KNOW A GOD.

I would not know a god if I should see one. I hav said before, and I say again, the brain thinks in spite of me, and I am not responsible for my thought. No more can I control the beating of my heart, the expansion and contraction of my lungs for a moment; no more can I stop the blood that flows through the rivers of the veins. And yet I am held responsible for my belief. Then why does not the god giv me the evidence? They say he has? In what? In an inspired book. But I do not understand it as they do. Must I be false to my understanding? They say, "When you come to die you will be sorry if you did not." Will I be sorry when I come to die that I did not liv a hypocrit? Will I be sorry I did not say I was a Christian when I was not? Will the fact that I was honest put a thorn in the pillow of death? God cannot forgiv me for that. They say that when he was in Jerusalem he forgave his murderers. Now he won't forgiv an honest man for differing with him on the subject of the trinity. They say that God says to me, "Forgiv your enemies." I say, "All right; I do," but he says, "I will damn mine." God should be consistent. If he wants me to forgiv my enemies, he should forgiv his. I am asked to forgiv enemies who can hurt me. God is only asked to forgiv enemies who cannot hurt him. He certainly ought to be as generous as he asks us to be. And I want no God to forgiv me unless I am willing to forgiv others and unless I do forgiv others. All I ask if that be true is that this God should liv according to his own doctrin. If I am to forgiv my enemies I ask him to forgiv his. That is justice, that is right. Here are these millions to-day who say, "We are to be saved by belief, by faith;" but what are we to believe?

HE HAS BEEN IN ST. LOUIS.

In St. Louis last Sunday I read an interview with a Christian minister, one who is now holding a revival. They call him the boy preacher—a name that he has borne for fifty or sixty years. The question was whether in these revivals, when they were trying to rescue souls from eternal torture, they would allow colored people to occupy seats with white people, and that revivalist, preaching the unsearchable richness of Christ, said he would not allow the colored people to sit with white people; they must go to the back of the church. The same people go and sit right next to them in heaven, swap harps with them; and yet this man, believing, as he says he does, that if he did not believe in the Lord Jesus Christ he would eternally perish, was not willing that the colored man should sit by a white man while he heard the gospel of everlasting peace. He was not willing that the colored man should get into the life-boat of Christ, although there was plenty of room; he would not let them get into the boat with white men, although those white men might be totally depraved, and if they had justice done them, according to his doctrin, would be eternally damned—and yet he has the impudence to put on airs, although he ought to be eternally damned, and go and sit by the colored man. His doctrin of religion, the color-line, has not my respect. I believe in the religion of humanity, and it is far better to love our fellowmen that to love God, because we can help them, and we cannot help him. You had better do what you can than to be always pretending to do what you cannot.

ETERNAL PUNISHMENT.

Now I come to the last part of this Bible—this creed—and that is, eternal punishment, and I hav concluded; and I hav said I will never deliver a lecture that I do not giv the full benefit of its name. That part of the Congregational creed would disgrace the lowest savage that crouches and crawls in the jungles of Africa. The man who now, in the nineteenth century, preaches the doctrin of eternal punishment, the doctrin of eternal hell, has lived in vain. Think of that doctrin! The eternity of punishment! Why, I find in that same creed that Christ is finally going to triumph in this world and establish his kingdom; but if their doctrin is true he will never triumph in the other world. He will hav billions in hell forever. In this world we never will be perfectly civilized as long as a gallows casts its shadow upon the earth. As long as there is a penitentiary behind the walls of which a human being is immured, we are not a civilized people. We will never be perfectly civilized until we do away with crime and criminals. And yet according to this Christian religion God is to hav an eternal penitentiary; he is to be an everlasting jailor, an everlasting turnkey, a warden of an infinit dungeon, and he is going to keep prisoners there, not for the purpose of reforming them—because they are never going to get any better, only getting worse—just for the purpose of punishing them. And what for? For something they did in this world; born in ignorance, educated it may be in poverty, and yet responsible through the countless ages of eternity. No man can think of a greater horror; no man can think of a greater absurdity. For the growth of that doctrin ignorance was soil and fear was rain. That doctrin came from the fanged mouths of wild beasts, and yet it is the "glad tidings of great joy."

GREAT AND GOOD MEN IN HELL.

"God so loved the world" he is going to damn most everybody, and, if this Christian religion be true, some of the greatest, and grandest, and best who ever lived upon this earth are suffering its torments to-night. It don't appear to make much difference, however, with this church. They go right on enjoying themselvs as well as ever. If their doctrin is true, Benjamin Franklin, one of the wisest and best of men, who did so much to giv us here a free government, is suffering the tyranny of God to-night, while he endeavored to establish freedom among men. If the churches were honest their preachers would tell their hearers: "Benjamin Franklin is in hell, and we warn any and all the youth not to imitate Benjamin Franklin. Thomas Jefferson, the author of the Declaration of Independence, with its self-evident truths, has been damned these many years." That is what all the ministers ought to hav the courage to say. Talk as you believe. Stand by your creed or change it. I want to impress it upon your mind, because the thing I wish to do in this world is to put out the fires of hell. I want to keep at it just as long as there is one little coal red in the bottomless pit. As long as the ashes are warm I shall denounce this infamous doctrin. I want you to know that the men who founded this great and glorious government are there. The most of the men who fought in the Revolutionary war and wrested from the clutch of Great Britain this continent hav been rewarded by the eternal wrath of God. The old Revolutionary soldiers are in hell by the thousands. Let the preachers hav the courage to say so. The men who fought in 1812 and gave to the United States the freedom of the seas, nearly all of them hav been damned since 1815—all that were killed. The greatest of heroes, they are there. The greatest of poets, the greatest scientist, the men who hav made the world beautiful and grand, they are all, I tell you, among the damned if this creed is true. Humboldt, who shed light, and who added to the intellectual wealth of mankind; Goethe, and Schiller, and Lessing, who almost created the German language—all gone! All suffering the wrath of God to-night, and every time an angel thinks of one of those men he givs his harp an extra twang. Laplace, who read the heavens like an open book—he is there. Robert Burns, the poet of human love—he is there because he wrote the "Prayer of Holy Willie;" because he fastened upon the cross the Presbyterian creed, and made it a lingering crucifixion. And yet that man added to the tenderness of the human heart. Dickens, who put a shield of pity before the flesh of childhood—God is getting even with him. Our own Ralph Waldo Emerson, although he had a thousand opportunities to hear Methodist clergymen, scorned the means of grace, and the Holy Ghost is delighted that he is in hell to-night.

Longfellow refined hundreds and thousands of homes, but he did not believe in the miraculous origin of the savior. No, sir; he doubted the report of Gabriel. He loved his fellowmen; he did what he could to free the slaves; he did what he could to make mankind happy; but God was just waiting for him. He had his constable right there. Thomas Paine, the author of the "Rights of Man," offering his life in both hemispheres for the freedom of the human race, and one of the founders of the republic—it has often seemed to me that if we could get God's attention long enough to point him to the American flag, he would let him out. Comte, the author of the "Positiv Philosophy," who loved his fellow-men to that degree that he made of humanity a god, who wrote his great work in poverty, with his face covered with tears—they are getting their revenge on him now. Voltaire, who abolished torture in France; who did more for human liberty than any other man, living or dead, who was the assassin of superstition, and whose dagger still rusts in the heart of Catholicism—all the priests who hav been translated hav their happiness increased by looking at Voltaire. Glorious country, where the principal occupation is watching the miseries of the lost! Giordani Bruno, Benedict Spinoza, Diderot, the encyclopedist, who endeavored to get all knowledge in a small compass so that he could put the peasant on an equality with the prince, intellectually, the man who wished to sow all over the world the seeds of knowledge; who loved to labor for mankind While the priests wanted to burn, he did all he could to put out the fire—he has been lost long, long ago. His cry for water has become so common that his voice is now recognized through all the realms of hell, and they say to one another, "That is Diderot" David Hume, the philosopher, he is there with the rest. Beethoven, the Shakspere of music, he has been lost; and Wagner, the master of melody, and who has made the air of this world rich forever, he is there, and they hav better music in hell than in heaven. Shelley, whose soul, like his own Skylark, was a winged joy—he has been damned for many, many years; and Shakspere, the greatest of the human race, who has done more to elevate mankind than all the priests who ever lived and died, he is there; and all the founders of inquisitions, the builders of dungeons, the makers of chains, the inventors of instruments of torture, tearers and burners and branders of human flesh, stealers of babes and sellers of husbands and wives and children, the drawers of the swords of persecution, and they who kept the horizon lurid with the fagots flame for a thousand years—they are in heaven to-night. Well, I wish heaven joy in such company.

OBJECTIONS TO FAITH.

And that is the doctrin with which we are polluting the souls of children. That is the doctrin that puts a fiend by their dying bed and a prophecy of hell over every cradle. That is "glad tidings of great joy." Only a little while ago, when the great flood came upon the Ohio, sent by him who is ruling in the world and paying particular attention to the affairs of nations, just in the gray of the morning they saw a house floating down, and on its top a human being; and a few men went out to the rescue in a little boat, and they found there a mother, a woman, and they wanted to rescue her, and she said: "No; I am going to stay where I am. I hav three dead babes in this house." Think of a love so limitless, stronger and deeper than despair and death, and yet the Christian religion says that if that woman did not happen to believe in their creed, God would send that mother's soul to eternal fire. If there is another world, and if in heaven they wear hats, when such a woman climbs up the opposit bank of the Jordan, Christ should lift his to her.

MISSIONARIES.

That is the trouble I had with this Christian religion, its infinit heartlessness; and I cannot tell them too often that during our last war Christians who knew that if they were shot they would go right to heaven went and hired wicked men to take their places, perfectly willing the men should go to hell provided they could stay at home. You see they are not honest in it, they do not believe it, or, as the people say, "they don't sense it," they hav not religion enough to conceive what it is they believe and what a terrific falsehood they assert. And I beg of every one who hears me to-night, I beg, I implore, I beseech you never giv another dollar to build a church in which that lie is preached. Never giv another cent to send a missionary with his mouth stuffed with that falsehood to a foreign land. Why, they say, the heathen will go to heaven any way if you let them alone; what is the use of sending them to hell by enlightening them? Let them alone. The idea of going and telling a man a thing that if he does not believe he will be damned, when the chances are ten to one that he won't believe it. Don't tell him, and as quick as he gets to the other world and finds it is necessary to believe he will say "yes." Giv him a chance. My objection to the Christian religion is that it destroys human love, and tells you and me that the love of your dear ones is not necessary in this world to make a heaven in the next. No matter about your wife, your children, your brother, your sister—no matter about all the affections of the human heart—when you get there you will be along with the angels. I don't know whether I would like the angels? I don't know whether the angels would like me. I would rather stand by the folks who hav loved me and whom I know; and I can conceive of no heaven without the loved of this earth. That is the trouble with this Christian religion; leave your father, leave your mother, leave your wife, leave your children, leave everything and follow Jesus Christ. I will not. I will stay with the folks I will not sacrifice on the altar of a selfish fear all the grandest and noblest promptings of my heart. You do away with human love, and what are we without it? What would we be in another world, and what would we be here without it? Can any one conceive of music without human love? Human love builds every home—human love is the author of all the beauty in this world. Love paints every picture, and chisels every statue; love, I tell you, builds every fireside. What could heaven be without love? And yet that is what we are promised—a heaven with your wife lost, your mother lost, some of your children gone. And you expect to be made happy by falling in with some angel. Such a religion is demoralizing.

And how are you to get there? On the efforts of another. You are to be perpetually a heavenly pauper, and you will hav to admit through all eternity that you never would hav got there if you hadn't got frightened. "I am here," you will say, "I hav these wings, I hav this musical instrument, because I was scared." What a glorious world! And then think of it—no reformation in the next world—not the slightest. If you die in Arkansas, that is the end of you. At the end you will be told that, being born in Arkansas, you had a fair chance. Think of telling a boy in the next world, who lived and died in Delaware, that he had a fair show! Can anything be more infamous? All on an equality—the rich and the poor, those with parents loving them, those with every opportunity for education, on an equality with the poor, the abject, and the ignorant—and this little ray called life, this little moment with a shadow and a tear, this little space between your mother's arms and the grave, that balances an entire eternity. And God can do nothing for you when you get there. A little Methodist preacher can do more for the soul here than its creator can when you get there. The soul goes to heaven, where there is nothing but good society; no bad examples; and they are all there, father, son, and holy ghost, and yet they can do nothing for that poor unfortunate except to damn him. Is there any sense in that? Why should this be a period of probation? It says in the Bible, I believe, "Now is the accepted time." When does that mean? That means whenever the passage is pronounced. Now is the accepted time. It will be the same to-morrow, won't it? And just as appropriate then as to-day, and, if appropriate at any time, appropriate through all eternity. What I say is this: There is no world—there can be no world—in which every human being will not hav an opportunity of doing right. That is my objection to this Christian religion, and if the love of earth is not the love of heaven, if those who love us here are to be separated there, then I want eternal sleep. Giv me a good cold grave rather than the furnace of Jehovah's wrath. Gabriel, don't blow! Let me alone! If, when the grave bursts, I am not to meet the faces that hav been my sunshine in this life, let me sleep on. Rather than that the doctrin of endless punishment should be true, I would like to see the fabric of our civilization crumble and fall to unmeaning chaos and to formless dust, where oblivion broods and where even memory forgets. I would rather a Samson of some imprisoned force released by chance should so wreck and strain the mighty world that man, in stress and strain of want and fear, should shudderingly crawl back to savage and barbaric night; I would rather that every planet would in its orbit wheel a barren star, than that the Christian religion should be true.

WHAT HE BELIEVES.

I think it is better to love your children than to love God, a thousand times better, because you can help them, and I am inclined to think that God can get along without you. I believe in the religion of the family. I believe that the roof-tree is sacred from the smallest fiber held in the soft, moist clasp of the earth to the little blossom on the topmost bough that givs its fragrance to the happy air. The family where virtue dwells with love is like a lily with a heart of fire—the fairest flower in all this world. And I tell you God cannot afford to damn a man in the next world who has made a happy family in this. God cannot afford to cast over the battlements of heaven the man who has built a happy home here. God cannot afford to be unpitying to a human heart capable of pity. God cannot clothe with fire the man who has clothed the naked here; and God cannot send to eternal pain a man who has done something toward improving the condition of his fellow-man. If he can I had rather go to hell than to heaven and keep the company of such a God.

They tell me the next terrible thing I do is to take the hope of immortality; I do not, I would not, I could not. Immortality was first dreamed of by human love, and yet the church is going to take human love out of immortality. We love, therefore we wish to liv. A loved one dies and we wish to meet again, and from the affection of the human heart grew the great oak of the hope of immortality. And around that oak has climbed the poisonous vine superstition. Theologians, pretenders, soothsayers, parsons, priests, popes, bishops hav taken all that hope, and they hav had the impudence to stand by the grave and prophesy a future of pain. They hav erected their toll-gates on the highway to the other world and hav collected money from the poor people on the way, and they hav collected it from their fear. The church did not giv us the idea of immortality, the Bible did not giv us the idea of immortality; let me tell you now the Old Testament tells you how you lost immortality; it does not say a word about another world from the first mistake in Genesis to the last curse in Malachi. There is not in the Old Testament one burial service.

No man in the Old Testament stands by the dead and says, "I will meet them again"—not one word. From the top of Sinai came no hope of another world. And when we get to the New Testament, what do we find there? "Hav thy heart counted worthy to obtain that world and the resurrection of the dead." As though some would be counted unworthy to obtain the resurrection of the dead. And in another place: "Seek for honor, glory, immortality." If you hav got it, why seek for it. And in another place: "God, who alone hath immortality," and yet they tell us that we get our idea of immortality from the Bible. I deny it. If Christ was in fact God, why didn't he plainly say there was another life. Why didn't he tell us something about it? Why didn't he turn the tear-stained hope of immortality into the glad knowledge of another life?

Why did he go dumbly to his death and leave the world in darkness and in doubt? Why? Because he was a man and didn't know. I would not destroy the smallest star of human hope, but I deny that we got our idea of immortality from the Bible. It existed long before Moses existed. We find it symbolized through all Egypt, through all India. Wherever man has lived his religion has another world in which to meet the lost. It is not born of the Bible. The idea of immortality, like the great sea, has ebbed and flowed in the human heart, beating with its countless waves against the rocks and sands of fate and time. It was not born of the Bible. It was born of the human heart, and it will continue to ebb and flow beneath the mists and clouds of doubt and darkness as long as love kisses the lips of death. We do not know. We do not prophesy a life of pain. We leave the dead with nature, the mother of us all, under a seven-hued bow of hope. Under the seven-hued arch let the dead sleep. "Ah, but you take the consolation of religion." What consolation has religion for the widow of the unbeliever, the widow of a good, brave, kind man who lies dead? What can the orthodox ministers say to relieve the bursting heart of that woman? What can the orthodox ministers say to relieve the aching hearts of the little orphans as they kneel by the grave of that father, if that father didn't happen to be an orthodox Christian? What consolation hav they? I find that when a Christian loses a friend the tears spring from his eyes as quickly as from the eyes of others. Their tears are as bitter as ours. Why? The echo of the promises spoken eighteen hundred years ago is so low, and the sound of the clods upon the coffin so loud, the promises are so far away, and the dead are so near. That is the reason. And they find no consolation there. I say honestly we do not know; we cannot say. We cannot say whether death is a wall or a door; the beginning or end of a day; the spreading of pinions to soar, or the folding forever of wings; whether it is the rising or the setting of a sun, or an endless life that brings rapture and love to every one—we do not know; we cannot say.

AN OLD FABLE.

There is an old fable of Orpheus and Eurydice: Eurydice had been captured and taken to the infernal regions, and Orpheus went after her, taking with him his harp and playing as he went; and when he came to the infernal regions he began to play, and Sisyphus sat down upon the stone that he had been heaving up the side of the mountain for so many years, and which continually rolled back upon him; Ixion paused upon his wheel of fire; Tantalus ceased in his vain efforts for water; the daughters of Danaides left off trying to fill their seives with water; Pluto smiled, and for the first time in the history of hell the cheeks of the Furies were wet with tears; monsters relented and they said, "Eurydice may go with you, but you must not look back." So he again threaded the caverns, playing as he went, and as he again reached the light he failed to hear the footsteps of Eurydice, and he looked back and in a moment she was gone. This old fable givs to us the idea of the perpetual effort to rescue truth from the clutches of monsters. Some time Orpheus will not look back. Some day Eurydice will reach the blessed light, and at some time there will fade from the memory of men the superstition of religion.

Felix Adler and King Christern.

In his concluding lecture on "Tenement-House Reform," on Sunday last, Felix Adler was speaking of governmental aid. He said people had a sentiment of aversion to it, which was a reaction in consequence of the intermeddling of governments in times past with things in which they had no right to interfere. Among other interferences he mentioned a decree of King Christern, of Denmark, which prescribed how often the floors of houses should be swept and the tables scrubbed. Now, when we take into consideration that in those days cleanliness was by no means an ordinary virtue, that floors were of earth or stone, and strewn with straw or rushes, in which dirt and vermin accumulated; that table-cloths were unknown, and plates were flat cakes of bread on which the meat was placed, and both bread and meat eaten with the fingers, it is not at all surprising, but very much to the credit of King Christern, that he looked after the ethics of his subjects, just as Dr. Adler is now looking after the ethics of the poor, and decided that the amount of filth endured by his people was prolific of evil, and that he would endeavor to lessen it. King Christern was the forerunner of Dr. Adler in the belief that cleanliness must precede godliness, and that government should aim at the moral as well as the physical interests of the body politic.

CHAPTER XXII.

THE LAW, AND NOT THE GOSPEL.

The next day dawned brilliantly, and preparations were made for the great legal contest over the possession of little Bessie. The Stars and Stripes floated placidly upon the winds, as if they felt that no such huge injustice as the surrender of "this property" could take place under their generous folds.

Bolton was in a somewhat battered condition, for Cupples hit him hard; but he was keen and self-reliant.

"I only want my rights," said he, "under the Constitution. This will be a good example, and perhaps the harbinger of peace."

"There is no question of your right, master," said Sandy, with a truly devotional attitude. "This child is yours, and now it is providentially put into your hands."

Sandy, being too lazy to work, had been educated to be a Methodist minister among the slaves, having a very ready tongue; but he found it much more profitable to be the private secretary of his master. The survival, however, of his theological education will be noted in the style of his language.

"There's no way out of it," said Bolton. "They've sworn to support the Union, and the Union guarantees the protection of slave property. They can't deny the ownership, and hence my demand must be granted."

"Legally, he's got us," said Billy Stubbs to Cupples and his crowd. "If we appeal to the Constitution we are in a damned mess. We must stick to common sense and eternal justice, and I believe in a time like this they'll carry the day, though I have my fears of Col. Billy Potter. He's an old army officer, and believes in rules and regulations. He's a martinet—brave as a lion, but as petty in his ideas of government as a French cook. If he decides against us, I don't know what to do, for his will is the power just now. However, I'll try my eloquence."

Col. William Potter, the commander, was just such a soldier as Stubbs depicted. In law he knew nothing beyond precedent. It was impossible for him to appeal to simple common sense, and as for abstract justice, that was something entirely beyond his comprehension.

"We are fighting for the Union," said he, "exactly as it is, and I don't propose to change any of its laws. The sacred right of property must be maintained. Is this child your slave?" said he to Bolton.

"I can prove it easily enough. She is the daughter of Amy Bolton, now living in E——. This child was born to her while in my possession. They escaped a year ago, and I have been unable to reclaim them. Cupples will not deny these facts."

Of course Cupples could not deny them, and so far as the identity of the child was concerned, there could be no question.

"That settles it," said Col. Potter. "She was your property at the time of her birth by the laws of Kentucky. Has anything happened to change that status?"

"I claim there has," said Stubbs. "Col. Bolton is a rebel, and therefore whatever rights he might have had are forfeited."

"I beg your pardon," said Bolton, graciously; "I am not a rebel; I have not yet struck a blow. I am simply waiting to see. In the eyes of the law I am a citizen."

"Are you willing to swear loyalty to the Constitution?" said Stubbs.

"Certainly I am, as I understand it; I am not fighting against the Constitution, only against those who would deprive me of my rights.

"Col. Bolton is right there," said Potter. "No overt act is yet committed, and he is a citizen in good and regular standing. I see no bar to his appeal."

"Do you purpose then," said Stubbs, "to give this little child into his possession?"

"How can I help it? Doesn't the law say I must?"

"The law be damned," said Stubbs. "What does common sense say."

"Common sense has nothing to do with it unless it is law. I have no right to make a law. I must obey it."

"I say you have a right," cried Stubbs. "It's all nonsense to declare that we must obey what's on the books. That's Shylock—give me my bond. Are statute books infallible? Of course not. There's a law behind them, the law of nature, which they help to interpret, and if they don't interpret, then they are false and foolish. The Declaration of Independence is before the Constitution, and we must go by that, and it declares that there are unalienable rights, and every law that violates these rights must be void."

"I never heard of such a thing," broke in Col. Potter. "A law is a law, and that's the end on't with me. Why, you are a worse rebel than Bolton. These are dangerously revolutionary principles."

Billy Stubbs was nonplussed. He saw that he was getting the wrong side of the commanding officer and was thereby endangering his cause. But he had got started and prudence was out of the question, and so he thundered forth:

"Dangerous principles? Everything that's valuable to the world has been dangerous sometime. The Revolution was dangerous, very dangerous. It was entirely opposed to precedent. It paid no regard to the law of the day. There is such a thing as unwritten justice; and to that we should always appeal. No written law ever yet was perfect. It's full of flaws. It oftentimes gives the rascal a vastly better chance than the decent man. Think of giving this little girl up to a fate worse than death, and that beneath the Stars and Stripes. It can't be done; it shan't be done. I know it's the law, but it's a curse for all that, a violation of everything for which we have come forth to fight. I've enlisted for justice and liberty, and so have all of us, and I'd rather do battle for this little girl than for all the constitutions and the laws in the universe; for if party or government exists for anything, it exists for just such a purpose, to see that not a single living soul, however small, is trampled upon. You can't resist this appeal of simple human reason. It would be idiotic and imfamous in this case to do what the mere letter of the law demands. Slavery is bound to shake to its very foundation the Union that we love—and yet in the name of that Union we are called upon to sacrifice this innocent girl to that hideous Moloch."

Everybody, of course, applauded this vigorous speech, but Bolton was still unabashed, and said:

"These are fine sentiments; but sentiment is not law. If law exists, it must be enacted. It is sacred. It is established by the wisdom of the ages. If we unloose from law we are all at sea. Slavery is constitutional. This girl is my property. I claim it. If you resist, where are the rights of property, and upon what can you depend? You don't like it, but our likes and dislikes are not to be the guide, but what is written in the book. This is the only safe way. Give me my rights under the law of the land."

"And then you'll go away and fight us like the devil," cried Stubbs.

"That remains to be seen. So far I have done nothing except talk; and it may all end in talk."

"It won't if this injustice is perpetrated. We'll rebel on the other side."

"Exactly so," cried Bolton. "You want to fight for your rights, and we will do the same. Grant what we ask and we'll give no trouble."

"And we be cowards and sneaks? I guess not," answered Stubbs.

"It's no use to keep up this talk," said Col. William Potter. "There is only one way to decide this, and that is according to law. That's plain enough. The child belongs to Col. Bolton, and it is my duty as a loyal officer of the government to surrender it, and I cheerfully do so. It may be hard for the little girl, but its good for the country. Col. Bolton, you can take the child. It is a pledge of our devotion to the Union."

"I thank you," said Bolton, with sardonic pleasantry. "If the whole North were like you, there'd be no use of fighting. I should like to borrow some shackles to put on this little girl, for she looks as if she might run away."

"You shall have them," said the commanding officer; and under the Stars and Stripes the shackles were put upon the little girl.

"I won't endure it," said Stubbs, and he advanced to strike Bolton to the ground.

"Arrest him, officer of the guard," said Col. Potter, firmly.

"Don't touch me," said Stubbs. "This is no child's play."

"Indeed it isn't," said Potter. "I'm in command. These soldiers must obey me, and I will shoot every one that dares to rebel. Let the troops fall in at once."

The drums beat, and almost as by instinct the brigade was formed.

Law and order were bound to prevail. Stubbs was too keen not to see it, and too much of a diplomat not to yield when he saw there was no hope in opposition. Col. Potter had not a particle of fear, and his iron will was backed up by an undaunted spirit. He would have had Stubbs arrested and shot in an hour if he had persisted in any attempt at rescue; and although every soldier was indignant, yet such was the force of custom that they submitted to the cruel act.

"It's no use," said Stubbs to Cupples. "I must back down. Common sense has a mighty poor show when law and order are on the other side. I must swallow my indignation and shout for the Union and fall in with the rest. Spite of all, we have to do as the world bids, be it ever so foolish or wrong. I wasn't born for a martyr, and so I'll shake hands with the powers that be."

"I won't," said Cupples. "Bessie shall not be taken away." He made a dash at Bolton and grasped Bessie in his arms. But what was the use? He was overwhelmed in a moment, flung bleeding upon the ground, manacled, and dragged to the guard-house.

Bolton and Sandy rode triumphantly away with Bessie in their possession. The white flag of truce went with them and melted in the twilight as they disappeared from view.

Scarcely were they gone, when deep thunders were heard far away. A dusty messenger came riding in. The long roll was sounded. Instantly the battalions were in motion. The tents were struck. A long night's march was before the excited troops. Cupples was released and fell in with his company. Ardently he longed for battle, that somehow he might escape the awful agony that racked him like a fever.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

Facts and Fallacies in Regard to the New Testament

When and where do saints obtain their reward?

There is no greater fallacy than the Christian faith and theory, alleged to be taught by the New Testament, that at death the immortal soul, the real person, goes to reward or punishment. Immortality of the soul is not taught either in the Old or New Testament.

We again call attention to the fact the word "soul," or rather the Hebrew and Greek from which it is translated, occurs in the Bible 873 times—768 times in the Old Testament, and 105 times in the New Testament.

The word rendered "spirit" occurs 827 times—442 times in the Old Testament, and 385 times in the New Testament.

Aggregate use of the words "soul" and "spirit" 1,700 times yet never once do we find either word qualified or preceded with the word "deathless," "immortal," or "never-dying." Why?

If Christian doctrin is true, why does the Bible, in 1,700 times, referring to soul or spirit, never once speak of immortal soul, immortal spirit, never-dying soul, never-dying spirit, or use any words that can possibly be construed to hav any such meaning? These terms abound in sermons, song and hymn-books, and exhortations, but are not found in any text in the Bible.

The Bible declares beasts hav the same soul and spirit as in men: "For that which befalleth the sons of men befalleth beasts; even one thing befalleth them; as the one dieth, so dieth the other: yea they hav all one breath, so that a man hath no pre-eminence above a beast, for all is vanity. All go unto one place, all are of the dust, and all turn to dust again. Who knoweth the spirit of man that goeth upward, and the spirit of the beast that goeth downward to the earth?" (Eccl. iii, 19–21.)

That the same "breath of life" is in all creatures is asserted in Genesis. "And they went in unto Noah, into the ark, two and two of all flesh wherein is the breath of life. And all flesh died that moved upon the earth, both of fowl, and of cattle, and of beast, and of every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth, and every man. All in whose nostrils was the *breath of life, of all that was in the dry land died" (Gen. vii, 21, 23).

(Translated from the Hebrew word N'shahmah, which occurs 24 times in the Old Testament, and is translated "breath," "wind," "life of man and animals," "mind," "intellect.")

Beasts and men hav the same soul. "And levy a tribute unto the Lord of the men of war which went out to battle one soul of five hundred, both of the persons, and of the beeves, and of the asses, and of sheep" (Num. xxxi, 28).

The Bible declares that the soul dies and goes into the grave. "Behold all souls are mine, as the soul of the father, so also the soul of the son is mine, the soul that sinneth it shall die" (Ezek. xviii, 4). "Let him know that he which converteth the sinner from the error of his way shall save a soul from death, and shall hide a multitude of sins" (James v, 20).

That death is cessation of thought, emotion, and existence is most positivly declared by the Bible, Old and New Testament alike. "For to him that is joined to all the living there is hope; for a living dog is better than a dead lion. For the living know that they shall die, but the dead know not anything. Also their love, and their hatred, and their envy is now perished" (Eccl. ix, 4–6).

Christians tell us their mind, their intelligence, their thoughts, comprise the immortal past, and can not perish. "His breath goeth forth, he returneth to his earth, in that very day his thoughts perish" (Psalms cxlvi, 4).

Christians claim the dead in heaven are praising the Lord, and denounce Liberals as impious wretches because they do not believe every word of God's holy and blessed Bible, in which we read, "The dead praise not the Lord, neither any that go down into silence" (Psalms cxv, 17).

In the thirty-eighth chapter of Isaiah we read of Hezekiah, who was sick unto death, and God sent him word to set his house in order, for he should die. Hezekiah was a most devout and pious man. He had walked before the Lord in truth, and with a perfect heart, and had done only that which was good in the sight of the Lord. If at death he would go to heaven and receive his crown, his little jewsharp, and rejoice in glory forevermore, surely he should rejoice. But the record says: "And Hezekiah wept sore. Then came the word of the Lord to Isaiah, saying, Go, and say to Hezekiah, Thus saith the Lord, the God of David, thy father, I hav seen thy tears: behold, I will add unto thy days fifteen years" (Isa. xxxviii, 3–5). How did Hezekiah regard being kept out of glory fifteen years?

*Margin, "The breath of the spirit of life."

"Behold for peace I had great bitterness; but thou hast in love to my soul delivered it from the pit of corruption" (Isa. xxxviii, 17). Could he hav said this if he had believed that at death he would go to heaven? Did God in love to his soul keep him out of heaven fifteen years?

Job says: "He keepeth back his soul from the pit, and his life from perishing by the sword." "Yea, his soul draweth near unto the grave, and his life to the destroyer" (Job xxxiii, 18, 22). David was of the same faith. "But God will redeem my soul from the power of the grave, for he shall receive me" (Ps. xlix, 15). Paul also taught and believed his soul at death would go to the grave, not to heaven. "If after the manner of men I hav fought with beasts at Ephesus, what advantageth it me, if the dead rise not? Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die" (1 Cor. xv, 32).

If Paul believed with modern Christians that at death his immortal soul—the real Paul—would go to glory, and only his body go to the grave, he could not ask what advantage to hav been a Christian, for the self-evident answer would be much everyway. What matters if there is ever a resurrection or not, if you at death can go and enjoy perfect happiness in heaven?

Now comes the vital question, Did Christ die, soul and body? Christians claim that Christ was God, therefore immortal. If immortal, he could not die. All must admit that a dead God is an absurd impossibility. Christians assert that "Christ is God, but that he took on himself our nature. He was both human and divine, and died to pay the penalty of our sins; none but a God could make atonement, for by the sin of Adam death was passed on all men; Christ's body died upon the cross, thus paying the penalty of man's transgressions—all the debt we owe."

Which is it that sins—soul or body?

If the body sins, then why when the wicked die does the body sweetly rest in peace and the poor innocent soul go to hell's torments? If the body only sins, why do priests and parsons talk so much of our poor souls?

Is it the soul that sins? Then why did Christ say, "Wherefore if thy hand or thy foot offend thee, cut it off, and cast them from thee: it is better for thee to enter into life halt or maimed, rather than having two hands or two feet to be cast into everlasting fire. And if thine eye offend thee, pluck it out and cast it from thee; it is better to enter into life with one eye, rather than having two eyes to be cast into hell?" (Matt. xvii, 8, 9). "For what shall it profit a man, if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul? or what shall a man giv in exchange for his soul?" (Mark viii, 36, 37). Since it is, then, our souls that sin ("The soul that sinneth it shall die"—Ezk. xviii, 20), it is our souls that are doomed to death. Christ must make atonement for our soul. If the penalty was paid by Christ, then his soul must hav died. But, if his soul died, he could not hav been God, could not hav been immortal. C. B. R.

The Annual Freethinkers' Convention.—When and Where to be Held.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: The board of directors of the Cassadaga Lake Free Association, by a unanimous vote, hav tendered to The New York State Freethinkers' Association their grounds and buildings, located on Cassadaga Lake, on and in which to hold the Freethinkers' Annual Convention on the 3d, 4th, 5th, 6th, and 7th days of September next, free of charge. The executiv committee of the Freethinkers' Association hav accepted the generous offer, and the Convention will be held on those grounds at the days mentioned.

These grounds, as you probably know, are located in a beautiful grove on the lake above mentioned, and are fitted up in fine style. There is erected on the grounds an amphitheater, with a seating capacity for three thousand people. The seats are in a semi-circle, one above the other, so that all can hear distinctly all that is said from the platform. It is so inclosed and roofed over that the audience is protected from the inclemency of the weather.

The grounds are fenced in, so that a proper admission fee can be charged at the gates, and everything is arranged so as to make it a very convenient place for a large assembly of people.

There is one decided advantage our Association will gain by holding its annual Convention at this place. There are established from nearly every city and large town in the United States very cheap excursion rates of railroad fare to the great orthodox camping grounds on Chautauqua Lake. The Cassadaga grounds are in the same vicinity, and the Freethinkers, from all sections of the country, can avail themselvs of these already established low rates in attending our Convention.

And another advantage: Mr. Alonso Edwards, who has charge of all the hotels on the grounds, has agreed to board and lodge all who may attend the Convention for one dollar per day. This will save our friends hundreds of dollars from what they would hav to pay in a large city.

The Convention will not be so far from Buffalo but that the large dailies of that city will giv full reports of its proceedings; and the New York Herald has already given assurance that it will report the proceedings as heretofore.

The association will this year, as it has at all its past conventions, invite the Freethinkers of all the states and of Canada to meet with it, and thus make the Convention a national or international one. It is hoped that Freethinkers everywhere will make arrangements to attend the Convention, and thus make it a gathering that will attract the attention of the whole country. H. L. Green, Sec.

A Remedy for Land Robbery.

There are many land thieves and rich monopolists in this nation who hav robbed the working classes of their birthright to land and are grinding them into the earth under the heel of half-paid labor, aided by all the papers in the nation that their money can control, but still the working classes are in the majority, and if they so determin they can restore the land to its rightful owners, those who need it to cultivate. Let the workers, everyone of them, resolve to be men rather than slaves to political knaves who make politics their trade, and sell their votes to the political parties that are robbing them. Let them become willing to unite and vote together for the common good. Let them circulate petitions, or rather, imperativ commands, to their servants in Congress to enact the following laws, namely: A law that no more land shall ever be given to schools, colleges, churches, railroads, or any other corporations. Secondly, a law that no man shall ever hereafter come into legal possession by purchase, will, or bequest, of more land than he and his own family can cultivate—say seventy-five acres, more or less as may be decided best, but not more than one hundred acres. Third, a law that every landless man who will settle on and cultivate it shall hav one such farm lot by paying, at most, only the expense of surveying and fixing the bounds. Fourth, a law that when a man has selected such a lot it shall forever remain inalienable to him and his family, and never be taken from them for debt. Fifth, a law that when a large landholder dies each of his heirs may take one such farm lot, and the balance returned to the government for the price he gave for it, or sold at auction in farm lots only to landless men. Sixth, a law requiring of every railroad company that owns tracts of land not needed for positiv use of their roads to set a price on the surplus land, and the government shall either buy the land or tax it at the company's prices.

The moment these laws are enacted land will hav no more price than sunlight, air, or water. Speculation in land, which should never hav had an existence any more than speculation in air, will be killed at once, and every industrious family will hav it in their power to own a farm and be assured that the elements and laws of nature will permit of having a comfortable living; and as thousands now trampled under the heel of capital will run to farming, the thousands who remain can stand up like men, set a price on their own labor, and receive pay enough to liv comfortably and be men instead of slaves.

Berlin, N. J. J. Hacker.

Neither Francis nor Boyd was Junius.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: A complete refutation of the claim that Hugh Boyd was Junius will be found in the "Preliminary Essay" of Woodfall's "Junius," 1813. Boyd was taxed by the bookseller Almon in 1769 with writing the Junius Letters, because of a fancied resemblance of his handwriting to that of Junius; whereupon he changed color and said: "The similitude of handwriting is not a conclusiv fact." But there was, in fact, no similitude in the handwriting of the two, as Woodfall well knew, being the publisher of the Letters of Junius and familiar also with Boyd's handwriting. And some years later he told Amon that Boyd was not the author of the letters. There is nothing whatever to support the claim of Boyd. He was an imitator of Junius, and guilty sometimes of plagiarizing his metaphors. And, as an offset to his blushing evasion when taxed with being Junius, he was vain enough to induce his wife once or twice to challenge him with having written the letters. But aside from the total want of evidence in favor of Boyd, a single circumstance bars the claim on his behalf. In 1772, when the work of Junius was ended, Boyd had been suffering extreme pecuniary distress for about two years, and was driven to Ireland to escape arrest. Now, at the beginning of that very year, Junius was refusing to accept half the profits that were to be realized from the sale of an authorized edition of his letters. This fact was not publicly known until 1812, when Woodfall's son published the private letters of Junius to his father. In the letter of March 5, 1772, Junius says:

"What you say about the profits is very handsome. I like to deal with such men. As for myself, be assured that I am far above all pecuniary views. Make the most of it therefore, and let all your views in life be directed to a solid, however moderate, independence. Without it no man can be happy, nor even honest."

Woodfall emphatically denied that Boyd was the author of the letters, and at the same time confessed that he did not know who Junius was. Any other person competent to write the letters, except Thomas Paine, could not hav escaped discovery at the time.

The ablest argument in favor of Philip Francis was recently made by Mr. Lecky in Vol. III. of his "History of England in the 18th Century." I answered it in a brief article in the New York Sun, August 9, 1882; and the editor's own opinion was indicated by adding to my own heading this: "The real Junius was Thomas Paine." W. H. Burr.

Mr. Chamberlain Visits the Monument.

My Dear Eugene: I cannot refrain from writing to tell you of my great gratification at the way in which you and your associates of the Bennett Monument Committee hav acquitted yourselvs of your task. When I learned from The Truth Seeker that the monument was completed, I determined to make a pilgrimage to it the first pleasant Sunday. Accordingly, last Sunday I had Professor Rawson to dine with me, and in the afternoon we went together to Greenwood. I am sure that Mr. Rawson was as much pleased as I, and I can only say my satisfaction was complete. We agreed that the Bennett Monument was of great merit and value. Solid and rich, bold and prominent, without being meretricious or obstrusiv, large and commanding, yet perfectly chaste and elegant, its grand and harmonious proportions attract the passer-by and compel attention, while its broad, polished sides tell a story of a sublime character and a glorious triumph.

Not the least worthy part of your work was the choice of the sentiments you culled from the abundance of his writings to exemplify his character and to perpetuate his thought. There is a peculiar appropriateness in the lines from his letter to The Truth Seeker family on reaching home after his Round-the-World tour:

"I believe in the eternal powers and principles of nature, in the superiority of good lives, in acts of kindness toward our fellow-beings, and in efforts to spread the light of truth over the dark spots of the earth."

And standing before that shrine, and reading again those beautiful and pathetic words already firmly fixed in my memory, I could not but feel that though in this life he borrowed no trouble about a future existence, yet in some way and somewhere he was at that moment conscious of the superiority of his good life over the lives of his mean persecutors, and that he was happy in the remembrance of the efforts he made to spread the light of truth over the dark spots of the earth. His was a life of deed and not of creed, yet while his works exceeded his beliefs, he bequeathed to the world in this short paragraph a creed of unsurpassed grandeur.

The work of the artist who engraved the epitaph and inscriptions is to be praised. They are all clear and plainly legible, and the paths conduct the wayfarer within easy reading distance of them all. Thus in death our hero will not cease to be "the teacher of multitudes," and his spirit will go marching on, while the form of his countenance will be preserved by the lifelike and wonderfully real portrait in enduring bronze which adorns the front of the monument. To merit such an epitaph as is written on this stone is indeed a proud distinction. Its writer has proved himself to be one of the most faithful of friends by a steadfast devotion throughout. Well I remember the sadness and desolation with which he and I, together with that grand old philanthropist, Dr. Foote, turned away from the new-made grave a year ago, and well I remember how he then said, "The old lion is dead, but he has left lots of whelps;" and when I went last Sunday and read upon this stone that our friend "though dead still speaks to us, and asks that we continue the work he left unfinished," I could hear in my imagination the young lions all over the world cry responsiv, We will continue the work! And that work shall go on till the last fetters of superstition are stricken from the last slave of ecclesiasticism.

Yes, friend Eugene, what your committee has wrought will stand, long after we are passed away, a lesson and a warning—a lesson that dishonesty, though invested with apparently irresistible power, shall yet be vanquished by truth and integrity, and a warning to those who corruptly trifle away sacred rights of which they should be the guardians and protectors.

"When the innocent is convicted
The court is condemned."

The one thousand friends who hav done this work of love through you hav done well, and each may cherish a feeling of pride that he was of that number. May the monument stand forever to emphasize and enforce the great idea that in this country ecclesiastical fanaticism shall not lead the people captiv.

Your friend, Ed. W. Chamberlain.

A Disguised Steal.

A bill has been reported by the Senate Committee on Education which proposes to divide among the several states and territories and the District of Columbia some fifty or sixty millions of the surplus revenue to be used for educational purposes. The money is to be divided in proportion to the illiteracy of the population of the various states. This means to giv it mainly to the old slave states, the hot-bed of Christianity and ignorance, where the colored people and "poor white trash" are presumptivly unable to read and write.

The national convention of educators held last August at Louisville, Ky., discussing this proposed eleemosynary act, agreed that the division ought to be made, but without restrictions. The resolution was only mildly opposed by Northern members, and was unitedly supported and voted for by the Southern members.

On the face of it this bill appears to be good—that is, if the United States has any right to interfere in the education of the children of the states. But there is a bigger nigger in the fence than any on the plantations of the Carolinas. To anyone not conversant with Christian trickery it might appear that "without restriction" meant only to giv the state leave to squander this common school fund and steal it, as was notoriously done in ante-bellum days, when the negro was not to be the recipient of education, and as has lately been done by the bourbons of Virginia, who diverted a million and a quarter from the school fund.

But the blackest individual in the dividing obstacle is, as usual, the Christian church. Senator Blair, the introducer of one of the bills, and the chief mover in the matter, is a tooter for New England Puritanism. He comes from New Hampshire, a state that yet excludes Catholics from office, and is stern in his orthodoxy and a firm believer in the divine right of the church to rule everything. The Christian objection to having the disposition of the funds restricted by Congress to secular purposes, springs from the church's penchant for stealing from the state to support her own institutions. The pious never scruple at taking anything in the line of charity, and will fight for a testator's estate and take it all, even if it leaves his wife and children penniless. They are always on the lookout for dishonest advantages, as in the case of Girard College, and other educational institutions Christianized by them. But in none of the bills introduced are there any material restricting clauses, and yet considering the roguish channels through which the money must go, there needs to be several sharp restrictions to prevent fraud.

Among the restrictions that should be provided, if this money is to be parceled out, are that no state, territory, nor the District of Columbia should receive any portion of the money wherein by provision of law the state or territory givs, or any county, town, township, city, school district, or any municipal corporation, can giv, any money or property to establish, aid, or maintain any sectarian schools, university, college, academy, seminary, place of public or private instruction, or any sectarian institutions whatever. And the secretary of the treasury should be required to ascertain this fact before paying any of the money to the states or territories, or to the District of Columbia. Further, such money should be withheld from any state or territory in which equal education for all, white or colored, male or female, is not provided in all the educational institutions supported in whole or in part by the state.

In the state of New York we hav more to fear in this matter from the Catholics than from the Protestants, but in Massachusetts, New Hampshire, in fact, in all the New England and some of the Middle and Western states, the disciples of Calvin hav as long arms and large hands as the papal-toe kissers. And even in New York the Protestants hav sneaked in and share with the Catholics the hundreds of thousands of dollars annually given by our legislators to religious grist-mills. Their share amounts only to the crumbs from the Irish table, still they take them all the same as the Lord's bounty.

If Congress shall take to itself power to divide the surplus revenue among the states and territories, the least that should be done will be to copy sections two and three of the Illinois constitution of 1870, relating to education:

2. All lands, moneys, or other property, donated, granted, or received for school, college, seminary, or university purposes, and the funds thereof shall be faithfully applied to the objects for which such gifts or grants were made.

3. Neither the general assembly, nor any county, city, town, township, school district, or other public corporation, shall ever make any appropriation, or pay from any public fund whatever, anything in aid of any church or sectarian purpose, or to help support or sustain any school, academy, seminary, college, university, or other literary or scientific institution, controled by any church or sectarian denomination whatever, nor shall any grant or donation of any land, money, or other personal property ever be made by the state, or any such public corporation, to any church, or for any sectarian purpose.

Let provisions like the above be inserted in the donating bill, but let them be more rigorously enforced than is done in Illinois at present, where in her chiefest city the officers allow water taxes to be abated in favor of Catholic schools and churches. This is brought about through the sneaking fear the politicians of both parties hav of the Irish vote.

The colored children of the South form a large proportion of the illiterate, and some restricting clauses must be inserted for their benefit. If the officers of the states are allowed to divide the funds at their own pleasure, in the states maintaining separate schools the colored people will be left out in the cold. For them justice must be enforced, not merely made possible. If the states want to use the money, they should guarantee its benefits shall be shared impartially. For ourselvs, we do not see how Congress can constitutionally divide this money. But nowadays the strict construction of the Constitution is the last thing thought of by our legislators. and if this money is to be given it should not be used for sectarian purposes. This much Congress owes to the people of a secular republic, who, however much they may respect religion in the abstract, do not want to pay for overthrowing the government by educating the adherents of an alien despot.

The Older Religion.

The St. Catherine Evening Journal says that at the last meeting of the Victoria Philosophical Institute, of India, a paper was read by the Rev. R. C. Collins, M.A., on "Buddhism in Relation to Christianity." According to Mr. Collins, "who long resided in India and thoroughly investigated the subject, a religious poem was written in India about a thousand years ago, in which the events in the life of Christ are ascribed to the God Crishna. His belief is that the story of Christ reached India some time before this epic was written, and that there is abundance of proof that the story of the God Crishna is parodied from the history of Christ." Those who take stock in Mr. Collins and his belief will find themselvs egregiously imposed upon. The trick is old, and long since exposed. Some missionaries hav even gone so far as to claim that Crishna is the corrupted name of Christ, but it so happens that Crishna is a Sanskrit word, meaning "the dark god," or "the black god," while Christ is a title, from the Greek, meaning "the anointed," or "the messiah." The worship of Crishna was practiced in the time of Alexander the Great (330 B.C.). According to Professor Monier Williams, Crishna was deified about the fourth century B.C. Edward Moor (author of "Hindoo Pantheon" and "Oriental Fragments") regards as "very certain things" that both the name of Crishna and the general outline of his history were long anterior to the birth of Christ, and probably extended to the time of Homer, nearly nine hundred years before Christ. In "Asiatic Researches" it is stated that in the Sanskrit Dictionary, compiled more than two thousand years ago, we hav the whole story of Crishna, the incarnate deity, born of a virgin, and miraculously escaping in his infancy from Kansa, the reigning monarch of the country. The Rev. J. B. S. Carwithen, a "Brampton lecturer," bears testimony almost identical with that of Edward Moor, and adds that the knowledge of the priority of Crishna is not derived from Hindoo records alone. Both Arrian and Strabo assert that Crishna was anciently worshiped at Mathura, on the river Jumna, where he is worshiped at this day. Strabo wrote about the time Christ is alleged to hav lived, and Arrian some hundred years later. Columns of proof of the priority of Crishna could be adduced, against which the Rev. Mr. Collins and his belief can make no headway. There can be no more doubt that Christ followed Crishna by several hundred years than that both were the central points of mythology, and not the saviors their followers claim.

Heterophemy.

Some time ago a story was started that at Jenkintown, Pa., a carpenter had been stricken dead for blasphemy at a dinner at a hotel in that place. Several friends sent us copies of papers containing the account, with requests that we investigate, which we proceeded to do, but thus far hav received no answers to the letters written to Jenkintown. However, the religious papers were more successful, and hereafter when this story is repeated, Freethinkers can nail it as a lie on the authority of the New York Independent, which, after being gullible enough to print the yarn, was obliged to apologize in these words in its issue of February 14th:

"We copied from one of the New York daily papers last week portions of a telegram purporting to giv the particulars of a dinner given at a hotel in Philadelphia, at which, it was alleged, profane and other improper language was indulged in, and intoxicating drinks freely used by those present. It is now claimed, as we hear from reliable sources, that there was no improper conduct or improper language used at this dinner by anyone present, and that the whole story, as published in our columns and in many other papers, was greatly exaggerated, if not entirely erroneous. We are glad to hear this, and very much regret that, while no names or other personal allusions were given in our columns, we were led, even by the highly respectable source from which our information was obtained, to giv currency to the statements spoken of."

Where the story started we do not know, but it may hav been manufactured by some pious fool from a similar one that has been going the rounds in England. The transatlantic prototype is—

"A TERRIBLE WARNING.

"A Portsmouth correspondent sends the following: A few days since a private in the Hampshire Regiment invoked in a profane manner the name of the Deity by making use of the phrase, 'God strike me blind!' He afterward felt drowsy, and stretched himself on his bed; but when he attempted to open his eyes he found that he could not do so, and he has since been wholly deprived of the use of his eyes. He was conveyed to the Haslar Military Hospital, where he remains."

The sequel to this was furnished by the National Reformer of January 27th. It is in the form of a letter from the principal of the Haslar Military Hospital, directed to one of Mr. Bradlaugh's correspondents. The principal says:

"There is no truth whatever in the statement, and the lad who is supposed to hav sworn never swore at all. He has a weak right eye; it was slightly inflamed—the result of cold—but he is now quite well. He is very indignant and hurt at the statement, and if he did swear he is not blind."

As long as Christians resort to such miserable tricks they must suffer the mortification of exposure.

Cook and the New Creed.

The religious press is beginning to find Cook out. So long as he confined his lying to the Infidels, the Independent patted him on the back and made much of him, as the man destined to overthrow scientific skepticism by attacking the philosophers on their own ground. Now that Mr. Cook has denounced the new Congregational creed as being too easy on the deniers of theological Christianity, that eminent journal finds out that he is a "high-sounding Cæsar," as fallible as other sinners, if not a little more so. "If this is to be his gait," it says, "he will lose, and deserve to lose, both his influence and the power to exert it. He puts himself in the position of a hot partisan; he strikes out recklessly;" and concludes by more than intimating that Mr. Cook is not worth refuting. We may be sorry for the Independent, but for its previous laudations of the Boston charlatan it richly deserves all the tortures he can inflict upon it. Besides, if Christianity be true, Cook is right. There is no probation after death, and all the eschatologists in the world cannot take from hell its terrors. If there be no place of torment there can be no abode of bliss. This is plain to the most casual reader of the New Testament.

Our Cat's-paw President.

So powerful had the Propaganda College of Rome grown, that the Italian government found it necessary in 1873 to confiscate the property of that institution, selling it, and applying the proceeds to the purchase of Italian bonds, the interest on which would be paid to the church. The sale was stopped by the church appealing to the courts of Italy, but the decision having been given in favor of the government, it is now to be proceeded with. The Propaganda College is the bureau that has charge of the missionary work of the Catholic church. It is made up of colleges, each having some particular country to debauch. Cardinal McCloskey asked President Arthur to instruct the United States minister to Italy, Mr. W. W. Astor, to beseech the Italian government to exempt the American College from this propaganda sale.

This has been done. Mr. Arthur requested Secretary Frelinghuysen to order Minister Astor to represent to the government of Italy that the United States would like it if the American College was allowed to remain in the hands of the church.

Now the people of the United States would like to know by what authority President Arthur has interfered in a matter exclusivly between the Italian government and Italian citizens. The American College is owned by Italians, and it is no part of the duties of a president of the United States to protect Italian citizens in an Italian city, especially when those citizens are engaged in a work that the government regards as dangerous to its own well-being.

Mr. Arthur will be disappointed if he expects that he can pull chestnuts out of the fire without getting singed. The votes he will gain by this unwarranted proceeding will be more than offset by the loss of the confidence the people had in him. And Mr. Arthur can ill afford to spare even one strong point.

The Monument Fund.

At the last acknowledgment there was needed $76.38. Since then we hav received the following sums from the persons named:

Jno. Engstrom,	$2 00	B. F. Wardwell,	$ 50
M. F. Dean,	50	Wm. Fray,	1 00
Wm. Smith,	1 00	Mrs. Lizzie Fray,	1 00
O. Dutcher,	1 00	Mrs. H. O. Kinney,	30
H. H Timby,	1 00	Ben Whaley,	1 00
Reuben Alworth,	1 00	Wm. Flett.	5
Martha B. Alworth,	1 00	Chas. McDorman,	5 00
Peter F. Spencer,	1 00	Geo. N. Hill,	50
Jno. Riggin,	1 00	Wm. Brown,	1 00
F. W. Cheney,	1 00	W. W. Webb,	50

The deficiency now existing is $54 58. We hav heard nothing from the cemetery authorities, and appearances therefore indicate that they hav concluded to gracefully submit to the inevitable.

Editorial Notes.

J. E. Remsburg reached Kansas March 24th. During his winter tour he traveled eight thousand five hundred miles and delivered one hundred and twelve lectures.

C. B. Reynolds has accepted an invitation to lecture on four Sundays in Pittsburgh, Pa., viz. April 13th, 20th, 27th, and May 4th. On his way he will lecture at Richburg, N. Y., the 10th and 11th. He would like engagements for week day evenings in any place within reach of Pittsburgh, and will accept calls on short notice and at low rates. We cordially recommend him to the Leagues and societies, as everywhere he works for organization and will help to strengthen the societies engaging him. His address is Box 104, North Parma, New York.

There are strong Freethought societies at Dunnedin, Wellington, Wanganui, Nelson, Christ Church, and Auckland, New Zealand, and younger bodies at Picton, Napier, Palmerston, Taranake, Helenville. Our correspondent says that the unconstitutional act of the fettered thought people in the House of Commons in England in preventing Bradlaugh from taking his legal seat in the house, and the unjust imprisonment of Messrs. Foote, Ramsey, and Kemp, hav given great impetus to the Freethought movement in New Zealand. Nine Freethought associations hav been formed last year through the above causes, and some others are under way. He adds that the little Freethinker is well supported since the unjust sentence, not for its intrinsic merit, but for the sturdy work it is doing in exposing the frauds of the church corporations.

The following resolutions were adopted by the Chicago Liberal League on Sunday, the 23d:

Whereas, The primary object of a republican people must be the universal education of their citizens, the latter being the strongest mainstay and securest safeguard of the perpetuity of self-government; and

Whereas, In utter disregard of this indisputable truth and of the fact that the framers of our Constitution hav made ample provision for the establishment of a perfect public school system for all on a secular basis, our city administrators are now depriving more than 40,000 children of the incalculable benefits of a national and unsectarian education by refusing to furnish the means for the erection of a sufficient number of school buildings in Chicago; and

Whereas, Thereby over 35,000 children are driven to sectarian schools in which they are inoculated with principles and ideas that are in direct opposition to those whereon our republic rests; be it

Resolved, That we, the citizens of Chicago in mass meeting assembled, demand that our common council make appropriations for the erection of as many new schoolhouses in Chicago as will meet the requirements of the people; that we view with suspicion and disapproval the attempts of the finance committee of our city council to reduce the sum of $325,000, the latter sum being insufficient to meet existing wants for school purposes; that we also look with strong disapproval on the actual truckling of our city council to the un-American and insidious encroachments of the Catholic church, and that we also express our suspicion of the political aims and tendencies of ambitious citizens in subjecting American educational institutions to influences emanating from Rome.

To Correspondents.

J. H. S.—The longest verse in the Bible is Esther viii, 9.

Benedict.—We do not publish anonymous communications.

Brother Seaver falls into error in assuming that "J. W. S." meant to attack him in these columns. "J. W. S." only forwarded to us the MS. of his reply to Mr. Seaver, a part of which that worthy editor did not print.

Ed. Farrell.—The word grandmother occurs in 2 Timothy, i, 5. Huldah the prophetess . . . dwelt in Jerusalem in the college (2 Kings, xxii, 14). But "college" means in this case, "second court." And Moses called . . . the sons of Uzziel, the uncle of Aaron (Lev. x, 4).

Martin Newlin.—Yes, the Oneida Community is a Christian institution. You know the primitiv Christians were communists, and Noyes, the founder of the Oneida brother and sisterhood, was very religious, as are nearly all his followers. Indeed, only on a religious basis could people be induced to remain in such unnatural social relations as formerly obtained at Oneida.

Book Notices.

Horses, their Feed and their Feet. A Manual of Horse Hygiene. By C. E. Page, M.D. Price, 50 cents in paper; 75 cents in cloth. Orders filled from this office.

We gave a notice to this book several weeks ago. Since then it has run through the edition, and been revised and much enlarged. A number of portraits of celebrated horses hav also been added, which, showing the improvement that can be made by careful training, will no doubt be appreciated by the rearers of horses. As was before set forth, the author of this book has radical views on the subject of horses, but the publishers of the book assure its purchasers that they need hav no fear of testing his theories, as they are in receipt of many letters from people who hav done so and found his suggestions invaluable.

Bible Myths and their Parallels in Other Religions. Large octavo. Nearly six hundred pages. Third edition; revised and enlarged. Price reduced to $3. Sold at this office.

The advertisment of this volume, on another page, shows what it is and what is thought of it by the press. We will only add here the opinion of the Boston Commonwealth upon its conclusivness. "It is useless," says that high literary authority, "in the light thrown upon the matter throughout the pages of this book, to argue that the Bible must be of special divine origin because of its contents, for here we hav evidence upon evidence that there is no myth, legend, supernatural occurrence, doctrin, rite, or ceremony recorded in the Bible which cannot be paralleled in some ancient record centuries older than the page on which the same thing is narrated in the Hebrew and Christian scriptures. If the existence of such and such things in the Bible is to be accepted as proof that the Bible is of special divine origin, then the existence of the like things in other ancient books of the world must be accepted as proof that they also are of special divine origin. If not, why not? Like effects must everywhere, and at all times, come from like causes. We confess we are curious as to how the orthodoxies of the Christian world will greet this book. We more than suspect that they will not greet it at all, but will be content to pass it by in fearful silence."

The Problem of the Universe and Its Scientific Solution; With Some Criticisms of Universology. By Samuel P. Putnam, New York: Published at the Truth Seeker office, 33 Clinton Place. Price, 25 cents. For sale at this office.

Would that every man and woman in this land could and would read this admirable little brochure. Into its thirty-nine pages are crowded a multitude of pregnant truths, and every line flashes with a jewel of thought. Mr. Putnam stands to-day in the foremost rank of the scientific apostles of liberty, and it is this fact which causes us to be amazed at the dedication of this brain-child of his to Charles Watts, who certainly is anything but a loyal, consistent, and courageous defender of the rights of man. He is, rather, the F. E. Abbot of England.

This error in judgment aside, S. P. Putnam's "Problem of the Universe" is almost perfect. We quote its closing sentences: "In adopting science we do not destroy idealism, for science is eminently ideal, forward-looking, and progressiv. It creates vast enthusiasms, wonderful impulses. Look at its glorious revealings, millions of stars, infinit palaces of light and glory, in the measureless realms of night, and in the bosom of the flower, in the hard rock, in the dancing foam of the sea, in the weed that tosses on the shore, in the bending grass, what wondrous wealth of life is ever flaming to our eyes; and so science, Memnon-like, is bursting forth with music on our way, as eternally new dawns flash upon its marble lips. Ah, science may seem cold to some, but she throbs with life; and when once the world is given wholly to her guidance, and adopts the severe limits of her methods and knowledge, then will be heard the sweetest songs; then, then will be enjoyed the most noble fruits."—Lucifer.

A Correction.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Allow me to correct an error which has crept into your report of my testimony in a civil suit in Toronto. I did not say that I believed that if there be a future state its rewards or punishments for acts in this life would be eternal. This, in my opinion, would be simply the brutal belief in hell and in heaven where the many endure eternal misery and the few enjoy eternal bliss. I as solemnly protest against having made such a statement as I do against this revolting belief. I simply stated that, in my opinion, the results of all actions, good or bad, would be eternal; that having come to tell the truth, my oath on the Bible would be binding on my conscience, and that the latter was, to me, the highest tribunal.

In justice to all concerned, I will add that it was a piece of chicanery, which, in anything but respectful terms, challenged my testimony, and that the judge, on the other hand, did not hesitate for a moment to rule that my testimony should be admitted.

Requesting you to insert this letter into your columns, I am yours respectfully, B. Marcuse.

As to Money.

As a Greenbacker, I was much interested in the article on money in a late issue of The Truth Seeker, by our mutual friend, Stephen Pearl Andrews. For this clear statement of the money problem in terms of Universology, Mr. Andrews is entitled, and will doubtless receive, the thanks of all sincere currency reformers. I must, however, take exception to two things in this article. One is his undervaluation of the legal tender feature of fiat or natural money; and the other is his omission to state the true grounds on which national or fiat money is based, and the one more than any other, that he has mentioned that compels that absolute confidence which is essential to money.

I refer to that feature of the treasury note that makes it receivable by the government for taxes and for all debts due to it, thus making their redemption absolutely certain.

The "confidence" that supported the paper money of the Revolution and of the Rebellion (for no other money is available in revolutions). was that inspired by the hope that the cause would win and the money be redeemed. The "confidence" that floated the later system of representativ paper money was the fallacious belief in the security of specie basis, both of which were delusions and snares, as "promises to pay" so frequently are.

But when a strong and stable government issues its own notes, based on a promis to receive, there can be nothing more safe, not even gold.

Three times in great emergencies the United States has issued such treasury notes, as did also many of the colonies; and in no case were they ever depreciated, but on the contrary, were always at a premium.

My other exception is that the legal tender footing of fiat or national money is not estimated at its right value. It has an importance and a function other and greater than that mentioned by Mr. Andrews.

A fact from our own financial history will illustrate this better than any argument can. It is, that the first issues of greenbacks in 1862, which were made a full legal tender, were never in the darkest hours of the nation's struggle depreciated, and are to-day quoted at $1.33, while the later issues with the "exception clause" did subsequently greatly depreciate, and only because they were not receivable for duties and taxes; that is to say, the money was not a full legal tender, equal to gold, but was dishonored from it inception by its creators.

With these two exceptions I fully indorse Mr. Andrews's article, although couched in terms in which I hav not been accustomed to think.

Hugh B. Brown.

Wait a Little Yet.

Will Mr. Greene and other friends who hav written for The Truth Seeker in regard to Spiritualism, and are expecting replies to the articles from Elmina, please wait till she goes and sees something of the phenomena, if she is so lucky as to hav means enough sent to warrant the taking of the proposed trip? Elmina.

Letters from Friends.

DAVIS, MICH., March 16, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $5, for my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. I am the only one that takes your paper at this office, and although I can ill afford to take it I am bound it shall be represented here as long as I can pay for it. I know of some wealthy men around here who claim to be Liberals, and take no Liberal paper at all, but borrow them when they can. If all Infidels were like them there would be no Liberal papers or books circulated, and Freethought would soon be a thing of the past. I say, Shame on such Liberals! They are enough to bring the blush to the cheek of a brass monkey.

J. I. PETTIBONE.

STEWARTSVILLE, Mo., March 15, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Your noble paper reaches me regularly, and affords me great pleasure in reading its columns. I am a hotel-keeper, and do not believe in gods, ghosts, devils, or hell, or any of those Munchausen stories in the Bible. But I do believe in all that which is good, reasonable, and right. For thirty years I was among the priest-ridden, superstitious howlers after imaginary beings above the clouds, but by mixing with the different classes of men I hav outgrown those mythical notions, and look back and shudder to think what a poor fool I hav been.

Inclosed please find $1, for which send me "Crimes of Preachers" and some of Remsburg's "False Claims."

S. N. BRADFORD.

PALO, IOWA, March 20, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: As you are receiving letters from almost every place but this, I thought that a few lines would not come amiss, as I seem to be left almost alone now, as you will see by what as taken place here in the last year. Three good Liberals hav passed away since last spring, but there is one in particular that I wish to speak of, and that is Doctor H. G. Fish, who died October 9, 1883. He was in his seventy-second year, and had been a Liberal ever since I became acquainted with him. It was he that loaned me THE TRUTH SEEKER that opened my eyes. He was a true man, and never flinched from what he thought was true and right. He died as he had lived, and passed away as peaceful as a child. I see by his books and pamphlets he has left, that cost a good many dollars, he was the first man that took THE TRUTH SEEKER in this part of the country. I think that I am the only one that takes it here now. Some hav moved to other states and places, and others gone back to mother earth. I still like your paper, but it has seemed to me that there was a link missing ever since Brother Bennett died.

J. STRATFORD.

BROOKVILLE, KAN., March 10, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I will herein send $3 for 1884. And now that is settled, I propose to afflict you with a few words of blarney and business. Before I proceed, however, allow me to make you acquainted with a rough, tough, old soldier, not Major Bagstock, though, neither was I ever a soldier of the cross, but simply one of the rank and file of the Union Army during the Rebellion. After graduating at a backwoods country schoolhouse, at the age of seventeen, in the year of their Lord, 1861, I volunteered to go and fight Jeff Davis. My motiv was patriotism, plus thirteen dollars per month, while the chaplain received the rank and pay of first lieutenant. Being young and inexperienced at the time, I failed to see any practical value to the government or the army in the use of these old barnacles, who, taken as the whole lot together, commanded a smaller share of the respect of the army than the cooks and mule-drivers.

Now for THE TRUTH SEEKER. I'll say right here that we call it the best that we hav got on the shelf, and in regard to the editor, I'll say that when he assumed command my feelings were somewhat akin to those of Tim Linkinwater at the time Nicholas Nickleby dipped his pen into the inkstand and plunged into the books of Cheeryble Brothers, and am glad to say, like honest old Tim, that he'll do.

Yours truly, NEWTON MITCHELL.

FRESNO CITY, Feb. 26, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: In your paper for February 16th, page 104, there are five questions, the second of which referred to the tariff question. Let me state a few points, and ask a question or two, on that subject. 1. If there were no tariff, we would get manufactured goods thirty per cent cheaper. 2. If there were no tariff, then one-fourth of the consumers would be out of employment and would be producers. 3. That would reduce the prices of produce. 4. Would the producer be the loser on his produce more than he would save by buying foreign goods at pauper prices? 5. Hav we not want and poverty enough already without making it tenfold worse? 6. If we hav no tariff, how much will it cost for imported manufactured goods, one dollar for each person? 7. Would that be $50,000,000 yearly? If so, what would that amount to in twenty years, principal and interest? Two billions—enough to bankrupt any nation! 8. How much would the government lose from the import tax in twenty years? Possibly two billions more. 9. Would not that be too much to pay and to lose to make this a pauper nation? 10. Should not the men that hav the machinery and property for manufacturing be protected? If not, they would be great losers. 11. Should the poor that hav learned the trades of the many industries be protected by a tariff?

GEORGE PADDINGTON.

A WORD OF APPROBATION.

ADRIAN, MICH.

MR. EDITOR: After carefully reading and considering those selections made by the Monument Committee from the writings and sayings of D. M. Bennett, who came to his untimely death from the bigoted, intolerant, and persecuting spirit of the Christian church through its minions, and whose body now lies moldering beneath its shadow, I thought I could not do less than approbate these brief, wise, truthful, and apt selections for the monument, where they are now engraven on the erected column as an eternal reminder to the passing throng of the greatness of the man and the cruelties of his persecutors.

And now, friend Macdonald, you hav told us of the trouble and additional expense that this same Christian church, through their dupes, hav caused the committee in the erection of this plain and telling monument, and that they hav even gone so far as to intimate that if the Monument Committee did not back down the Cemetery Board would hav to interfere. Still their secretary was careful to add that he did not say this authoritativly.

Now, Mr. Editor, I don't know how other donators to this Monument Fund may feel on this subject, but, as for myself, I hav a little stock in that concern, and I feel entirely satisfied with the course that the committee has taken so far; and, if need be, I can double or treble my stock in that fund, in order to keep our monument intact just where our committee left it, without defacing one single word. And as it is now completed and there are a few dollars behind, I hope to hear of a few more who will want a little stock in this worthy enterprise, that may forever stand as a reminder to coming generations of the final resting-place of the man who in the midst of the threats from Christian bigots, dared to stand out boldly for the freedom of speech, the press, and the mails.

S. D. MOORE.

COLETE, ILL.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find three dollars, for which please continue THE TRUTH SEEKER another year. Inconsistency pains me, consequently THE TRUTH SEEKER pains me. It is this way. It and its supporters hav gotten out of the woods in relation to a personal God, yet they and thee—thee I now hav reference to—dost apparently revere and obey a statute that inflicts untold evils on human kind, and that had its origin only in him whom thou hast dethroned. This is inconsistent plainly, and its application is, that thee appears quite out of place in bringing in such terms as "dirt, nastiness," etc., as thee has from time in alluding to the Heywoods and their methods of enlightening people as to ways that to those who are reflectiv stand self-condemned. If a man has been shot thee does not judge me because I choose to say "He was killed," instead of, "He was murdered." If, in speaking of food for cows, I mention, "Blue Grass," am I "nasty" because I do not say Poa Paralensis instead? In the interest of reform, let this principle be recognized in all directions of research alike. A rose by any other name is just as sweet. Standards as to morality are ever changing. As we become more reflectiv and discover connections between actions and their consequences that heretofore hav escaped our observation, see that some hitherto held good are, in reality, not good, we become aware that old measures of their value need to be corrected. The Heywoods would be uncensurable if they even used the English names of the parts and functions of which they treat None are obliged to talk of astronomy in German, and why should one be obliged to talk of physiology in Latin? But the trouble is not here; it is because by this discussion an old and corrupt regime is overturned, and those who hav got no father than a simple disbelief in the Christians' God, will, with the rest, hav to adjust themselvs to the new and better order.

Plainly, obscenity is only in the mind of him who objects to the conscientious use of any term to express any fact. The English language is full of synonyms, and there is no authority and no more reason for their exclusion in one department of human affairs than in another.

Would it not be well to let go of the idea thee got from thy fathers, and which they got from an imaginary God; and if thee has no commendations which the Heywoods are thought so worthy of, will thee hold thy peace and not place added burdens for them to carry?

Nothing justifies ignorance of any organ or function, and with the facts so patent to us as to the prevailing and gross unwise use of those of our sexual natures, our silence here is doubly wrong. By all means let those who hav the inspiration speak it out, for "truly the harvest is plenteous, but the laborers are few."

Our fathers did not pay tax on tea after they had freed themselvs from George the Third. Let us, having ceased allegiance to a God of Comstock type and caliber, no longer be bound by iniquitous laws of his framing. I hope thee will giv this letter space in the paper, for I feel that possibly it may be the means of clearing the mists from the minds of some who seek to walk in the light of all truth, but to whom the way has not yet fully appeared.

JOSEPH ANTHONY.

PATERSON, N. J., March 12, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: In your issue or March 8th, there was a great amount of expression on the money question that amounts to nothing. In a few words I propose to giv what I conceive to be the only questions that are essential to a proper understanding of the medium of exchange.

Money is required to avoid the inconvenience of barter, and I deny that the need of money "arises wholly from the fact of credit or trust."

Its amusing to hear Greenbackers assert that an exclusiv government control of money would prevent panics. Government money can be contracted as easily as any other money, but the contraction cannot be produced by banks only through credit. It's the expansion of credits followed by the contraction of credits that produces monetary panics.

A gold, silver, flour, or special commodity basis is a fraud, unless its dollar for dollar. Money should be based on all the products of labor to destroy its speculativ character, and not on one, two, or three products; and that basis should be all the wealth and resources of the nation (the right to tax, to the redemption of its money).

If Astor issued ten million of notes payable in flour, and ten million not payable in any specified commodity, the one is equally as good as the other, for out of his resources he can redeem both, but the one payable in flour or gold has a speculativ character which the other has not.

A nation will not be affected financially by a commercial drain of gold and silver, if the money is not based specially on these commodities, but the commodity price of the gold and silver will be affected, thereby causing it to rise or fall as imports and exports increase and decrease; in other words, gold and silver become commercial regulators without affecting our financial condition, or our money value of any domestic product contraction, and individual hoarding of money will continue as long as money has an intrinsic or speculativ value. If the greenback was made a perfect legal tender with no exception, its speculativ character would be destroyed; but with the gold or silver government notes, the speculativ character remains; and unless the government holds dollar for dollar in gold or silver for its redemption, it's no better than the legal tender, while it's an evil, as it givs power to the capitalist to bankrupt the government, by cornering its gold and silver obligations in the same manner as cornering the flour obligations of an Astor.

A few words covers the whole ground. Money or circulating medium should be issued and controled by the people in their administrativ capacity, and it should hav no speculativ value. Gold and silver may be coined (or otherwise) as an international medium of exchange, paying balances of trade, etc. With a real gold, or gold and silver basis (dollar for dollar), the volume of money would be so contracted that its purchasing power would increase the real or labor wealth of the creditor class fourfold, and burden the labor and debtor class to a miserable and degraded serfdom. The purchasing power of money, or its labor value, can never hav stability, only through a government labor bureau to control the average price of labor (govern average labor, and skilled will be in proportion). If there is overproduction, it must be remedied by reduced hours of labor in place of reduced wages. If everything was carried on on a cash basis, and no government, state, or individual debts existed, no one would be affected injuriously or otherwise by the change in the purchasing power of money. If I had a house that was valued at five thousand dollars with labor at two dollars per day; if labor becomes reduced to one dollar per day, the house would only be worth two thousand five hundred dollars, but the purchasing power of the money, two thousand five hundred dollars, is now equal to the five thousand dollars; but the same rule will not apply to the debts, for I must giv double the amount of day's labor to pay it; and as it applies individually, so it applies nationally. The man that asserts that low paid labor is for the interest of a nation in debt, is either a fool or a knave.

BOSTON, MASS., March 3, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I hav often read the writings of Mrs. Slenker in a spirit of criticism, but never more so than her last "Open Letter to an Ex-Catholic," in THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 15th, and if it would not seem invidious, permit me through your columns to examin some of her assailable positions. "Man's life is a tragedy—his first utterance is a cry of pain, his last the groan of death," she pronounces a "false statement." I think she perverts the author's meaning in her strictures.

That man is dying all his life is as true as that he is living all his life, therefore a tragedy. Then, how many—yea, the majority, Elmina notwithstanding—find life full of tragedies! Their loved ones die before their eyes, those on whom they hoped to lean in old age, in storms and adversities; yea, friends desert and grow cold because of one's devotion to truth. Freshets inundate and drown, cyclones rend and uproot, mines explode, fire consumes, winter's blast congeals, suns prostrate, disease gnaws into the vitals, and death ensues in slow, lingering torments; or, in a moment, the tornado, the mine-damp, the elements of fire and water, and numerous unforeseen casualties whirl from activ life into the grave. Who will not say these are tragedies all the way from birth to the tomb? And, as if not enough, many, very many, are so crushed down with want, woe, and disappointment that rather than bear longer the ills of life they end them.

Does Elmina know of crime, poverty, unrest, and desperation in this world? Does she know of sickness, sorrow, pain, and death? Does she know that millions of suffering ones never tell their griefs—that the majority, unlike herself, "find more of shadow than sunshine?" "Ten times more of peace than war!" Where is there not war? War in the family, war in the individual, war in the nation's councils, war in the church, war in nature, war in all the elements, war everywhere, war in everything; war between Spiritualists and Materialists, war among reformers, war among "peaceful Quakers," war even in herself! If man's first utterance be not a cry of pain, or distress, why does he not laugh rather than shriek or wail? Yes, "natural to be born;" so, also, is it natural to for the mother to bear the child. Is it painless because it is natural? Remember, we are not talking about what should be, but what is.

"Man's last utterance the groan of death!" The audible groan accompanying the last gasp is not the author's meaning, as I understand him, but his dissolution is the ending of this tragedy, and cannot be painless—the feebleness and decay of old age, or the rending of vigorous youth or middle age, like the giant oak uprooted by the whirlwind.

There is no amount of sophistry that will make suffering man feel that he does not suffer. It would be for the landsman, who was never out of sight of the shore, to imagin how he would steer the crazy ship in a hurricane of storm, and giv orders to the experienced captain.

But Elmina's last paragraph needs criticising as a whole; but I fear, Mr. Editor, you will be out of patience with my prolixity, therefore will only hint at what I would like to say.

"Death as natural as life." Yes; but is life painless because natural? The last breath, and many breaths previous, may be unconsciously drawn, but that does not prove that death and its antecedent, decay, are painless. "Well-born, well-reared, well-lived!"—well, Elmina, tell me who of us are these; not even yourself, I reckon. She says, to such "death is but a simple ending of all, painless and senseless, and not to be dreaded or feared more than being born." Who ever dreaded or feared to be born? Has Elmina turned transmigrationist? and does she expect a second birth which she will neither dread nor fear, because painless? or does she remember that she did not dread or fear being born in 1827?

How does she know that if "could we wake up and attempt to tell of the last moments, should we, as a general thing, be able to recall more of our feelings than we can those attending our birth?"

Let me say to her: You hav never died; wait till you hav and know, and then come back and tell us; or has the great Materialist, E. D. Slenker, already become a Spiritualist? and is her closing sentence given on the authority of some spirit who has "passed on" and returned to her with this important information, through some fifty-cent medium?

From a true Spiritualist, MARY V. CARPENTER.

ORANGE, CAL., March 5, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: W. S. Bell and E. C. Walker hav thoroughly used up the arguments of prohibitionists, and great credit is due them for so doing. No abler writers in the ranks of Liberalism hav dealt with this hobby of zealous but misguided reformers, and how W. F. Jamieson, and "Aunt" Elmina can withstand the effect of the pure reason and sound logic dispersed by these gentlemen, is suprising. Coercion, as a means of molding men's minds and regulating morality, is a bad thing to advocate, while the past remains as a warning against it, and Liberals, of all others, should be the last to war against personal freedom, and support measures that hav a tendency to increase restrictiv laws. Intemperance is more of an effect than a cause, for were the condition of society different it would be vastly diminished. It is not, as a class, the well-to-do, happy, and contented, that frequent the groggeries and dives, but those whose sphere of life is cast in the midst of poverty, hardship, and wretchedness, and they go there to forget and drown their misery; to raise their depressed feelings by artificial means; to revel in imaginary happiness, and soar for a time out of the depths of despair; for as one of these unfortunates remarked, "What's the use of being poor when twenty-five cents will make a man rich?" It is this poor, uneducated, and lowly class from which spring nine-tenths of all the crime attributed to intoxicating liquors; but no effort, comparativly, is made to benefit their existence by changing the unequal condition of affairs in society, and should those engaged in the attempt to prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicants succeed, it would only result in sending them into some other haunt of vice—the Chinaman's "opium joint," for instance—for misery looks down instead of up, and when hope has nearly fled, ambition dies and self-respect goes with it. Then but one desire remains—to kill time and gratify the morbid instincts of the body. But prohibition can never succeed, though laws upon laws are piled as high as the Washington monument; and should every distillery be razed to the ground, the demand for intoxicants would still cause their production. The attempt to restrict the manufacture of liquor invariably results in the illicit production of an inferior article, and modern science coupled with avarice now deals out chemicals and rain-water to fire the brain and enliven the poor man's spirits. Were pure liquors, such as our Christian ancestors brought over in the Mayflower, now used, that alone would lessen by one-half all the crimes attributed to strong drink, for it is the poison, the adulteration, the cheap chemicals in liquors, that in many cases transform the quiet and peaceful man into a very demon. I hav seen the effects of pure and impure liquors too much not to know this, and if the sale of such poisonous compounds could be restricted, there is no doubt that crime would be lessened. If the prohibitionists would turn their attention to this important matter, and work with half their present zeal for a high license law, they would accomplish some noticeable good; and would they take an activ part in instituting some of the social reforms now advocated, whereby the distribution of property would be more equal, and honesty as well as rascality could gain a decent livelihood, the cause of intemperance would cease to be a subject of such importance as it now is When every man possesses a home, and the fruits of his labor bring the comforts and necessaries of life, true happiness will supplant misery, and the desire, unless hereditary, to seek the fictitious in strong drink, will be greatly if not wholly removed. As society is now constituted, the man whose only wealth is his muscle can hardly supply the wants of the physical body, and to get a home, or accumulate property by fair, square means, is next to an impossibility. Though all wealth is the direct product of labor, the laborer is always poor, and if giant monopolies continue to crush out individual rights, and reduce the lower classes to more stringent servitude, a revolutoin will arise that will throw prohibition and temperance in the shade, for it will be a question of life or death. Within the next decade momentous changes are destined to occur, for there are evils afflicting society of far more importance than intemperance, and the whole civilized world is being agitated by revolutionary doctrins. The people, the masses, are beginning to wake from their lethargy, and find out that they hav rights as well as the patricians, the holders of wealth and power, and as sure as time continues those rights they'll claim.

To those who like good, solid mental food, and havn't yet done so, I would say procure a copy of W. S. Bell's lecture on anti-prohibition delivered at the New England Freethinkers' Convention, and chew it up. You will find he still retains his reputation as being one of the most logical speakers in the list of Freethinkers. C. SEVERANCE.

ST. CATHARINES, CAN., March 1, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: In looking over some of my file of the Herald of Progress, by A. J. Davis, published in 1863, it brought to my mind a series of articles on the science of marriage furnished by W. Byrd Powell, M.D., based upon the phrenological temperaments. He at that time was teaching this science to others, and in the series of articles he gave many remarkable, and apparently reliable, illustrations of the truthfulness of his science read from photographs; and he was thinking to publish the thing in full in book form, if his health permitted (it then being poor); but not long after that I saw a notice of his death.

If you do not think it would be asking too much, Mr. Editor, I would like to inquire through your cylumns if there is anyone extant who knows whether he succeeded to publish it as proposed; if not, it is lost to humanity, I fear—for the present, at least—unless some competent one or more took lessons of him and thereby preserved it; but it may be doubtful, for he said in one paragraph: "But who are those thus qualified to repeat my observations, and thus test the truth of the most important science ever announced to man? Some will answer, Our physicians. I know of but two who can do it, and they hav been my pupils; one of them is a lady. From my knowledge of the resources of the profession I feel safe in the inference that they are its only members in this or any other country who can do it."

I hope it is not lost, for from my limited knowledge and experience in the matter, I think as he did, that it is a study of great importance to humanity; and if he did succeed in putting it into book form I would much like to obtain a copy. He said that the development of the science had cost him nineteen years of toil, and that if anyone wished to be informed in the science, and would call on him at 319 West Third street, Cincinnati, Ohio, and take twenty-five or thirty lessons of him, of an hour each, he would qualify them respectivly to manipulate for themselvs.

Under the heading, "Physiological Laws in Relation to Marriage," he said: "I will incidentally remark here that I hold marriage to be a natural institution, and exclusivly amenable to physiological laws, and any legislation beyond enforcing obedience to the physiological laws is an insult to nature and an outrage upon human rights. As by the natural laws no one has a right to inflict an injury upon society, and as by the same laws society has a right to protection, hence it follows that no one has a right to tax society with idiotic, imbecil, blind, deaf, or scrofulous progeny."

Those are my sentiments and should be the sentiments of everyone.

If the doctor's science of compatibility of temperaments between the sexes is as correct and reliable as he was sanguin in believing it to be, it should be universally taught and promulgated. But the difficulty would arise in getting the sexes to heed and adopt it. They would prefer the old mode of courtship, and rely on what is called love in their choice, which has been considered in all time past the only true guide in such matters, but that we daily see is unreliable, in so far as that there is so little of true love in existence and exercised in those matters. Marriages produced from true love alone are, and always hav been, very scarce in this world of ours. Aside from those brought about by pecuniary motivs, not one marriage in twenty is, in my opinion, consummated with true love. Animal passion, mistaken for true love on the part of one or both, has been the consummater of the union; hence, after a time, the mistake is discovered and dissatisfaction arises on the part of one or both, and continues to increase until it becomes a feud ending either in constant quarreling, separation, or divorce. Under such circumstances, how can we expect the progeny of such parents to be other than what we see them daily. I often wonder that they prove to be so perfect as they are.

I will here incidentally say that my views upon matrimony differ materially from what custom has made it since Adam's time. I believe it to be one of the most solemn obligations that the sexes can enter into—more solemn even than the funeral.

Hoping this may meet the eye of some one who can giv some further information upon the subject, I remain

Yours as ever, C. B. THOMPSON.

P. S.—Since penning the above I see in THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 1st another contribution from Elliott Preston, headed "Suicide," which I fully indorse, more especially that under the heading "Marriage," also "Virtue or Chastity." It is more valuable than gold; and I say as he says in his last paragraph, I feel a loathing for such wretches I cannot express, and I would be even more severe on them than Shakspere (if possible) when he says:

"And put in every honest hand a whip,
To lash the rascal naked through the world." C. B. T.

EVOLUTION, March 6, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: As I am behind on my subscription, please find inclosed $2 to apply to the same, with thanks for the continuance of the indispensable TRUTH SEEKER.

As I am in receipt of a large number of letters of inquiry from Liberal friends, the most of whom are readers of your paper, I would like to reply to them through its columns. I hav not time to reply to so many personally, and another drawback is, it costs twenty-five cents apiece for every letter brought into the mines at present, which is no small sum for a poor man, although we are in hopes of a mail route being established in a short time, as we hav a post-office established at Eagle City, the principal place at present.

In the first place, the mineral belt is quite extensiv—80 or 100 miles in length, by 50 or more in width, and has been very little prospected as yet. The general features of the country, so far as tested, hold out good inducements to the adventurous, and those who are willing to endure hardships and undergo privations for the probability of obtaining riches. The mines that are opened, and those prospected on Prichard and Eagle Creeks, hav never been surpassed by any mines opened in the Rocky ranges, and the country that shows fair is very extensiv, and will without a doubt be one of the richest mining countries on the continent. The mountains are rough, and generally covered with timber, which in large sections has been killed by the fire, and much of it has fallen down and covered the ground with an overgrowth of young timber and brush, which makes it very tedious and laborious in exploring the country. There is but a small amount of agricultural land in the mountains, although there are several streams with bottoms from one-fourth to one-half a mile in width, with good soil, but they are generally covered with timber. The most of the streams where placer locations are made are quite wide—from 40 to 80 rods wide—and much of the ground expensiv to open and work, as the widest streams hav but little fall, and in many places the timber is heavy. The smaller gulches are easily worked, where there is sufficient water for sluicing. The quartz lodes are very plentiful through the entire belt, though very little prospecting has been done on them as yet; but many of them show free gold-bearing rock, and some very rich; also some Galena lodes carrying a rich per cent of silver. Many rich specimens of gold-bearing quartz hav been taken out, some of which would make the eye sparkle to behold them.

Now, as there are many asking advice about coming, I will say to such that I do not like to giv advice to any, and more particularly as I experienced a great lesson last spring by writing to a few of my friends. Although their intentions were good, it placed me in a very peculiar position. I wrote to T. Burke, an esteemed friend, whose friendship I prize highly, requesting him to giv information through the secrecy of the Liberal Leagues and some of the lecturers in the cause of Liberalism, also under the secrecy of the Leagues, when, to my surprise, I was visited by a stampede from Montana, which as I ascertained was in part occasioned by the publishing of my letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and in part by his friends being followed. They came early in the spring, through snow and high water, with the fever at boiling heat, many without grub or blankets, feet blistered, and generally in a pitiable condition. I tried to hav them go back to where they had left their stock and supplies, and wait until the snow went off, so that they could get in their supplies, and wait until the water ran down so that they could prospect; but they would listen to nothing, and nothing would do but a trip to the mines. They found snow and high water, and could do nothing, so they pronounced the mines a humbug, and myself a fraud, crazy, etc., also threatened hanging. After doing what damage they could, they left in disgust, and denounced the Cœur d'Alene mine to the world as a great swindle. But one grand feature of the humbug was that there was no one who made anything from it, as is generally the case, nor was there any one that expected it. I endeavored to throw what I could into the ranks of the Liberal class and laborers, as far as possible, and had the Liberals acted in accordance with my request, and sent agents through the different Leagues to investigate and see that the mines were likely to prove as reported, they might hav had the lion's share of what I had discovered; but they would listen to nothing, use no judgment, nor make any effort to see whether there were mines or not; and a crazier lot of men I never saw, although I hav witnessed several stampedes before, but a few remained, and a few more came in, and when the water ran down so that we could go to work it was soon shown to the world that the mines were all that I had stated, and also that I had told but a small part; and I found many pretended Liberals who acted very ungentlemanly. One stole a letter out of my house that I had written to T. Burke, and made a public thing of it, thinking to thereby injure me among the orthodox portion of the community, and succeeded for a time in turning away many of my friends, and I had to put up with a good deal of abuse for a good portion of the time. I was hardly able to be around, and some of the time confined to the house.

Now, I will say to those asking advice, this mineral belt is large, and but little prospected, and there will be many fortunes made very quickly; but, as the case has always been, there will be hundreds that will not get rich, and those who hav good homes and families had better remain and enjoy the comforts of life, for that is all that we can make use of to advantage. But there are many who are laboring and barely sustain life, and many with small means who might better their condition, for there will be a demand for all kinds of labor, and fair wages. There is already a good deal of capital going into the mines. Now, in conclusion, I would like to see my Liberal friends get their share of the hidden wealth, and will do anything I can, without sacrificing too much, to assist them or giv any information, and any questions asked through THE TRUTH SEEKER, or the Spokane Falls Review, of Spokane Falls, Washington Territory, I will gladly answer. Some hav sent me power of attorney to locate claims, but I hav had but little time to attend to them, and only located three for such. Another item, they never think of sending any money to pay expenses, and it costs three dollars to record a claim, and two or three men a day to measure, mark, and stake, and frequently hav to travel seven miles to locate and record.

I was stripped of most of my means by the stampeders, and hav had my claims jumped because sickness prevented me from defending them by brute force, regardless of law. I hav spent sixteen thousand dollars in gold, and nine faithful years of labor, before taking out anything of note, and to be robbed after spending years in the wilds of the mountains, excluding myself from society, and undergoing privations, whilst others were enjoying the comforts of life, is more of Christian civilization than I wish to become acquainted with. But such is Christian civilization where taught and practiced, and it is not the first time I hav felt its influence, for once I was financially ruined by the united efforts of the church because I would not kneel at their shrine and be made a tool of, instead of enforcing the law as an officer, as I was sworn to do. I hav no use for their creeds or their gods, neither do I court their heaven or fear their hell, or bother about imaginary things beyond this life. I think they should practice the religion of humanity, and improve the heaven we hav in sight, by adding to the comforts of life, and living in brotherhood so that all may share some of the privileges which nature has placed where man can enjoy them.

Hoping the day is fast approaching when all may be free from the fetters of superstition, and hav the privilege of expressing their sentiments without fear of offending Christ's chosen people, I remain, Yours truly, A. J. PRICHARD.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"His life is long whose work is well,
And be his station low or high,
He who the most good works can tell,
Livs longest though he soonest die."

Nobility.

BY ALICE CARY.

True worth is in being, not seeming;
In doing each day that goes by
Some little good—not in dreaming
Of great things to do by-and-by.
For, whatever men say in blindness,
And spite of the fancies of youth,
There's nothing so kingly as kindness,
And nothing so royal as truth.

We get back our mete as we measure—
We cannot do wrong and feel right;
Nor can we giv pain and gain pleasure,
For Justice avenges each slight.
The air for the wing of the sparrow,
The bush for the robin and wren,
But always the path that is narrow
And straight for the children of men.

We cannot make bargains for blisses,
Nor catch them like fishes in nets;
And sometimes the things our life misses
Help more than the things which it gets.
For good lieth not in pursuing,
Nor gaining of great nor of small;
But just in the doing, and doing
As we would be done by, is all.

Thro' envy, thro' malice, thro' hating,
Against the world, early and late,
No jot of our courage abating—
Our part is to work and to wait.
And slight is the sting of his trouble
Whose winnings are less than his worth;
For he who is honest is noble,
Whatever his fortunes or birth.

Bowser and the Pears.

About fifty years ago, when I was a very little boy, and could just begin to run away from home to see the farmers work in the fields, I remember distinctly some things that happened, and which made a lasting impression upon my mind, and I hav concluded to write them for the Children's Corner. They hav the merit of being true storirs, and not pure fiction.

If any lesson in life is more important than another, it is the fact that every thought and act of our lives go to make up what we call the mind; that is, our experiences which are recorded on what we call the memory. The memory and the ability to reason upon it by reproducing our former thoughts and states of feeling are what constitute our minds. How important, then, that we do nothing and think nothing but what will make us hapyy when we are compelled to remember it. for day by day, and year by year, is the memory built up, like placing one brick upon another to complete a house. Do not forget the lesson, and see how important is every act of life.

I lived in the lower end of Berks county, Pennsylvania, near where I was born, when my litttle story or history took place, and one day noticed a canal-boat tying up at the landing near our house. It was a boat used for the purpose of hauling lime for the farmers. That is the finest farming section of the Schuylkill Valley. The farmers put lime on their land to make it warm by giving off carbon to the soil. When the lime comes in contact with the moist soil and air it slakes and generates heat, which is as necessary on some land as a warm dose of tea or coffee is to some people.

I was attracted to the boy that drives the horse belonging to the boat, who said, "Hey, sonny. don't you want a ride?" (He was taking his horse over to the shed, as they intended unloading lime all day.) Of course I did. Where is the little boy that does not want a ride? And I had up to this time never been upon a horse's back. Said he, "I'll hold you on," and so he did, and I rode to the shed as proud as a major, and when he took me off I imagined I had accomplished a great thing. I had rode on a horse. After a while he said, "Sonny, don't you know where we can get some apples and pears?"

"Yes," said I, for the country was full of the most delicious fruit, and it was just in pear time. So I asked mother, and she allowed me to go along. We went to the next farmhouse. a Mr. Yeokum's. When we got near the house and the fine pear-trees inside the yard fence, the large black dog perceiving a stranger would not allow the boy to get over the fence. I got over and went up to old Bowser, whose friendly tail began to wag with delight as my soft little hand stroked him along the back. "Come on," said I; "he will not hurt you;" but while he wagged his tail for me, he would not take his eyes off the boy, and had nothing but growls for him. His head and tail did not agree. His tail was all joy, while his grinning teeth showed that he was mad at that end of his body, so that every attempt the boy made to get over brought forth a growl that meant business. He was a dog that could entertain more than one idea at a time; he was mad at one end and glad at the other. His tail-end said to me, "You are welcome; you hav confidence in me, and like me, and I like you. You hav lain down with me in the warm sun, when I was dog lazy, at the cellar door, and stroked me on the back and played with my cat-whiskers at the mouth, and pinched my tail, and tickled and scratched me, and never did a naughty thing to me. I always liked you, and we are friends. But that fellow I don't like. He is a boat-boy. They always throw rocks at me from the towing path and try to hurt me when I am not able to get after them without getting into the canal. I don't trust them; and so the fellow might as well go—he shall not come inside of this yard."

At last, finding that Bowser was determined, I said, "I'll get the pears, and you can stay there," but the boy concluded to go far enough away to keep clear of the dog, and it was a pleasure to see both ends of that dog laugh when he saw the lad moving away. He marched up to the door as though to introduce me to Miss Mary, who just then came out and learned my wishes. She was a very kind-hearted girl, and I can see her now as she went around that beautiful pear-tree with a very long pole, touching the nice yellow fruit from place to place until I had more than I could carry. cap full, all my pockets so full that they would not stay in; and it gave me more trouble to secure the over-load, or to pick up and replace those that would roll off my cap and creep out of my pockets than to carry the main load, so that when I got to the yard fence I was unable to move, but Miss Mary hoisted me and my load of pears over the fence at a bound. It makes my heart beat faster now as I think of the real goodness of those farmers of fifty years ago.

I bade Miss Mary good-bye, and shook my hand at Bowser, who was sorry to see me go away without having a romp with him, and then I toddled off as fast as I could, in search of the boy who had gone to his boat. It was a big treat for him, and I got many words of flattery because I was not afraid of good old Bowser, with whom I had a good acquaintance. This fellow was an adept at flattery, and I could hardly get away from him, but I did make out to get my dinner, when mother told me I must not go with him any more, after I related my adventure.

As soon as he got his eyes on me, however, he coaxed me to come; I resisted for a time, but at last he prevailed, and towards night I was again with him. He wanted some more pears, and finally he offered me five cents if I would go for some more. I had, up to that time, earned only a sixpence, and I got that from a gentleman who came to hear my brother play the violin. He said, "Sonny, if you will dance, I will giv you something," so I pitched in, and he laughed immoderately at the way I crossed my feet and pranced around. and then handed me a Mexican sixpence, so I thought for five cents I might do it; but I knew it was late, and decidedly wrong to go when I was told not to, but that selfish boy teased and persuaded, until I went again and I got him the pears; but from that day to this I never got the five cents. and, to make matters worse, I did get a switching, which, probably, I deserved, first for disobedience, and secondly for the trick I played and the anxiety I gave the whole family by my getting lost.

I wanted the five cents from the boy. and so remained out until quite dark, coaxing him to come up to his bargain. The best I could do was to get a promis to pay me when his boat came again.

I was afraid to go home, and watching my chance, I slipped into the hall-way and went up to my bed, and, losing my supper, left mother and my brothers and sisters hunting their lost boy among the neighbors.

When almost frantic with fears for my safety, one of my sisters bethought her to look in my bed and so discovered me. She soon hallowed out, "Here he is! here he is!" and there I was, shaking like a guilty culprit. It seemed that everything I did to avoid the responsibility of my first bad act only made things worse, which is generally the case. My mother, who is still living, nearly eighty-nine years of age, was both glad and sorry—glad that I was safe, and sorry that I had disobeyed her, and not knowing all the circumstances of the case, nor the sore temptations I had, thought I deserved a switching. and I got it; but I think some of my readers, if they are as kind-hearted as Miss Mary who gave me the pears, will pity me just a little when I tell them that when that bad and lying boy returned with his boat, on asking him for the five cents, he began to use very profane language, and actually threatened to pitch me into the canal if I told his captain of it.

If I had known as much of the character of that boy as the dog instinct shown by Bowser, I never should hav got into that scrape.

Our Puzzle Box.

A PUZZLE ENGAGEMENT.

There were ten little fellows came out to play,
Who belonged to a lady just over the way;
Just five pairs of twins, and, permit me to say,
I ne'er saw a lovelier, brighter array.
I kissed that dear lady one day—by mistake—
When I thought that most surely my poor head must break,
For a box with some nails these dear urchins would make,
Which the lady declared I must take for her sake.
Then the other five urchins came up to my side,
And a similar box to the first soon supplied;
Soon a swift emulation in boxes I spied
Surging up to my ears like a great ocean tide;
But my patience soon caused all this din to subside—
I am soon to be married—this lady my bride!
To one of these urchins, most faithful and bold,
Like a gallant young knight in the days of old,
I hav given a helmet of tempered gold;
To another, a thing that you need not be told,
Is a diamond most precious and bright to behold.
But, "Who is this widow?" I hear you exclaim.
She is not a widow—she ne'er was a dame;
And her life has been spotless and free from all blame.
"But these urchins?" Well, now, don't you see, it's my aim
That you shall my "second-hand family" name;
And the ring, and the helmet, and boxes explain,
And where there's a tangle, untangle the same.

PARADOXES.

I can be wicked without sin;
I can go out, and still be in;
I never use the noxious weed,
But snuffing is just what I need;
And without snuffing—'tis no joke—
I'm very much inclined to smoke;
I do not drink, but, on the whole,
I cannot do without my bowl.
But I've said enough; my head is light;
Just try my snuff—so—so—good night.

CROSS-WORD.

In blue, not in red;
In green, not in said;
In rain, not in time;
In bear, not in rhyme;
In flutter, not in gutter;
In great, not in low;
In low, not in great;
In end, not in bottom;
In rear, not in forgotten.
My whole is a noted man.

Correspondence.

HARWINTON, CONN., March 17, 1884.

DEAR MISS WIXON: My brother wrote to you a short time ago, so I thought I would try. I cannot make puzzles very well, but sometime I will send you some. The answer of the "Geographical Enigma" in THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 15th is Scandinavian. I am the same age as Hattie Otinger. I am twelve. Papa takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I think a great sight more of it now than I did before the Children's Corner was put in. I go to school and study arithmetic, spelling, geography, reading, grammar. I hope all the boys and girls who read the Corner will write direct to me. I would try and answer them all. Now, Miss Wixon, if you don't think this fit to print, throw it aside. Hoping to see more correspondence in the Children's Corner, I remain your true friend. To those who would like to write to me, my address is, EDITH BALDWIN.

AN anti-vivisectionist meeting was held in Paris recently. The Beaumarchais Theater, in which the meeting was held, was not half filled. Clovis Hagues admitted that vivisection had rendered services to humanity, but protested against its abuse. Mr. Edward Mills spoke against the practice altogether, but was met with expressions of dissent, as well as of approval.

BIBLE MYTHS

AND THEIR

Parallels in Other Religions.

Being a Comparison of the Old and New Testament Myths and Miracles with those of heathen nations of Antiquity, Considering also their Origin and Meaning. With numerous Illustrations.

The object of the work is to point out the myths with which the Old and New Testaments abound; to show that they were held in common with other nations; and then trace them to their evident origin and explain their meaning.

"It has long been acknowledged by the most eminent biblical students that the Hebrew scriptures contain a large mythical element; but, so far as we know, the present is the first complete and scholarly attempt to trace these myths to their source, and ascertain their original signification."—Boston Courier.

"Never before has there been given a volume to the reading world that shows the research for the origin of these myths as does this one just published by J. W. Bouton, of New York."—Boston Times.

"It is unquestionably true that the results of a rationalistic study of the Christian scriptures are nowhere else so accessible as they are now made in the work before us.—N. Y. Sun.

Deceased Dogmatism.—Obituary.

"The mills of the gods grind slowly,
But they grind exceeding fine."

This old maxim has been strikingly verified among the god-mills of this place. Since the insolent "counter-petition" attack by the local clergy on our noble friend Bennett while in the hands of Judge Benedict and his holy inquisitors these theological millers hav ground their audiences down so fine that they are now scarcely tangible. Since the times that tried men's souls, when the pulpiteers of our popular churches had combined to crush that brave champion of Freethought and annihalate the little band of Spartans that stood by him, this priest-ridden place has been periodically shaken by a profusion of little tempests in the form of anti-sabbatarian circulars, medical rights, Satans unmasked, and other seditious breezes that hav swept over the city and caused pietists to pall with fear.

The present status of godliness, in contrast with that of those days, will appear from the lucubrations of lamenting Christians published in local journals under the sensational headings of "Reckless Church Extravagance—Small Congregations—Degeneracy of Religous Worship,' etc. Among other sorry statements, these candid correspondents confess: "The cry is going up from several of our city churches, not, 'What shall we do to be saved?' but, 'How can we raise funds to meet church expenses?'" From all accounts the majority of our churches financially are in nearly a bankrupt condition, and were it not for the extra contributions of a few of the more wealthy members who are importuned from year to year to come to the rescue with heavy subscriptions would hav been closed ere this. . . . The Sunday morning attendance makes hardly a respectable showing, but the evening attendance has dwindled down to so low an ebb and the listeners are so few and scattering that our clergymen preach mostly to empty pews. One of our aristocratic churches has lately averaged only fifteen or twenty listeners at Sunday evening services, and some of our other high-toned places of worship are so thinly attended that the more zealous Christians are getting discouraged at the falling off of churchgoers. . . . What a contrast of religious zeal then and now! At present a rainy Sunday thins out a congregation so that there are not enough present to make it an object to pass the contribution boxes. In addition to operatic music, it will soon require attractions in the way of oyster suppers, trapeze performances, and ballet dancing to fill the churches and pay expenses."

In order to comfort the mourners, and call their attention to a higher conception of human life, the writer published the annexed semi-obituary in commemoration of departed greatness, entitled "Decadence of the Church."

DECADENCE OF THE CHURCH.

TO THE EDITOR OF COOLEY'S WEEKLY, Sir: Your correspondents in the last two numbers seem to be greatly perturbed in spirit by the fearful falling off of church attendance, and a degeneracy of fashionable religious worship. The cause of this disaffection and laxity among church patrons is attributed solely to reckless church extravagance and the consequent increase in pew rent.

Admitting the facts as stated by your correspondents regarding the extravagance and aristocratical proclivities of the church, yet, evidently, there are other causes far more potent in deterring people from supporting the theological conceptions of past ages, as imposed by the pulpit on the intelligence of the present day.

So long as the priesthood could monopolize all the assumed knowledge or speculativ theories pertaining to a future existence, and thereby hold the people in religious subservience; so long as it could make the people believe they were "totally depraved," and by nature fit subjects for an endless hell; so long as it could hold over their heads, as a menace, a merciless God and a malicious devil vieing with each other for the supremacy; so long as they believed that the church was the proprietor of a "plan of salvation" whereby they might serve Satan and "roll sin as a sweet morsel under the tongue" during a lifetime, and at the last moment, through a moral bankrupt scheme, cheat the devil out of his dues, snap their fingers in the face of justice, skip hell and jump into the New Jerusalem; so long as the lash of fear could be wielded over ignorance, with jeweled crowns and golden harps guaranteed to the credulous, just so long was the church filled and supported by its votaries.

Evidently the increase of knowledge and a corresponding decadence of faith is the grand cause of popular apostasy, since where ignorance most abounds fear, faith, and full coffers of the church much more abound, as witness the costly cathedrals constructed and most magnificently maintained by the great mother church through the sweat of toiling millions. But the superstitious faith of past ages is being dispelled by the light of science, and the theological bugbears of mental childhood hav dissolved into thin nothingness. Moral philosophers hav learned that there is no escape for the transgressor of nature's laws, but that she will exact penalties to the utmost farthing; that each individual is dependent on personal effort to work out his own salvation, and that a reliance on the merits of another has proved a lamentable failure. It is evident that weak intellects are lured into the haunts of vice by a false hope of an easy escape from its moral consequences, for it is a well known fact that our penitentiaries are filled almost exclusivly with avowed believers in the orthodox dogma of a vicarious escape from merited punishment—from the inexorable results of a depraved life. While on the other hand intelligent people who hav learned the grand lessons of human life, and who realize the inflexible nature of the higher moral laws, are seldom found within prison walls, except as victims of religious intolerance, for they know that a wrong inflicted on another will inevitably injure the perpetrator far more than the subject. Hence common sense people hav come to the conclusion that there is something radically wrong in the fundamental teachings of theology, and that there is a more direct road to human happiness than through the iron gateway of total depravity and vicarious atonment. This is the reason why intelligent people flock to hear the grand truths proclaimed by the radical reformers of the present day, and this is why there are so many vacant seats in the sanctuary.

Lambert's Notes on Ingersoll.

CHAPTER I.

Lambert.—That which is eternal is infinit.

Comment.—Matter is eternal; therefore "it is infinit."

L.—That which is infinit must be infinit in every way.

C.—Matter is infinit; unlimited in every way. "Now matter is not limited." Therefore Lambert's assertion is absolutely false, that matter is limited.

L.—Matter is subject to change, and change involves limitation.

C.—God is subject to change, and "change involves limitation."

L.—Change supposes succession, therefore limitation.

C.—God "supposes" succession, therefore limitation. God cannot make two hills without a valley between, and therefore this is God's "limitation."

L.—If mind is matter, it must obey the forces that govern and regulate the action of matter.

C.—The forces that govern matter are as variable and invariable as Lambert's variable god! Therefore all his arguments are sophistical and untrue. If all things are governed by Lambert's God, "As well might we reason with a clock for running too fast, with fire for burning, or with a tree for growing."

CHRISTIAN RESPONSIBILITY.

Lambert.—"We hold ourselvs responsible to all the glib little whiffets of his (Ingersoll's) shallow school." [Bully for Lambert!]

Comment.—We hav taken away Lambert's God, his only foundation; and now Christianity (like Lambert) is unproved, unphilosophical, infinitly cruel, unnatural, and absolutely impossible and false! E. N. KINGSLEY.

Stray Scraps.

MR. EDITOR: Your space is too much occupied for me to write long articles, but I often read something in the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER to which I would like to respond, pro or con, and as these scraps are but direct answers to questions propounded by your correspondents, I trust you will find room for them. ELLA E. GIBSON.

Barre, Mass., March 25, 284.

Mr. Elliott Preston, I agree with you on vivisection.

Mr. S. G. Scollay, Joliet, Ill., TRUTH SEEKER, March 8th, I agree with you mainly, also, that "electricity and magnetism acting upon matter constitute the soul; and when the body dies it passes back to its great fountain [that fountain being nature], and soul and body both lose their identity."

Your idea that there "is an ethereal telegraph that will yet be discovered by which a person may, here in America, commune or converse with another living person in any part of the globe," has been my belief for upward of thirty years.

I think with you, also, that the so-called "mediums" are nothing but "connecting wires," though I should express myself differently. I believe life to be refined, etherealized human electricity individualized.

Prohibition I advocate, not as a reform, but as a protection, the same as I believe in a law against thieving for the protection of property, and a law against murder for the protection of life. ELLA E. GIBSON.

D. M. BENNETT'S LAST WORK.

A TRUTH SEEKER

Around the World.

FOUR LARGE VOLUMES.

With a steel plate engraving of the author in Vol. I. and each volume illustrated with forty-seven cuts.

BY D. M. BENNETT,

Late editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, author of "A Truth Seeker in Europe," "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," "Champions of the Church," etc., etc.

Handsomely bound in red cloth, $6.50; in leather, red edges, $9.50; in morocco, gilt edges, $10.50.

Readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER know the circumstances nder which this work was written. The last words penned by the great author were for the fourth volume which was nearly completed at his death, and which will now contain an account of his world-lamented death and burial. MR. Bennett was a very patient and faithful chronicler of the habits and customs of the different peoples of the many places he visited. The every-day life of all nations is laid before the reader by one who has visited them and beheld them with his own eyes. Particular attention is paid to the progress of Freethought in the various countries he visited, and the morality of so-called pagan nations is contrasted with the morality of Christian countries, much to the detriment of the latter The work is a

Freethinker's History of the World.

This work and "A TRUTH SEEKER IN EUROPE" should be in every Liberal's library Besides its intrinsic worth it is a memento of one of the greatest Freethinkers the world has known—of one who ranks with Voltaire and Paine in the force and clearness of his writings.

TESTIMONIALS:

Read the following testimonials, and be convinced that our claims are correct in every particular and that your ailments can be eradicated without the aid of MEDICIN. THESE APPLIANCES ARE THE ACME OF PERFECTION:

Remarkable Cure of Paralysis in One Week.

CINCINNATI, Dec. 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: As I feel greatly indebted to you for the benefit I hav received from your treatment, and the use of your Magnetic appliances, I can say without hesitation to those afflicted as I hav been that the effect was simply marvelous. Two weeks ago I was stricken with paralysis in my right arm and could not use it at all, but after wearing a suit of your MAGNETIC CLOTHING for one week, can use it quite as well as ever. I hav also been troubled with Dyspepsia and Kidney Complaint for a number of years, from which I hav suffered intensely, and, although doctoring all the time, never found but temporary relief. Since putting on your appliances I hav experienced great benefit, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav in the past two weeks, will soon be well. I would, therefore, recommend to those suffering as I hav your Magnetic appliances as the only means of effecting a sure cure. Yours respectfully,

WM. H. CLEMMER,
No. 80 Eastern avenue.

Remember that the same appliances which will effect a cure in a case of Paralysis will at the same time eradicate CATARRH or DYSPEPSIA in the same patient. We do not, like the Old School Physician, change medicins every day until, after dosing the patient almost to death, he may possibly strike something (if he is very skilful) that brings relief for the time being.

Neuralgia of the Heart of Six Years Standing Cured in Three Weeks.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., Dec. 11, 1882.

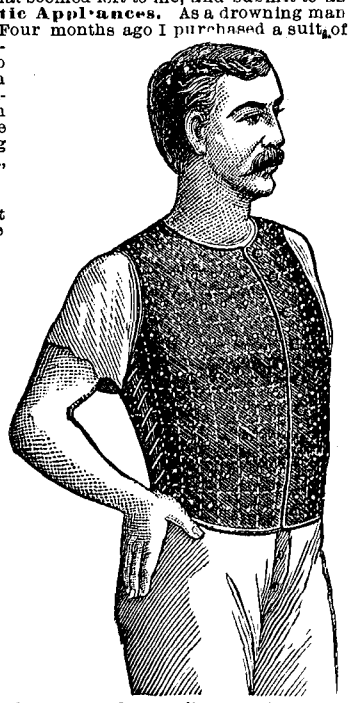
DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: After wearing one of your MAGNETIC VESTS for about three weeks, I was entirely cured of Neuralgia of the Heart and Side, which had been a source of misery to me for the last six years. I had tried numerous remedies before without benefit, but as soon as I put on the MAGNETIC VEST I got relief instantly. With unbounded gratitude, I remain

Yours respectfully,
H. A. BROWN.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been under drug treatment for eight years with nervous prostration and female weakness:

OSBORN, O., Dec. 15, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY: Your letter just received; also the Clothing on Tuesday last. Fitted perfectly. FELT BETTER FROM THE FIRST HOUR I HAD THEM ON. Am not joking, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav since Tuesday, will soon be well. Will report again soon. Respectfully yours, E. J. K.



This lady reports herself entirely cured in less than six weeks after putting on the garments, and, although in bed, unable to get out, when applied, she nevertheless was able to ride twenty miles in two days after the application. The lady's name can be had upon application at this office, by anyone desiring to communicate with her.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been suffering for two years with an Ovarian Tumor, and who had been told that nothing but the knife would save her life, and the chances were as 9 to 1 against recovery. In four months' time she is perfectly well, and has not taken a dose of medicin since putting on the appliances. Consult us when your physician tells you he can do nothinog for you; it will pay you.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., November 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY, Dear Sir: About two years ago my health began to fail me; I became nervous, lost all desire for food, and, in fact, began to fail rapidly, so that I became alarmed and consulted several physicians of St. Louis, at which place I was then stopping, all of whom declared that I had an Ovarian Tumor, and that the only thing that would save my life would be the knife. About six months ago I grew rapidly worse, and had about made up my mind to take the only course that seemed left to me, and submit to an operation, when my attention was called to the Eureka Magnetic Appliances. As a drowning man will catch at a straw, so did I catch at this faint hope of a cure. Four months ago I purchased a suit of your appliances. From the very first I felt invigorated, the tumor, which had extended entirely across my abdomen, began to decrease, my pains became less from day to day, until now I am as well as I ever was in my life. Since putting on the appliances I hav not taken a single dose of medicin. My bowels, which before were constipated, are now regular. I would therefore cheerfully recommend them to anyone suffering as I hav, believing that they will do all and more than you claim for them. I remain,

Gratefully yours, MRS. MARY J. STEWART.

Remember that these appliances are not worn next the skin, but over the under-garment, and, unlike all other appliances in the market, they impart no shocks and leaves no sores.

Children's garments upon application.

Any of the above garments sent to any address upon receipt of price, and we will return the money if they are not as represented in every respect. If you are uncertain as to what would best suit your case send us word stating symptoms, and we will advise you what would be best suited to treat you. While our appliances are offered at less than one-third of what others are selling worthless appliances for, yet we will guarantee that the magnetic quality is a hundred fold superior to any other appliance ever offered the public, and will outlast the garments themselves. Every magnet is put through a particular process, and hav raised five times their own weight six months after being magnetized, while not a single appliance in the market will attract the smallest particle of iron, the majority of such worthless appliances having so-called magnets made of material no better than hoop-iron, and not capable of retaining magnetism for a moment. All of our garments are made from the very best material for the purpose, and will outlast any and all other garments now before the public. Every magnet is arranged in the garments upon scientific principles, and not haphazard as in all the others. We offer you therefore

The Only Scientific Magnetic Appliance Ever Constructed.

And challenge comparison with any of the so-called magnetic garments now offered under that head. At the same time the application of labor-saving machinery in our manufacture enables us to offer them about

ONE-THIRD THE PRICE HERETOFORE CHARGED,

So that we can say with truth, None are so poor that they cannot procure them, being but a trifle higher than ordinary clothing.

Remember that we are offering you the cheapest and best magnetic appliances in the market, and if upon receiving the garments they do not meet your expectation, return them at our expense and we will refund your money.

Ladies' Abdominal Jackets and Gentlemen's Vests are made to order, and a fit guaranteed.

Gems of Thought.

WHEN told that twice two makes four, that two halves are equal to a whole, that a part is less than the whole, we are compelled to believe it, because it is sustained by evidence and our own experience, and we could not doubt it if we tried. But to believe without evidence, to accept without investigation, to admit apparent impossibilities without a vestige of proof, is not a virtue; it is not conducive to morality. Strange and unnatural things should not be believed until unmistakable evidence is forthcoming.—D. M. Bennett.

THE Muggletonian sect hav a very cold way of dealing with people. If I, the Professor, will only giv in to the Muggletonian doctrin, there shall be no question through all that persuasion that I am competent to judge of that doctrin; nay, I shall be quoted as evidence of its truth, while I liv, and cited after I am dead as testimony in its behalf; but if I utter any ever so slight anti-Muggletonian sentiment, then I become "incompetent to form any opinion on the matter." . . . Now, I hold that he whose testimony would be accepted in behalf of the Muggletonian doctrin has a right to be heard against it. Whoso offers me any article of belief for my signature implies that I am competent to form an opinion upon it; and if my positiv testimony in its favor is of any value, then my negativ testimony against it is also of value.—O. W. Holmes.

"HAV patience," I replied; "ourselvs are full
Of social wrong; and may be wildest dreams
Are but the needful preludes of the truth.
For me the genial day, the happy crowd,
The sport half science, fill me with a faith,
This fine old world of ours is but a child
Yet in the go-cart. Patience! Giv it time
To learn its limits; there is a hand that guides.
—Tennyson.

I HOLD one simple faith throughout the days
That wear on slowly to an unknown end—
A faith which glorifies the darkest ways
That lead me to my friend.

I may not understand the reason why
Some things are hidden which I fain would see;
My faith, the faith by which I liv—or die—
Is still enough for me.

And thus it is I am content to wait,
For fear and questioning to doubt belong.
Love knows but this, and proves it, soon or late:
The king can do no wrong.
—Manhattan Magazine

THERE is a very large amount of blind acquiescence in, or tacit acceptance of, propositions which never become the subject of any real or practical state. These beliefs, falsely so called, confuse the line of demarcation between mere intellectual notions and states of credence or conviction. Of this nature is the acceptance given by the mass of mankind to the statements they are accustomed to hear from the better informed class respecting the facts of science and the transactions of history. They do not dispute these statements, and yet they might be little disposed to commit their serious interests to such facts. So with regard to the religious creed handed down from parent to child. Some are found believing in the full import of the term; others, opposing no negativ in any way, yet never perform any actions or entertain either hopes or fears, as a consequence of their supposed acceptance of the religion of their fathers; their belief, accordingly, must be set down as a nonentity.—Chambers's Encyclopedia.

THE busy hav no time to be fidgety. He who is following his plow will not be breaking windows with the mob. Little is gained by overthrowing an idol, unless you restore the idea of which it is the shell and sediment. Nor will you find any plan so effectiv for keeping folks from doing harm, as teaching them to employ their faculties in doing good, and giving them plenty of good work to do.—Guesses at Truth.

CERTAINLY virtue is like precious odors, most fragrant where they are inclosed or crushed; for prosperity doth best discover vice, but adversity doth best discover virtue.—Bacon's Essays.

THEY never fall who die
In a great cause: the block may soak their gore;
Their heads may sodden in the sun; their limbs
Be strung to city gates and castle walls,
But still their spirit walks abroad. —Byron.

THE trivial harp will never please,
Or fill my craving ear;
Its chords should ring, as blows the breeze,
Free, peremptory, clear;
No jingling serenader's art,
Nor tinkle of piano-strings,
Can make the wild blood start
In its mystic springs.

The kingly bard
Must smite the chords rudely and hard,
As with hammer or with mace,
That they may render back
Artful thunder which conveys
Secrets of the solar track,
Sparks of the super-solar blaze. —Emerson.

WE are learning to say, If the negro can learn, let him learn; if woman can preach, or practice law and medicin, let her do it; if anybody, at any time or place, can get or do any good, let him hav a chance to try; and whatever is in the way of this free movement, let it be put aside.—Christian Register.

WHAT you would not hav them do to you.' This is the substance of the law; the rest is only its application.—The Bible for Learners.

THE individual does not exist for the sake of society, as the Positivists would hav us believe, but society exists for the sake of the individual. And the test of complete social life is the opportunity which it affords for complete individual life. Tried by this test, our contemporary civilization will appear seriously defectiv—excellent only as a preparation for something better.—John Fiske.

PROSPECTUS OF

The Truth Seeker

FOUNDED BY D. M. BENNETT.

THE LEADING FREETHOUGHT JOURNAL OF THE WORLD.

LARGEST, CHEAPEST, BEST.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY, AT $3.00 PER YEAR; $1.50 FOR SIX MONTHS.

SAMPLE COPIES FREE.

33 CLINTON PLACE, NEW YORK CITY.

Among the reforms THE TRUTH SEEKER aims to effect are:

Total separation of church and state, including the equitable taxation of church property; secularization of the public schools, abolition of Sunday laws, abolition of chaplaincies, prohibition of public appropriations for religious purposes, and all other measures necessary to the same general end.

Its sixteen large pages are filled every week with scientific, philosophic, and Freethought articles and communications by the ablest Freethinkers in the country. It givs all the Liberal news, and keeps its readers posted on current secular and theological events. It is the armory from which hundreds draw their weapons in contests with priesthood. All the Liberal papers are good, but THE TRUTH SEEKER is

THE BEST AND LARGEST.

It is conducted in a broad and truly liberal spirit, and givs everyone a hearing upon all subjects pertaining to the welfare of the human race.

OPINIONS REGARDING IT.

A paper like THE TRUTH SEEKER is something more and better than an advocate of truth. Through it its subscribers touch elbows with each other. Each reader knows that he is one of a goodly company who find comfort and inspiration in its pages. If they should meet each other they would feel like brothers and sisters. They hav lived under one intellectual roof, felt the glow of the same fireside, and broken together the bread of life. Such a paper is to thousands a substitute for the church.—GEORGE CHAINEY, in This World.

THE TRUTH SEEKER, founded by D. M. Bennett, is to-day perhaps the strongest foe with which superstition has to contend, and a long future of great usefulness is, we trust and believe, before it.—Winted, Conn., Press.

There ought to be five hundred subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER in this county, just to rebuke the infamous church bigots who are using force and fraud to suppress Liberalism.—Worthington, Minn., Advance.

This sterling and widely-circulated Freethought journal has won its way deep into the hearts of its readers. THE TRUTH SEEKER is a great paper, and deserves the most generous support of the Liberal public. The recent numbers received are splendid in every respect.—San Francisco Universe.

THE TRUTH SEEKER has gathered its resources, and will be a stronger, better, and brighter paper than ever.—Liberal League Man.

THE TRUTH SEEKER has become a necessity to the Liberal cause.—Kansas Blade.

Odds and Ends.

WHEN you see a counterfeit on the sidewalk always pick it up. You are liable to arrest if you try to pass it.

"I DOAN like too much humbleness," says Uncle Ople Reade. "De worm is so low dat he crawls, an he eats yer airter yer dead."

A FRENCH dramatist makes one of his characters in a recent play declare that he is "holding up the trousers of despair with the suspenders of hope."

"HAV you anything against Brother Watson?" "Nuffin', boss; not de fust thing. Only he's a clergyman. But he may be an hones' man for all dat."

A HOBOKEN grocer received this order from a customer: "Please send in by barer two pounds of shughar, a blackin' brush, five pounds of coffey, and some little nails, my wife had a baby last night, also two pad-locks and a monkey wrench."

"YOUR fare, young lady," said the conducted, as a pretty young miss stepped from his car, and was about tripping away. "Oh, thank you!" responded the absent-minded little beauty. "I think your mustache becomes you real well, too." She got her ride free.

A CHICAGO man got hold of the wrong jug the other day, and took a big drink of a mixture of kerosene oil and muriatic acid. Then he accused the servant girl of stealing his whisky, and pouring water in the jug to conceal the theft.

"THE trouble is with you young fellows nowadays, you want to begin where your fathers left off," said an old chap out West. "I don't want to begin where my father left off," replied one of the young fellows present. "No? And where did your father leave off?" "He was hung."

IN California the other day, just as the minister had concluded a marriage ceremony, the bride shot the groom dead. With a thoughtful sympathy and loving solicitude strangely out of place in the wild and uncouth West she put him out of his misery almost before he got into it.

TOGETHER they were looking over the paper. "Oh, my, how funny!" said she. "What is it?" he asked. "Why, here's an advertisment that says, 'No reasonable offer refused.'" "What's so odd about that?" "Nothing, nothing," she replied, trying to blush, "only those are my sentiments."

AT a Lake Erie pleasure resort last summer a certain small party of young ladies were out for a sail. The yacht was managed by a handsome young boatman, who unconsciously made a mash on the jolly girls. "Shall I hug the shore?" asked the sailor. "Well—yes—if that's the best you can do," was the reply of one of the girls.

THERE is a woman in Fargo who takes the flour. Her husband had treated her rather coldly for some time, and she hired a girl to sit around the house, play the piano, do fancy work, etc., while she did the cooking and the housework; the result is her husband heads her off in the hallway seven or eight times a day and kisses her, and in the evening when her work is done he makes love to her on the back stairs, takes her down town, jams oysters and ice cream down her neck, and pays her the closest attention. There's nothing like being a servant girl.

I ASKED my little love one day,
My saucy, witching Lu,
"If she would be my own through life,
My angel good and true."

But she tossed her nut-brown ringlets,
And said "she did not care
To be an angel yet awhile,
This world seemed very fair."

O Lu! My heartless, cruel one,
With mouth like Cupid's bow.
Why will you always laugh at me,
How can you treat me so?

Why will you lift that little nose
In haughtiest disdain?
Pray tell me that my pleadings, dear,
Hav not been all in vain.

She turned her merry eyes on me,
O'er brimmed with fun and life,
"I cannot be an angel, Fred;
But—I will be your wife."

LAST Wednesday morning Mr. Professor Jimson and Mr. Biglip Jarvis might hav been discovered purifying the walls and ceilings of a house on Tenth street with the liquid essence of lime. They had finished two rooms and were engaged upon a third when the eagle eye of Mr. Jimson espied a lady's portemonnaie lying on the bureau in the adjoining room. "Biglip," said Mr. Jimson softly, "look dar." "Look whar, Popco'n?" inquired Mr. Jarvis. "In dar," returned Mr. Jimson cautiously; "in dar on de boory." Mr. Jarvis followed Mr. Jimson's directions, and his eyes bulged out with guilty desire as he espied the inviting article. "Hit certny is wrong in fokes ter leabe pockitbookses er layin' eroun' loose like dat," said Mr. Jimson. "Hit certny is," acquiesced Mr. Jarvis; "an' ef dat dere leetle cullud gal whad we seen down sta'rs was ter see dat pockitbook she'd grab it sho'." "Dat she wood," said Mr. Jarvis. "'Tain't rite fur me 'n you ter leabe it dar ter temp' her," said Mr. Jimson. "Popco'n, you is certny rite," returned Mr. Jarvis, impressivly. Mr. Jimson ceased whitewashing for several moments. It was remarked by several neighbors in the evening that Mr. Jimson and Mr. Jarvis seemed less weary and more cheerful than they usually did after a day's work, and it was also noticed by the grocer around the corner that Mr. Jimson possessed several crisp and lovely bank notes more than he usually did. Late that night Mr. Jarvis reeled up against Mr. Simson and chuckled, "Whad's de madder wid you, Biglip?" queried Mr. Jimson. "Ain' nuffin' de madder," returned Mr. Jarvis. "I was jess thinkin' ob de narrer escape ob dat little cullud gal fum bercomin' wun er dese yere pussons wot fokes calls bugglers."

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Entered at the Post-Office at New York, N. Y., as Second-class Matter.

Vol. 11. No. 15. | PUBLISHED WEEKLY. | New York, Saturday, April 12, 1884. | 33 CLINTON PLACE. | $3.00 per year.

Notes and Clippings.

THE Rev. Mr. Wake is the pastor of a Methodist church in Middlebury, Ct., but the Winsted Press affirms that the people of that church sleep during the sermon just the same as any other congregation.

AT a dinner of the Twilight Club given last week in this city one of the speakers said that "we hav only the ghost of religion left. Men don't go to church. Women go and men pay for it, and they build churches where they own property."

ANTON SHUTTICE, a parishioner of the Rev. Mr. Sheik's, pastor of the German Lutheran church of Union Hill, called that divine a "Bible back hypocrit," and for so doing Mr. Sheik had him arrested. "Brethren should dwell together in unity."

IN a local school fight in a Connecticut town one of the voters said that the contest was between "God and Mr. Mead" on one side and "Tom Clarke and the Devil" on the other. History has again to record that the side espoused by the fallen angel came out ahead.

A TOWEL folded several times and dipped in hot water and quickly wrung, and then applied over the seat of the pain in toothache or neuralgia, will generally afford prompt relief. Headaches almost always yield to the simultaneous application of hot water to the feet and the back of the neck.

SEVEN Mormons sat on the jury in the recent trial at Salt Lake City of Edward Peterson, an avowed polygamist, indicted for registering and voting. All seven swore that they believed the divine law superior to the laws of Congress. They believed polygamy was right, and revealed from God through the Bible, and would obey God rather than Congress.

THERE are, according to the New York Sun, five Spiritualistic organs in France, four in Belgium, two in Holland, eight in Spain, two in Italy, and three in Germany. In addition to several journals devoted to the cause in England and the United States, it has one in Austria, Russia, Mexico, the Antilles, Chili, Brazil, Uruguay, the Argentine Republic, Australia, India, and Cape Colony.

A MODEL Christian institution for children is the Rev. J. E. Irvine's "Faith Parsonage" in New Jersey. Its method of instruction catches a tinge from the Middle Ages. Two little sons of a Mr. Redding, of Camden, stopping there, were treated with the greatest cruelty bv Mrs. Irvine. One of them failing to spell correctly had his head held under a stream of cold water from a faucet. The neighbors corroborate the tales of ill-treatment told by the children.

EDITORS in German Poland are learning with a vengeance what is meant by liberty of the press under Prince Bismarck. One of them has spent five months of the past year in prison, and has six more in prospect. Another has been condemned to eleven and one-third months' imprisonment. A third is now in prison for fifteen months, a fourth for three months, and a fifth for four months. A total in figures of three years and eight and one-third months' imprisonment for editors in one year. Only two political papers exist in Posen with editors not in prison.

THE following conversation is reported to hav lately taken place between a minister and a widow—both of Aberdeen. The widow, who called upon the minister, seemed desirous of relieving her mind of something which oppressed her, at which the reverend gentleman, wishing to hurry matters, exclaimed, "My good woman, you see I can be of no service to you till you tell me what it is that troubles you." "Well, sir, I'm thinkin' of getting married again." "Oh! that is it. Let me see; that is pretty frequent—surely. How many husbands hav you had?" "Well, sir," she replied, in a tone less of sorrow than of bitterness, "this is the fourth—I'm sure there's nae woman been sae tormented wi' a set o' deein' men!"

A NEW prison chaplain was recently appointed in a certain town in Scotland. He was a man who greatly magnified his office; and, entering one of the cells on his first round of inspection, he, with much pomposity, thus addressed the prisoner who occupied it: "Well, sir, do you know who I am?" "No; nor I dinna care!" was the nonchalant reply. "Well, I'm your new chaplain." "Oh! Ye are! Weel, I hae heard o' ye before." "And what did you hear?" returned the chaplain, his curiosity getting the better of his dignity. "Weel, I heard that the last twa kirks ye war in ye preached them baith empty; but ye'll no find it such an easy matter to do the same wi' this ane!"

THE Rev. Mr. Clough, who is now in this country, but who has for twenty years been a missionary in India, in speaking of the intelligence of the people in that country, says: "There is hardly a town in which there are not some men who hav received the degree of Bachelor of Arts in the Madras University. They are well educated in every respect, and speak English, many of them better than I do. They are mostly Brahmans, though there are some Mohammedans among the number. The Madras University is conducted on a plan similar to that of the German universities, where examinations are held every year, and degrees are conferred. There is a perfect mania for education among the young men in India, and especially for English branches and sciences."

MR. R. FITZPATRICK, of Columbia, Ky., was a Christian gentleman, but he committed a murder, and had to pay the penalty prescribed by law. Upon the gallows he made a speech, of which the following sentences are a part: "My friends, I am here to die. It is not just, but God is with me. I am glad to see so great a congregation here to-day. The way I got into this trouble was in defending my brother. I trust you will all take fair warning from this. This is my last day on earth, but it will soon be the bright day of glory. The preachers hav been good to me. Not less than seventy-five hav been to see me, and I thank them for it. I hope you will never see such a sight as this in Columbia no more. It is God's will, I reckon, and of course I ought to put up with it. I ask God to hav mercy on this world. I hav not much more to say; I might as well giv up and go." Such resignation and assurance as this are both beautiful and refreshing. It would have been a graceful thing, however, for Mr. Fitzpatrick to put in at least one good word for his victim, who seems to hav passed entirely from the purlieus of his memory. Giv him a harp.

OSCAR WILDE, in a recent lecture to his friends in London, said that the Americans are the noisiest people in the world, whose national occupation is catching trains. Pennsylvania, with its rocky gorges and woodland scenery, reminded him of Switzerland; the prairie, of a piece of brown blotting-paper. Everything is twice as large as it should be; everywhere is twice as far as it should be. He visited Leadville, the chief characteristic of whose inhabitants is the constant use of the revolver. He lectured to them upon "Benvenuto Cellini, his Life and Works," and was reproved by his hearers for not having brought that artist with him. The explanation that he had been dead for some little time elicited the inquiry, "Who shot him?" Among the more elderly inhabitants of the South he found a melancholy tendency to date every event of importance by the late war. "How beautiful the moon is to-night!" he once remarked to a gentleman who was standing next to him. "Yes," was the reply, "but you should hav seen it before the war." So infinitesimal did he find the knowledge and appreciation of art west of the Rocky Mountains, that an art patron—one who in his day had been a miner—actually sued the railroad company for damages because the plaster cast of Venus of Milo, which he had imported from Paris, had been delivered minus the arms! And, what was more surprising still, he gained his case and the damages.

NELLIE HIMMELRICH, a pretty, dark-haired girl of 14, is now lying in a semi-unconscious condition at the house of Frederick Reinhold, in Reading, Pa. The girl was baptized in the icy water of the river a week ago, and since then has been laboring under much religious excitement. Her pastor, the Rev. Mr. Musselman, of the Evangelical Mennonite church, is almost constantly in attendance. He says: "I hav no doubt that she is now in the same condition as was St. John when he was a witness of the wonders of heaven, described in the book of Revelation." The girl givs graphic descriptions of what she sees, and relates biblical facts which, it is asserted, she never knew before her present condition, her language being far above what she customarily uses. When in the trance her body becomes perfectly stiff, and she is apparently unconscious. Most of the above is probably fraud, the residuum is beastly cruelty. The girl has been driven insane by religious excitement and her icy bath. Her pastor, who is so constantly in attendance, ought to be ducked in a horse trough some day when the thermometer is down to zero, and her parents prosecuted for cruelty to children.

THE editor of the Freeman's Journal pronounces "pure and simple nonsense" the report that the pope will voluntarily leave Rome, but he explains that his holiness might feel himself forced to do so if the Italian government should, for instance, sell or let the Vatican over his head. Of that we presume that the pope has little real apprehension, though he may find diplomatic reasons for expressing, not ex cathedra, a fear of it. In any case, the editor of the Romanist journal is confident that the bishop of Rome will not come to the United States, because we are here "exceedingly Protestant," and Catholics do not hav as much liberty as in Canada and elsewhere, outside of Ireland, under the English crown. Yet we do not now recall any liberty essential to the peace and prosperity of a well-behaved person which would be denied to any one coming here from Italy. But if the pope does not regard it in that light we suppose the country might reconcile itself to getting on without him. We certainly could not accord him any special privileges, unless he should set up the Propaganda as an "infant industry." In that case we might tax the rival products of foreign lands, but we ought to admit that, for some time to come, at any rate, he would be liable to see the protection cut down or his goods put on the free list.—Times.

ONE of the most remarkable suits on record is about to be heard before the Supreme Court of North Carolina. This grows out of a mortgage on his own person made by a white man named John Hando, of Pitt county, in this state, securing Jim Taker, a cotton planter, for a debt due him. This deed reads: "I, John Hando, of the county of Pitt, in the state of North Carolina, am indebted to Jim Taker, of the state and county aforesaid, in the sum of $26, for which he holds my note, to be due on the 11th day of January, 1884; and to secure the payment of the same I do hereby convey to him these articles of personal property, to wit, myself, to work with him long enough to pay this debt. But on this special trust that, if I fail to pay said debt right away, then he, the said Taker, may sell me at the courthouse door for credit or cash, as he thinks best, after giving 20 days' public notice at three different places, and apply the proceeds of such sale to the discharge of said debt, and interest on the same, and cost and expenses of making such sale, and pay the surplus, if any, to me. Given under my hand and seal this, the 14th day of January, 1884." Hando failed to pay the amount due Taker, and the creditor was at liberty under the terms of the deed to sell him at public auction. Some time before the expiration of the twenty days' grace allowed the mortgaged debtor, the news got out, and the courthouse green was crowded with people expecting to witness the novel sale of a white man. An injunction was granted by the Superior Court, and no sale took place. The Supreme Court will hear the case.

CHAPTER XXIII.

TO THE FRONT.

The battle rolled on. It was one of those tumultuous indecisive affairs that occurred in the beginning of the war, wherein there was much hard fighting and but little gain. The raw troops plunged gallantly forward. The unaccustomed shot, whose whistle was at first so terrific, became like music to their ears, and stirred the pulses like a thousand trumpets. Hither and thither, like the wild tides of the sea, tossed the headlong battalions. At times, in the confused rout, the rebel and the Union soldiers became almost intermingled. On both sides the advantage was lost and gained, and when the wings of night descended, one could hardly declare who was the victor and who the vanquished.

Just at the close of combat, the Union troops became thoroughly imperilled. With wonderful daring and skill, Col. Potter pushed his brigade right on to the enemy. For a few moments there was a tremendous fire, and bayonets almost crossed each other, and a hand-to-hand fight was imminent. But such was the rush and steadfast force of the Union troops that the enemy sullenly gave way. This for the time being ended the conflict, but in the midst of his brilliant achievement, Col. Potter received his death-wound. He was borne to the rear, shrouded in the flag that he had so ably defended.

"Death forgives all; and a death so glorious as that more than all. He was cruel, but he meant to be just," said Stubbs.

"I wanted to be where he is," said Cupples. "I did my best to get a bullet in my heart. What's the use of living?"

"All the use in the world," said Stubbs. "I never give up. There's always a chance."

"But if you can't get the chance it's just as bad. I'm tied, and must let her drift away."

"By no means," said Stubbs. "I'm in command now. I give you a free and roving commission to go where you will. We want spies in the Southern country, men of pluck. This war is going to last, and we must find out what the enemy's plans are. At the same time you can hunt for Bessie, and save her."

"I take that," said Cupples. "I want Sergeant Jones to go with me. He and I are old trampers together on this ground."

"That we are, and again will be. Hurrah!" shouted Sergeant Jones, flinging up his soldier's cap. "We'll scour the land from beginning to end, and not leave a stone unturned, but we'll find Bessie and serve the Union cause"

So everything was got ready, and in a few days the adventurers started on their perilous undertaking. Meanwhile a letter was received from Maria.

"You can't imagine how mad we are here," she wrote; "Amy has disappeared. As soon as the news came, she was gone like a flash. She will find Bessie, I know."

"That she will," said Cupples. "A mother's heart knows just where to go. But we'll follow, and somehow join forces."

Dressed in butternut suits, the sergeant and Cupples trudged along with a most innocent and forlorn aspect. They kept their eyes wide open, however, and observed everything. Troops were flying all over the country, but they managed to escape detection. They went directly to Bolton's residence, but evidently Bessie had not been taken there.

"I think he keeps her with him," said the sergeant. "That's the safest way for the present. Suppose we try and promenade his camp."

"I'm ready," said Cupples. "We can find out something that way."

It was rather risky, but they pressed forward, and by means of forged passes got within the lines of the camp. They were constantly on the alert to discover some signs of Bessie, but she was nowhere to be seen.

"Something is up," said the sergeant. "They are mighty busy. There's Sandy now. See him flying around. I wish I could trip him. I think he is about the slipperiest scoundrel I ever saw."

"Isn't that Harry?" cried Cupples. "I haven't seen him since we left Kentucky on the lightning express ten years ago."

It was Harry indeed, and changed from the bright young Harry of long ago. Noble looking he was, and every inch a soldier. He was fighting beneath the rebel flag, though his child was a slave beneath that flag. Strange contradictions of human nature! How inextricably blended are the evil and the good!

"I never could understand his keeping away," said Cupples. "We expected him right off, but days and months and years went by, and we gave it up. He wrote, I believe, often, but that stopped too. Amy went to work and thought only of little Bessie."

"Man's a queer creature," said the sergeant. "I think most of us are crazy. I feel so myself, and I can't tell what I'll do to-morrow."

"Nor I either," said Cupples. "I do some damn mean thing all of a sudden, and then I'm just as devilish good without malice aforethought."

"That's the way of the world," said Jones. "The unexpected always happens. When we think that one is going to act particularly nice he spoils the dish, and when we expect him to kick up a row like as not he's the very angel that we are after."

They watched Harry riding away to headquarters. This unexpected appearance put them off their guard, and for the flash of a moment their faces betokened that they were something other than they professed to be. At that nick of time Sandy came sweeping by and flung his quick glance upon them. Instantly their countenances becam immobile, and they looked like innocent country wayfarers. They were not swift enough, however, for the Mephistophelean eye of Sandy, who said nothing, but dashed forward to the general's tent.

"We must get out of this," said Jones. "I feel the halter about my neck. That man Sandy is putting spurs to his horse. I am afraid he's caught us."

"We had better drop into these woods," said Cupples. "In half an hour we shall be perfectly safe."

"That half-hour bothers me. By George, they've got the scent. See, the general and his whole staff are dashing this way pell-mell. We must run for it."

Run they did. A dozen shots were fired after them, but they made out to plunge into the woods However, the alarm was general, and the whole brigade was on the hunt.

"Penned in, sure as fate. Shall we blow out our brains or hang, Cupples?"

"I guess I'll choose the hanging," said Cupples. "It's farther off and no worse."

"You're a philosopher. I'll keep my brains and use them now that my feet are worthless. They say man never yet got into a scrape but he could get out of it if he knew enough."

They plunged along in wild fashion through the underbrush, while the shots were rattling on every side. Suddenly they broke into an open space, and found themselvs front to front with Gen. Bolton.

"What are you running so for," said Bolton.

"We wanted to get home. It's time to milk the cows," said the sergeant.

"I guess the cows will have to go for to-night. Come up to the guard-house."

"They'll miss us at home," said the sergeant with country boorishness and a whining voice.

"That's bumkum," said Bolton. "Your home isn't about here. I think I've seen you before."

"I have," said Sandy. "This man is Cupples, and this is his right hand-man—Jones, they call him. Don't you remember how Cupples hit you?"

"Yes," thundered Bolton, "and to-morrow morning you hang, both of you."

"We'll hang gaily," said the sergeant.

CHAPTER XXIX.

THE BOY AND THE MAN.

Cupples and Jones slept soundly that night, as if they expected to wake up to a first-class meal.

"I've done my duty, and that's the end on't," said Cupples. "They say that choking is mighty easy. I hope so, for I can't try the experiment but once, and I want it to succeed the first time."

It was a lovely morning. The birds were singing marvelously among the trees, entirely unconscious of the great tragedy of human life that was going on. If there was a God anywhere enthroned in this beautiful scene, how utterly weak he seemed to be. What a tragedy existence must be to a God to see so much evil and not be able to help! To be infinite is indeed to be very cruel or very sorrowful.

Suddenly Harry entered the guard-house.

"Send the soldiers away," cried he. "I want to see these men alone."

In a moment he was face to face with his old friends.

"Do you recognize me?" he asked.

"Indeed we do," they both replied.

"How shall I explain myself," he said.

"I don't know," answered Cupples. "That's what has always bothered me. Why didn't you come to Amy?"

"I can't tell any more than you can. I expected to come—meant to come—but I delayed, hoping that time would make the opportunity easy. A thousand influences, however, were against me. I dreaded poverty. Gradually custom—the life of the world about me—the thoughts and feelings of all my friends, the force of circumstance, weaned me from my youthful purpose. I drifted on, and finally, I said, almost in despair, I will go the way of the world. It is useless to contend against it. If I do I shall be crushed. I despise myself, and yet it was my fate. No man is strong enough to be absolutely independent of his surroundings. I went with the tide."

"We all do the same," said the sergeant. "We've got to go with the tide now and hang for it."

"For the sake of your little girl," said Cupples. "We were seeking her."

"I know it."

"Where is she?

"I cannot answer. My father brought her to camp while I was away. Before I returned she had been stolen, or rescued, as I believe, by her mother. We have not a clue to her whereabouts."

"Amy has her beyond doubt," said Cupples, joyfully.

"I think so," said Harry. "Now for yourselves?"

"You can answer that better than we. If you don't help, we shall shuffle off this mortal coil in half an hour," said the sergeant.

"No doubt of it. I hav no authority whatever. Only something desperate can save you."

"Good-bye'" said Cupples. "We are all in the web, and its no use to kick."

"That's it," said Harry. "We are tangled on every side. We think we are free, free to think, free to do, yet we are constantly borne along. I feel as helpless as a leaf."

"You are fighting against the flag of our country. Do you do that of your own accord?"

"My education—everything—forces me this way. What has abstract reasoning or justice to do with conduct? It's the result of things in the midst of which we live. You think you are right, I think the same. It must be fought out, I suppose. I see no other way. You can't stop the whirlwind, and if you are in and of it you most go the way it goes."

"No use to argue," said the sergeant. "I hate to argue. I'd rather have a fair and square knock-down any time, and settle it that way. A man never yet was convinced by reasoning. You have to punch him into a conviction."

"Life is greater than thought, and goes on in spite of everything," said Harry. "What dreams I once had! It seemed so easy to do great and good things. The world lay before me like a dream-land. My feelings went forth simply to triumph. Alas, the miserable disappointment of it all, and worse than all, we become traitors to ourselves and scorn our own ideal and side with the world, and make the best of what we actually despise."

"Don't you feel like rebelling and making things to suit yourself?" said Jones.

"Yes, but who can resist opinion, custom, tradition, church, press, and the powers that be? I confess my inability. I've accepted the world as it is, but a heap of meanness and wrong I take with it. That's the only way by which one can really enjoy his virtue. To be in a minority of one is a very uncomfortable position, although it may be sublime. Such a minority always starves."

"I see you are a philosopher now," said the sergeant.

"I am. I was a poet once, or tried to be. But the music has gone. I am a practical man. I have no more theories."

"I think I understand you. I couldn't have acted as you did; but your are another man and that makes all the difference in the world."

"We'll shake hands over that. Now for action. I must get you out of this scrape somehow."

"I hope that fate is in that view of the affair, but I'm afraid it isn't. It looks as if fate meant to hang us."

"I hav no plan to offer, except that if you get a chance to run, run with all your might; and do just what Columbus tells you."

"Is Columbus here? then I do have some hopes. He's the incarnation of good luck. A man who can't speak is the luckest man living."

"Yes, if by not speaking he sets to thinking. He'll be ready at a moment's notice. I purpose to get you outside of this camp. I don't know how—but it most be done."

"Try it then. Only give us a ghost of a chance and we'll make a living of it."

"One shake of the hand," said Harry. "It may all go wrong and the devil be uppermost; but fate fights against fate itself, and now and then there's a chance for liberty. Good-bye."

"I don't condemn him," said the sergeant, when Harry was gone. "He's got the stuff in him, however badly it may be mixed."

"We are all badly mixed I guess," said Cupples. "Those who go straight have the least weight to carry."

"The more one has aboard, the more risky the voyage. I don't believe an empty vessel ever went on the breakers. It's perfectly safe to be a fool."

"Would I were the biggest of fools then," said Cupples, "till I got out of this."

"Trust to your folly. All the wit in the world won't give us a lift now."

"Then I resign my brains in favor of my neck. A good breath is better than a heap of knowledge," cried Cupples, vivaciously.

"Twenty minutes will decide. Let's be ready for a jump either into eternity, or into the woods," said the sergeant. [TO BE CONTINUED.]

The True Character of Napoleon Bonaparte.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I read in Mr. W. R. Dyer's poem, "Musings by the Way," in The Truth Seeker of March 1, 1884, these lines:

"A Bonaparte may waste two million lives,
Him of that baleful power no God deprives;
In vain the orphan's wail, the widow's woe,
This monster wills, and human blood must flow."

I regret being obliged to differ with any brother Liberal, but the above is most unjust (unintentionally so, I doubt not) to that supreme genius, and hence I esteem it my duty to rise and reply.

It is a matter of continual surprise to me that so few persons (Freethinkers, even), outside of France, know the true character of the first Napoleon.

I hav recently made the various lives which hav been written of him a careful and especial study, and I see no reason so reverse the decision I reached after reading the first one of all, Abbott's "Life of Napoleon." That book contains overwhelming documentary evidence to prove that Bonaparte was as good as he was great. It won't answer to "pooh! pooh!" Abbott's "Life," saying intelligent people giv it no credence, that it is disproved and supplanted, etc. It contains copies of a large number of state documents, official correspondence, etc., that must prove beyond a doubt, to the unprejudiced reader, that Napoleon was the Washington of France, and at least as worthy of esteem as was that personage. For the space of about twenty years, Napoleon, by the efforts of his gigantic genius, successfully held his own against the great banded powers of Europe. That he fell at last should not render him the less worthy of our respect and love. So far from being the monster, devoured by lust for conquest and love for bloodshed, which he is painted, he never fought except in self-defense, and his correspondence (see Abbott's "Life") shows that, throughout his political career, he never relaxed his endeavors to cement a lasting peace by making every concession which was compatible with the honor and welfare of his beloved France.

I do not defend him because I love him, but I love him because he was one of the best and loftiest characters recorded in history. All must do likewise as soon as they become acquainted with his true character and policy. Turn to France to-day; for hours hav I conversed with the middle orders in the French capital about their dead hero. Tears filled their eyes as they spoke of his noble endeavors to keep his adopted country free from a detested usurpation. Never, I think, hav I enjoyed conversation so intensely as with the few maimed, battle-scarred old veterans who fought under his banners, yet living beneath the glittering dome of "Les Invalides." Emotion choked my own speech, as well as theirs, when they recalled in tremulous tones the glorious fields whereon it was their privilege to fight beside their idolized "Little Corporal." Does a nation thus honor the memory of a tyrant? Never was leader so beloved—nay, reverenced, as was the hero of Marengo and Austerlitz, by his own soldiers. To a man, they they would lay down their lives for him.

This, even his bitterest enemies admit. Whence, then, his power? Will reasonable men believe such unqualified love could be evoked by a monster of cruelty, second scarcely to Nero himself? I wish all who can do so would procure Abbott's "Life of Napoleon," and judge for themselvs of the true character of the great champion of democracy.

America had but one foe (England), and between her and this single adversary rolled three thousand miles of billows, and yet, in a comparativly brief period, she was brought to the very brink of surrender, and but for the meteoric pen of Paine all would hav been lost.

France, on the contrary, was but twenty-one miles distant by water, at the nearest point, from her implacable enemy, England, and in direct land communication with Austria, Prussia, and "the colossus of the North," Russia. Notwithstanding all these disadvantages, Bonaparte successfully warred against his combined foes for nearly twenty years. Nothing, apparently, could hav established the peace of Europe except the absolute ruin of France and the enslavement of her people (as happened in the end), or the complete subordination of all the great powers to Napoleon; hence he fought for existence itself, and cannot be justly censured for doing in France what Washington did in America.

The true character of Napoleon (like that of Paine) has too long been obscured by the clouds of hate and the influence of kingcraft. In America, most of us are just learning the truth concerning our author-patriot, Paine; but of Napoleon, the great and gallant champion of European democracy, we, as yet, are far too ill-informed.

All Liberals should love Bonaparte; he fought and fell to defend the rights of the people of France against tyranny, and the occupation of a hated dynasty. I love Napoleon as I love but one other grand, noble man, and that man is Ingersoll.

I will close this letter with a short poem of my own, entitled

NAPOLEON AT FONTAINEBLEAU, MARCH 31, 1814.
(After the celebrated portrait by Paul Delaroche).

Majestically grand, the fallen Monarch sits,
With head sunk on his breast,
Despairingly, as o'er his prescient mind
The awful Future flits.

"Aye! every inch a king!" nor can yon hireling pack,
Seeking his noble life,
Subdue that haughty soul, which smiles at Fate,
Still victor of the strife.

Deem not he grieves for aught save hapless France,
Spoil of the carrion kite;
Or one base thought of self, an added gloom
Lends his stern spirit's night.

No! 'tis loved France, reft of a hand to guide
Her desp'rate course, that bows
His spirit i' the dust—such godlike grief
As Fate few breasts allows.

Defame him not! ye whose ignoble souls,
Callous to worth, but feel
The tyrant's lust for Power, trampling what he revered—
A loving People's weal.

Elliott Preston.

A Few Figures.

To hear some men talk, we would suppose we could not manufacture at all without a protectiv tariff, to tax all the consumers for the few factory people. One would suppose, also, there is no history of the past to be read. Several times in the past some nations hav tried free trade and then fallen back to protect monopolies. But we need only look back at our last census report. There we find that during the period of our very low tariff, called our free trade era, the number of factories in the Union increased twenty thousand, while the capital increased about one hundred per cent. This was between 1850 and 1860, when our population and wealth were more than one-half less than between 1870 and 1880.

If, now, we compare from 1870 to 1880, we find we increased only about eighteen hundred in the number of factories, and about thirty-five per cent on investment. This was the protectiv era.

The truth is, a high tax is fatal to industry. The internal revenue tax acted on tobacco and liquor as the external revenue tariff on all the so-called protected industries. Tobacco factories, breweries, and distilleries were swept as with a besom of destruction. Every county had some such industries. Where are they now? Swallowed up by a few great monopolies. Trade cries, with the true patriot, Giv me liberty or giv me death. Clarke Irvine.

Facts and Fallacies in Regard to the New Testament

Did Christ's soul die? Did he make his soul an offering for sin? Christians most emphatically and unanimously say no! But if they are right in this, then Christ could not be the savior of sinners; has never paid the penalty, for the penalty is positivly declared by God. "The soul that sinneth it shall die." If he did die, soul and body, then he could not be God, for God must be immortal. If he was not God, he was alarmingly like his father. "And for this cause God shall send them a strong delusion, that they should believe a lie" (2 Thess. ii, 11), for Christ again and again declared he was God. "And now, O Father, glorify thou me with thine own self with the glory which I had with thee before the world was" (John xvii, 5). Christ positivly declared he was God to the man to whom he gave sight. "Jesus heard that they had cast him out; and when he had found him, he said unto him, Dost thou believe on the son of God? He answered and said, Who is he, Lord, that I might believe on him? And Jesus said unto him, Thou hast both seen him and it is he that talketh with thee, and he said, Lord I believe, and he worshiped him" (John. ix, 35–37).

If Christ was not God, he was a vile sinner, for by claiming to be he induced this poor man to worship him as God. Again, Christ declares, "I know them that follow me and I giv unto them eternal life" (John x, 27–28). None but an almighty God could giv eternal life. Again he said, "I and my Father are one" (John x, 30).

If Christ told the truth, if he was God, he must hav been immortal. He could not die.

If only his body died on the cross, then the penalty for sin was not paid by Jesus, for the Bible declares, "The soul that sinneth it shall die" (Ezk. xviii, 20). Christ himself asks, "For what is a man profited, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul? Or what shall a man giv in exchange for his soul?" (Mat. xvi, 26).

Christians positivly declare Christ's soul could not die, the Bible declares Christ's soul did die. Which is true? Which shall we accept? Which deny?

"Yet it pleased the Lord to bruise him, he hath put him to grief, when thou shalt make his soul an offering for sin, he shall see his seed, he shall prolong his days, and the pleasure of the Lord shall prosper in his hand. He shall see of the travail of his soul and shall be satisfied; by his knowledge shall my righteous servant justify many, for he shall bear their iniquities. Therefore will I divide him a portion with the great, and he shall divide the spoil with the strong because he hath poured out his soul unto death; and he was numbered with the transgressors, and he bare the sin of many and made intercession for the transgressors" (Isa. liii, 10–12.) Why do Christians deny the plainest declarations of the Bible, and then bitterly denounce Liberals for not believing every word of it?

Christ himself declared he died. The Christ that is now in heaven died, not the mere humanity he assumed. Appearing to John on the isle of Patmos over sixty years after the crucifixion, he said, "I am he that liveth, and was dead, and behold I am alive for evermore, Amen; and hav the keys of hell and death" (Rev. i, 18).

If we are to believe the New Testament, the declaration of Christ himself, Christ "has the office oposit to St. Peter, and keeps the gate of hell."

The Christ now in heaven says he did die. Therefore he could not hav been God. If he did not die, soul and body, then there never was atonement made for sinners. Christians and Christ declare he was God; church, Christ, Bible, and Christians contradict each other. And yet the gentle, pitying savior decrees, "He that believeth not shall be damned" (Mark xvi, 16). Chas. B. Reynolds.

Oh, What a God!

The following taken from a report of a meeting of the friends and relativs of the victims of the awful disaster in the Pocahontas mine, to take measures to get the bodies out of the mine, illustrates the unreason of superstition. These people believe their God knows everything and can do everything; yet they believe he sits unmoved amid horrors unspeakable which one motion of his will can end and convert into blessings. Were a poor weak man to stand idly by, unsympathizing, not assisting, they would lynch him as a monster. Their almighty God can do so, and they heap praises on him. "Be ye perfect even as god is perfect." "Imitate and obey God." Were one to try to imitate this monstrous indifference, to neglect to try and prevent a disaster seen approaching, what would be thought of him?

The presiding officer was a venerable and superannuated miner named William Forster, who with trembling voice said: "Men—I for one am here to see if I can't get the bodies of my two boys, who, as far as I can calculate, are buried almost underneath our feet, surrounded by a hell of fire."

A sob seemed to pass through the assembly, every member of which wore some badge of mourning. Women commenced to wail loudly for lost husbands, sons, and brothers, but were ordered with rough kindness to stop crying.

Peter Smith, whose brother is another victim, asked permission to pray, which being accorded he rose, and doffing his hat, made a touching appeal. The men outside the building also stood uncovered, and with the rain beating on their heads listened to the following:

"O God Almighty, we ask that you will giv us some comfort in this hour of affliction. We pray you to let us hav back the bodies of our poor relativs, and not to refuse us the chance of burying them. O Lord God Almighty, put out the fires and help us so that we can giv back the bodies to that earth from which we came. Help us so our action to-night may be wise, and that we may not be reckless or do things which the law don't allow. O great God, let your pity come to these here poor widows and children who now hav no man to get them bread. Let this great and rich country giv a few dollars so that we will not see them starving. Pray, God, don't let them go down under their troubles. If some poor fellow down below is yet alive, O God, kill him quick or show us how to help him. In the name of a merciful Jesus we beseech you to show pity on this town and help us bear the burden you hav given us to bear. God help us and teach us to liv your life, so we can die in peace when our time comes to die. If, as some say, our dead go to purgatory, then we pray you to be merciful to our dead. Let their agony in this deadly mine help to square their accounts. God help and comfort all in Pocahontas, for the sweet sake of Jesus Christ. Amen."

During the roughly spoken invocation the crying of the women, at first almost inaudible, rose in unison until the volume nearly drowned the speaker's voice. As he sat down tears were flowing from every eye, and great confusion prevailed, as several of the women had become unmanageable. The "keening" of the Irish women mingled with the frenzied lamentations of the colored women. The scene was distressing in the extreme to the few strangers who witnessed it.

Mr. Smith's Prospectus.

P. J. Smith keeps the Kittrell House in Gadsen, Ala. His terms are cash for saint and sinner, and he throws in this advice:

LETTER OF ADVICE.

Meet P. J. Smith, the meanest man in America, in heaven, where he has $50,000 in the treasury, deposited to his credit, together with ten thousand barrels of cream. Immediately after the final judgment he will open his ice cream parlor and furnish free lunch to all.

Climb the stairs, boys!

Comes Out of the People.

The Catholic clergymen of the diocese of Albany hav made up a purse of $15,000 for Bishop McNierney.—Albany Journal.

Dr. W. M. Taylor's life is insured for $50,000, the Broadway Tabernacle paying the annual premium of $1,238, in addition to his $16,000 salary.—N. Y. Times.

How few reflect that any money spent on that useless class, the clergy, necessarily comes from the hard-working people, even if clergymen inter-exchange presents, as in the above case! Paling.

Allying Church and State.

At a session of the National Reform Association, held in Philadelphia on March 25th, Rev. Dr. Barr, chairman of the Committee on Resolutions, offered the following which were adopted:

Resolved, That civil government is an ordinance of God and as such is responsible to him.

Resolved, That in the divine administration in this dispensation all power in heaven and earth being given to the Lord Jesus Christ, he is, therefore, the rightful ruler of all nations and they are bound to acknowledge him as such.

Resolved, That his will revealed in the Bible is the law of nations as well as of the individuals composing them, and this law must guide nations in all their acts and direct and control their moral character.

Resolved, That nations must suitably acknowledge him as their governor, and be subject to his will revealed to them as nations. Refusing or failing to do this provokes his righteous displeasure, and sooner or later such nations must perish by his righteous judgment.

Resolved, That it is well that this acknowledgment be made in the acts or legislation of nations, but in order that it may be put beyond the caprice of an individual will, or the changeable enactment of national or state legislation, it should be made in the fundamental law or national constitution.

Resolved, That moral reformation in the character of our rulers and legislators, reformation in laws relating to divorce, to the Sabbath, to the manufacture and sale of intoxicating drinks, and all kindred subjects, can be attained only by advocating and steadfastly adhering to the principles relating to civil government thus enunciated, and we therefore invite and earnestly recommend all Christian citizens to study these principles, and to labor for our nation's reformation upon the sure basis which they afford.

THE CONSEQUENCES.

We hav over and over again pointed out the consequences that would result from the union proposed by these fanatics, and this time we will let a Christian answer his brethren. In the current North American Review Rev. Dr. Philip Schaff, who was one of the American committee of New Testament revisers, writes upon the "Development of Religious Freedom." In the course of his paper he says:

Persecution dates from the union of church and state. . . . When Constantine the Great espoused the cause of Christianity he transferred his power as high priest of the state religion to his new position as the temporal head of the church. The Christian emperors now persecuted the heathen religion as the pagan emperors had persecuted the Christian religion. Not only so, but they persecuted also every departure from the established orthodox creed; they recognized but one legitimate form of Christianity, which was represented by the Catholic church, and they treated every heresy and schism as a crime against the state. In this attitude they were aided by the theological dogma framed by the fathers, of the exclusivness of the Catholic church, which they confounded with the kingdom of God, out of which there is no salvation. The imperial legislation from Constantine the Great to Justinian is filled with penal laws against Arians, Donatists, Manicheans, Gnostics, Montanists, Quartodecimans, Novatians, Apollinarians, Nestorians, Eutychians, and all other sects that dissented from the dogmas and canons of the ruling state church, and who were punished as enemies of society with deposition, banishment, and even with death. These laws were incorporated in the Justinian code, which was gradually adopted, together with the canon law, all over the continent of Europe. Rome ruled once more by law as she had so long ruled by the sword, and ruled over the children of those barbarians who had broken up her empire.

England alone, favored by her isolation and protected by the surrounding sea, resisted the introduction of the Roman civil law and the canon law; she preferred her own customs, inherited from Anglo Savon times, and built on them her common law (or lex non scripta) and her statute law (or lex scripta). But as to her religion, England was as thoroughly Catholic, and even Roman Catholic, as any country on the continent. The first archbishop of Canterbury, St. Augustine, who was sent by Pope Gregory I. to convert the Anglo-Saxons, could not tolerate the older and more independent Christianity of the Britons, which was driven to the mountains of Wales. The statute on the burning of heretics was in force even to the times of Queen Elizabeth and King James. Wicklif escaped persecution during his life, but was not spared after his death, and the Council of Constance, which burnt Huss and Jerome of Prague as heretics, condemned Wicklif and his writings to the flames; whereupon his remains were solemnly ungraved, burnt to ashes, and cast into the brook Swift, which (as Fuller says) "conveyed them into the Avon, Avon into Severn, Severn into the narrow seas, they into the main ocean; and thus the ashes of Wicklif are the emblem of his doctrin, which now is dispersed all the world over." Five hundred years after the completion of Wicklif's Bible translation his memory was celebrated in five continents. What a change!

The medieval persecution reached its hight in the crusades against the Waldenses and Albigenses, in France, and in the Inquisition of Spain. Both were ecclesiastico-political. The church defined and condemned the heresy, and the state punished it by the sword, using carnal force against spiritual offenses. The Spanish Inquisition was instituted by Ferdinand and Isabella, with the express sanction of the pope, for ridding the state of all enemies, Moors, Jews, and heretics. It is stated that during the first twenty years of its existence, from A.D. 1478 to 1498, when the terrible Inquisitor-General Torquemada resigned his office, over 8,080 persons were burnt alive, 6,500 in effigy, and 90,004 punished in other ways. The sum total of persons condemned to death by the Spanish Inquisition during the 330 years of its existence (from 1478 to 1808) is stated to be 30,000. Roman Catholic writers like Balmez and Hefele (the latter in his work on Cardinal Ximenes, the third inquisitor-general), in defense of the institution, question the figures of Llorente (who, however, was a Spanish priest and secretary of the Inquisition from 1789–1791), and claim for the Inquisition as a good result that it saved Spain from the horrors of religious wars, which would hav cost far more victims, and might hav ruined the country. But the peace of a graveyard is much worse than war. France, Holland, Germany, and England hav all passed through the ordeal of religious wars, and left Spain, once the proudest monarchy of Europe, far behind in everything that makes up the glory of a nation.

The Reformation of the sixteenth century was the grandest movement in history since the introduction of Christianity, and carried in it the modern principles of religious and civil liberty. But at first it was simply an emancipation from the thraldom of popery, which, from being a schoolmaster of the barbarous nations of Europe, had become an intolerable tyrant. The reformers had no idea of religious freedom beyond their own creed, nor of a separation between the church and the state. They were intensely convinced of the scriptural truthfulness of their views, and deemed it right and proper to deny to others the right of dissent which they claimed and exercised for themselvs. They appealed to the civil magistrate for the support of the new churches and the suppression of heresy. The Lutheran princes in Germany and Scandinavia acted on the principle Cujus regio ejus religio, and made themselvs supreme bishops or little popes in their territories. The republican magistrates of Zurich, Bern, Basel, Geneva, and other Swiss cantons, did the same. In England this principle was carried to the extreme of Erastianism. Henry VIII. simply cut off the Roman head from the English hierarchy, and put his own crown on the bloody trunk. He called himself the "supreme head" of the church of England, and his daughter Elizabeth, being a woman, only softened it into "supreme governor." Anabaptists and Socinians were persecuted in Protestant as well as in Roman Catholic countries. The only difference is in the extent of persecution and the degree of severity, in which Romanism has an unenviable pre-eminence, because it had more power and once ruled supreme in Europe.

Calvin consented to the burning of Servetus by the civil authorities of Geneva for denying the trinity and the divinity of Christ, though he had begged the magistrate in vain to mitigate the punishment by substituting the sword for the fagot. The burning was fully justified by all the surviving reformers, Farel, Beza, Bucer, Bullinger (Zwingli's successor in Zurich), and the mild and gentle Melancthon. Beza called liberty of conscience a diabolical dogma. Castellio, once a friend, then an enemy of Calvin, and expelled from Geneva, was the only Protestant of that age who denounced the execution; and he did it for the rationalistic reason that errors on speculativ doctrins, as the trinity, predestination, etc., which are impenatrably obscure, hav no influence on morals, and are therefore innocent. Luther and Zwingli, who had died long before that tragedy in Geneva, might possibly hav disapproved of its severity in obedience to their liberal instincts. Luther once made the excellent remark that if heretics were to be burnt the hangman would be the best theologian; but Luther would not hav tolerated Zwingli or Œcolampadius in Saxony, whom he refused to acknowledge as brethren at Marburg, though they agreed in fourteen out of fifteen articles of doctrin, and differed only on the mode of Christ's presence in the eucharist. The Melancthonians (or Philippists), Krypto-Calvinists, and all professors, clergymen, and school-teachers who would not subscribe to the Formula Concordiæ of 1577, lost their places in Saxony; and Chancellor Nicholas Crell, who had supported Calvinism, was, after ten years' imprisonment, beheaded at Dresden as a traitor (1601). "Since that time the name of a Calvinist became more hateful in Saxony than that of a Jew or Mohammedan." In Scandinavian countries, till within the memory of men now living, Lutherans only were allowed the privilege of public worship and the rights of citizenship. In England, the penal laws, enacted under Queen Elizabeth, were a systematic attempt to uproot every form of dissent, whether Roman Catholic or Protestant, and were carried out with cruel severity. John Knox declared that one popish mass in Scotland was more obnoxious and dangerous than a French army of invasion. Archbishop Laud was as bigoted and intolerant as any inquisitor in Spain. The Puritan assembly of Westminster expelled two thousand beneficed Episcopal clergymen, and Charles II. on his restoration took double vengeance on the Nonconformists in England and the Covenanters of Scotland. Cromwell was the most tolerant of the statesmen of the seventeenth century, but even he exempted "popery and prelacy" from his scheme of toleration. Milton, the most eloquent advocate of liberty in the English tongue, made the same exception. Baxter was comparativly liberal, yet he pronounced universal toleration to be "soul murder," and "the way to man's damnation." Jeremy Taylor, when in exile, eloquently defended the principle of toleration in his "Liberty of Prophesying," but abandoned it when the Episcopal church regained her power, and apologized for the publication or that book.

Nor is our own America free from the reproach of persecution. The first English settlers fled from persecution in their nativ land, and sought freedom of worship for themselvs, but for themselvs only. With the exception of the Baptist colony of Rhode Island, the Quaker colony of Pennsylvania, and the Catholic colony of Maryland (in its earliest stage), the principle of state churchism was as fully recognized and established in our colonial period as in England. Congregationalism was the established church in Massachusetts and nearly all New England; Episcopacy in Virginia, the Carolinas, and New York. There was a time when dissenters were fined, imprisoned, exiled, and even hanged for religious opinions, to the extent of the power of the civil authorities of our free country, even in the enlightened state of Massachusetts, and such persecution was justified on the basis of the union of church and state.

Wherever this principle is acknowledged and established, persecution becomes even a duty of conscientious rulers. The worst persecutors among the Roman emperors (with the exception of Nero, who persecuted the Christians, not for religion, but on the false charge of incendiarism) were influenced by motivs of patriotism and duty to the integrity of the ancestral religion, and are numbered among the best emperors—Trajan, Marcus Aurelius, Decius, Diocletian, and Julian. And so we must dismiss the idea that every Christian persecutor is necessarily a bad man. The great and good St. Augustine was the first among the fathers who formulated the very principle of persecution by his famous misinterpretation of "Compel them to enter in." Innocent III., who inspired the horrible crusade against the Albigenses and Waldenses, was one of the purest, as well as ablest, among popes. Cardinal Ximenes, the inquisitor-general of Spain, is the originator of the first Polyglot Bible, now one of the rarest and costliest books. Calvin, who burnt Servetus, is not only the greatest theologian among the Reformers, but surpassed them all in zeal for purity of doctrin and holiness of life. Lecky, who abhors persecution, fully acknowledges this fact.

Lecky derives religious persecution from the intensity of religious conviction, and the belief that there is no salvation beyond the limits of a certain system of orthodoxy. But here we must decidedly dissent from him. That the degree of earnestness and exclusivness of belief determins the degree of severity of persecution, we admit; but we utterly deny that orthodoxy in any shape is necessarily persecuting. Otherwise, Christ and the apostles would hav been the greatest persecutors, at least in principle, as they could not be in fact. Religious convictions were as deep and strong in the first three centuries, when orthodox Christians suffered from persecution, as in the Middle Ages, when orthodox Christians persecuted Jews, heretics, and Infidels. There are now in America plenty of Catholics, Episcopalians, Congregationalists, Presbyterians, Lutherans, who are as orthodox, as sincere, as earnest, even as exclusiv in their theological opinions, as their ancestors, and who yet utterly disavow their persecuting principles and practices. They all profess the opposit principle of toleration and freedom.

We maintain, then, that persecution is consistent with, and inseparable from, the union of church and state; while religious freedom is the inevitable result of a peaceful separation of the two. Church and state are as distinct as soul and body, as eternity and time.

The Liberal Club.

The 333d regular meeting of the Manhattan Liberal Club was held on the evening of Friday, the 28th of March. No representativ of THE TRUTH SEEKER competent to record the proceedings was present, but it is understood that an enjoyable time was had. Madam Henri Delescluze, a deeply religious lady of considerable elocutionary attainments, delivered the lecture as announced on the program, entitled "A Mad World." The world here described is the present one, no insinuation as to the sanity of the next being implied. The madam's lecture was criticised in the usual manner. Mr. King thought the speaker appeared dyspeptic, and Professor Vaughan, of Virginia, said something about snobs of reporters. Exactly what he said, or whom he alluded to, is unknown, and is not considered a matter of any great concern.

At the 334th meeting the subject was "Positivism and Politics," the speaker being Edward W. Searing, Esq., of the New York bar. Mr. Seering began by reading Bryant's poem, "The Crowded Street." He then described the corrupted condition of New York politics, and read an extract from the New York Sun on the way the political machinery was worked. The doctrin of individuality was too much taught. The fact is that the individual is of very little importance, compared with society. Positivism believes in unity, harmony, and the greatest good to the greatest number. Officers of the law should be appointed by their predecessors, and the electiv franchise should be exercised to vote men out of office instead of into it. A sense of responsibility should be impressed upon the people, as was done by Nelson at Trafalgar, when he nailed to the mast of his vessel, where all could behold it, this sentiment, "England expects every man to do his duty." The Englishmen did their duty and won the battle, but the distinguished Mr. Nelson was killed. Positivism would appeal to the sense of duty, which method was hardly ever known to hav any other than a favorable result.

Mr. Hunn, who availed himself of the platform with electric promptness, proposed that at the next election we hang up a banner bearing the motto, "America expects every man to do his duty." That would be a good test of Mr. Searing's ingenious hypothesis as to moral responsibility. Mr. Hunn went on to speak of the necessity of disintegration, which word he succeeded in pronouncing in three different ways. Politics was a trade which all should learn. Every man that did not vote should be fined. Mr. Hunn believed that Mr. Searing was bilious.

At this point the presence of Mr. Shook in the hall was discovered, and a suggestion that he should occupy the platform for a short time was received with vociferous cheers. The chairman nodded his head in approval; the secretary thumped the table with a silver half-dollar; the Boycotter man stamped his feet and shouted "Shook;" and a well-known poet and author clapped his hands with delight. Other intelligent though less distinguished persons present applauded also, and Mr. Shook took the platform. He said he was very glad to meet with the club again after a separation of many months. Before him he perceived pretty much the same old faces. A few fresh-looking individuals had been added to the audience, but they had the peculiar yearning expression visible on the countenances of the older members—a yearning after the new and the novel. Generally, however, he recognized the identical ancient sixpences that he had become familiar with long ago. Mr. Shook saw no improvement in the club, and did not claim much for himself. If the club had known he was coming it would hav exerted itself more.

Dr. Weeks said we should develop the feeling that the majority has no control over the minority. This as opposed to kingly and priestly rule.

Mr. King said he found great difficulty in criticising the lecture, because Mr. Searing was not doing the best he could. The fact was, Mr. Searing was not seen at his best when he read, nor was he fully appreciated when he talked. You could not blame him if he failed to successfully apply Positivism to the politics of such men as Johnny O'Brien and John Kelly. A great man might try that and fail, and still do middling well. Mr. Searing had not considered the relativity of things. We must hav reorganization. You cannot expect a prosperous state of society when women are paid only half as much as men for doing the same amount of work, and men are not paid more than half as much as they earn. The bottom, Mr. King said, was falling out of government and morality.

Mr. Andrews arose to express his good will, and his pleasure at the apparently increasing disposition toward conformity of views observable among the speakers. On the political horizon he could see that there were dangers. What they were he would not stop to say, as he was to speak next Friday evening on a question which would involve a discussion of that matter. Our present system of getting at public opinion was defectiv. In large cities no interest is taken in public measures until it is pumped into the citizen by the politicians just before election. The voter does not know what is going on in his ward and don't care. The ballot, as a method of taking the sense of the public, works well in small towns, but fails entirely in cities.

Professor Vaughan, of Virginia, said that he had no objection to having a man for his god if the man was large enough. Humanity is an organism. We are all links, so to speak, in the great human sausage. A man, the professor argued, could not, with both hands occupied, and leading a dog at the same time, tickle his left ear with his right hand without serious results. The mind is a fenceless continent.

Mr. Searing, in reply to his critics, said he had studied politics. He learned to play draw poker, and that it was necessary to treat your constituency in order to make your calling and election sure. He would never read another paper before the Liberal club, but hoped to deliver some extemporaneous ones. He thanked the audience for their kindness and attention.

Next week Mr. Andrews will review Herbert Spencer's recent contribution to the Popular Science Monthly on "The Coming Slavery."

Girard College.

John E. Remsburg in Freethinkers' Magazine.

On the 26th of December, 1831, Stephen Girard died, leaving a fortune of seven and a half million dollars. A part of this he bequeathed to his relativs, to the cities of Philadelphia and New Orleans, and to various charitable institutions; but the greater portion of it was left for the purpose of establishing and maintaining a college for orphans in Philadelphia.

The bequest was made to the "mayor, aldermen, and citizens of Philadelphia, their successors and assigns, in trust, etc."

In his will he says, "There are, however, some restrictions which I consider it my duty to prescribe, and to be, amongst others, conditions on which my bequest for such college is made, and to be enjoyed.'

Among these restrictions was the following:

"I enjoin and require that no ecclesiastic, missionary, or minister of any sect whatsoever shall ever hold or exercise any station or duty whatever in said college; nor shall any such person ever be admitted for any purpose, or as a visitor, within the premises appropriated to the purposes of the said college. In making this restriction, I do not mean to cast any reflection upon any sect or person whatsoever; but as there is such a multitude of sects, and such a diversity of opinions amongst them, I desire to keep the tender minds of the orphans, who are to derive advantage from this bequest, free from the excitement which clashing doctrins and sectarian controversy are so apt to produce; my desire is, that all the instructors and teachers in the college shall take pains to instil into the minds of the scholars the purest principles of morality, so that on their entrance into activ life they may from inclination and habit evince benevolence toward their fellow-creatures, and a love of truth, sobriety, and industry, adopting at the same time such religious tenets as their natural reason may enable them to prefer."

An attempt was made to set Girard's will aside. "First, because of the exclusion of all ecclesiastics, ministers, and missionaries of any sect, and secondly, because it limits the instruction to be given to scholars to pure morality and general benevolence, and so excluding by implication all instruction in the Christian religion."

The case reccived two hearings before the United States Supreme Court, Daniel Webster appearing in behalf of the complainants. Justice Story delivered the opinion of the court, which was that the bequest was valid and legal.

Two million dollars were expended in the erection of suitable buildings. The college was formally opened on the first of January, 1848. The immediate government of the institution is vested in the directors of city trusts, composed of twelve citizens of Philadelphia appointed by the judges of the Court of Common Pleas, who, with the mayor and presidents of councils, constitute the board.

Girard wished "to instil into the minds of the scholars the purest principles of morality." and keep them free from the demoralizing influence of theological teachings. To secure this he wisely enjoins the exclusion of "ecclesiastic, missionary, and minister." Has this provision been respected?

In 1852, four years after the opening of the college, Mr. Henry W. Arey, secretary of the institution, made the following statement respecting its management:

"The order of exercises on week days is as follows: The pupil's rise at 6 o'clock, take breakfast at 6:30, attend morning worship at 8, assemble in the school-rooms immediately afterwards, remain there, with 15 minutes recess, until 12, then take recreation for half an hour, dine at 12:30, take recreation from 1 until 2, remain in the school-rooms from 2 until 4 with recess of 15 minutes, attend evening worship at 4, take recreation two hours, supper at 6, assemble in the section rooms at 7, retire to the dormitories from 8 to 10, according to their age.

"On Sundays the pupils assemble in their section rooms at 9 o'clock in the morning, and at 2 in the afternoon, for religious reading and instruction, and at 10:30 o'clock in the morning, and at 3:30 in the afternoon, they attend worship in the college building.

"At the daily or Sunday religious exercises, the president or some layman selected by him officiates, as by the will clergymen are not privileged to be admitted into the college. On week-days the exercises consist of singing a hymn, reading a chapter from the Bible or New Testament, and prayer. On Sundays, in addition, an appropriate discourse, adapted to the comprehension and situation of the pupils, is delivered."

The above is substantially the method of management at the present time. The wolf is permitted to enter in sheep's clothing. Ecclesiastics, missionaries, and ministers, in the guise of unordained clergymen, daily officiate within the walls of the institution.

Thus Girard College stands a monument to Infidel charity and Christian perfidy.

How Would Mr. Green Pay for the Printing?

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Permit us to throw out a suggestion to Brother Green, and also to invite the opinion of fellow truth seekers as to the free publication in the "Directory" of the names of Freethinkers. The list, I am sure, does not represent one-tenth of our strength—at least I can safely say this for Canada—and until a collection of names is made and inserted free we will not pan out on paper as we ought to. I would like to hear from others on this point. Yours, Gananoque, Ont, Geo. G. Meikle.

Chilling News for the Elect.

James A. Buck is a prosperous lumber merchant of Canada. He makes money, dresses well, and his only failing appears to be a tendency to go on periodical religious sprees. His last jamboree was celebrated in this city. From the Fifth Avenue Hotel he issued the following circular, which bears particularly hard on the churches and priests. We commend it to the Halls and Dixes and Morgans and Potters of the city:

THE SAVIOR'S SECOND COMING.

I am directed by the King of Heaven, who dwells in my bosom, using me as His instrument of clay, to publish that He, the Holy Mind of Nature, will, before many days, appear in a Cyclone of Fire, Sweeping the entire Animal Kingdom off the Planet Earth into the "Bottomless Pit" (Boundless Space), where the Devil, the Evil Mind of Nature, the "Beast," the clay-being who aspires to govern, and the "False Prophet" the clay-being who preaches Life beyond the grave, "will be tormented forever."

Behold the Judgment Day, with Cyclone Warnings, which hav destroyed many Lives and much property within the past twelve months.

The Millennium Era is now at hand, in which many Members of the Animal Kingdom evolving into Men may liv out the original Natural term of life of 1,000 years enjoyed by our Ancestors before Planet Earth was Cursed by the Evil Mind of Nature.

Go one, go all, in search of the "Tree of Life," found by obeying Matthew's Gospel perverted by False Teachers.

Priests and Preachers who preach for Gold,
The Day of Wrath to them is near;
If they don't find the Savior's Fold,
Before God's Bar they'll soon appear.

They do proclaim a silly Fall
In Eden's Garden long ago;
God says there was no Fall at all,
Nor were there ever only two.

They say, the Countless Stars were made,
And that the Sun did not once shine:
Preaching lies has long been a trade
By many who wear broadcloth fine.

They preach the Savior's Blood for pay,
His plain Command they will not keep:
"Take no gold," the Gospel doth say—
They are "Wolves" appearing like sheep.

They say there is in seeming skies
A Parlor Grand for Souls of Dead.
They say the rotten Dead will rise:
By lies they're housed and clothed and fed.

Gospel Commands are very plain,
The "narrow way" none need mistake;
No one who has a Mind that's sane
Need go to dwell in Brimstone Lake.

"Eternal Life" is not for sale,
The only Crown has been bought up;
Genesis the third has a tale
To tell. With God but two can sup.

Through Calamities last year over 120,000 Inhabitants of Planet Earth perished. An Army of 70,000 Christian Priests and Preachers, trafficking in the Savior's Sufferings and Holy Blood, if they cannot quickly find the "Tree of Life," will be Swept by the Almighty Holy Spirit into the "Bottomless Pit," but will never "perish;" Episcopalian Divines will find a "Trinity College," in which to study through all Eternity the meaning of the word "perish." Presbyterian Ministers "will wonder why their names were not written in the Lamb's Book of Life from the foundation of the World." Methodist Preachers will sing, "Twas great to speak a World from naught," and preach the "fall." Baptist Preachers will wonder why "Immersion" and the "finished work of Christ" did not save. The Devil's "popular Evangelists" will sing "Hold the Fort," and preach then with authority the doctrin of "Everlasting Punishment," and many Idolaters will wonder what became of the crucified body of Jesus after the ascension.

"And whosoever was not found written in the Lamb's Book of Life was cast into the Lake of Fire" (Rev. xx, 15).

The King of Heaven Challenges the entire Population of Planet Earth to fight Him. All Members of the Animal Kingdom possessing Gospel Knowledge, who accept the King's Challenge by not surrendering at once to Him, will be fought through all Eternity in a "Lake of Fire."

Electricity is the Gun
With which Almighty God will fight;
From it no one will ever run,
It is a Chain that does bind tight.

Electricity is the "Lake
Of Fire," which will ne'er cease to burn;
Electricity will soon take
Millions to Hell to Wail and Mourn.

Limping Livezey.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I notice in your paper of March 15th that one Livezey has captured the whole Freethought army. As an Irishman would say, he surrounded us.

For my own part, when I am executed I would like to be present.

I hav had no debate with this crank Christian. How, then, could I retreat, when I hav not even gone into battle?—no fault of mine, for everywhere I go the clergy receive a challenge from me to debate. I believe in debate, but hav been unable for two years to get any minister to meet me, for my sake, his own sake, or for "Christ's sake."

I am ready at the tap of the drum to meet Christ's servants in wordy war—any of them. But they bravely run away, boasting, as they run, what a glorious victory their Lord God is giving them. Is this not a fulfilment of prophecy, that "one man shall chase a thousand?"

Permit me to say that I hav just returned from giving a course of eight lectures in Creighton, Nebraska, to full houses. Because I am publishing a political paper I trust my Liberal friends will not suppose that I hav retired from activ lecture work. It is my expectation to continue that as long as I can wag my tongue. Hence I will receive calls to lecture anywhere in Minnesota, Wisconsin, Illinois, Nebraska, Kansas, or Dakota. Fraternally,

Pipestone City, Minn. W. F. Jamieson.

The Founder of Agnosticism.

From the San Francisco Post.

Professor Thomas Henry Huxley, the founder of Agnosticism, was born at Ealing, Middlesex, England, in 1825, studied medicin at the Charing Cross Hospital, and in 1846 entered the navy as a surgeon. In the winter of the same year he had a good fortune to be chosen as assistant surgeon of the Rattlesnake, Captain Owen Stanley. The exploring expedition of this vessel along the coast of Australia, New Guinea, and the Lousiade Archipelago afforded a brilliant opportunity for the young naturalist. Papers by him on marine animal life were published by the Royal and Linnæan societies, one even attaining the high honor of being included in "The Philosophical Transactions," and on his return Mr. Huxley found that he had already an established reputation in scientific circles. In 1851 he was elected a Fellow of the Royal Society, and in the next year received one of the two gold medals annually bestowed by the society for distinguished scientific achievements. Since then every year has seen valuable contributions to the literature of science from his pen. We can enumerate the titles of but a few of his publications. He was joint author with Mr. Tyndall in 1857 of "Observations on Glaciers;" "Theory of the Vertebrate Skull" (1858); "The Oceanic Hydrozoa" (1859); "The Glyptodon" and its "Osteology;" "Man's Place in Nature" (1863); "Lessons in Comparativ Anatomy" (1864); "Lessons in Elementary Physiology" (1866); "Lay Sermons, Addresses, and Reviews" (1870), perhaps his most popular book; "Critiques and Addresses" (1877); and a sketch of "Hume" (1879) are his principal works. Among the offices he has held are those of professor in the Royal School of Mines, where he delivered, besides the ordinary series of scientific lectures, a practical and most valuable series of lectures to workingmen; member of the London School Board for many years; professor of natural history in the Royal School of Mines; professor of anatomy to the Royal College of Surgeons; and in 1871 lord rector of Aberdeen University. He has, of course, a long array of titles from various scientific bodies, and his degree of LL.D. was conferred upon him by Edinburgh University. When, a few months ago, the death of Mr. Spottiswood left vacant the office of president of the Royal Society, probably the highest scientific honor existing in Great Britain, Huxley's name was at once recognized as the one to be selected. His election was a foregone conclusion, notwithstanding the bitter but numerically weak opposition of the more conservativ members of the society. As a biologist, anatomist, and naturalist he has no living equal. The most recent way in which Professor Huxley's name has been brought before the public eye has been in connection with a letter from him printed by the editor of the "Agnostic Annual." Professor Huxley, while admitting the authorship of the letter, declares that its publication was a breach of confidence. However that may be, the letter is a very bold defense of the Agnostic doctrin that it is impossible to define the unknowable in terms of the known. In the course of the letter Mr. Huxley declares that he himself first introduced the name of Agnostic into modern philosophical discussions. The above interesting facts we condense from an article in the Evening Post, accompanied by a wood-cut of the distinguished scientist. It need only be added that the fundamental doctrin of Agnosticism, and even the name itself, are centuries older than the Christian era.

Lectures and Meetings.

Mrs. Lake and Professor Peck hav been engaged for the Sundays of April by the Liberal Society of Flint, Mich. Eastern societies desiring their services will so address them,

The 6th Annual Convention of the New England Anti-Tax League meets in Codman Hall, Boston, Sunday, April 13th, at 10.30 A.M., 2.30 and 7.30 P.M. Rev. J. M. L. Babcock, J. W. Stillman, Esq., Joseph P. Sheafe, E. H. Heywood, Lyman A. Wiley, A. D. Wheeler, and other speakers are expected.

Speaking of Mr. J. H. Burnham, Harry Hoover, of Pittsburgh, Pa., writes as follows: "I am not a hero-worshiper, and not inclined to giv people taffy. But when a man or woman renders real solid service to the cause of Freethought, I feel that it ought to be recognized and appreciated. Mr. J. H. Burnham, of Michigan, has just finished a six weeks' engagement with our League, and has given such entire satisfaction that we contemplate employing him again in September. His lecture on "The Scientific Basis of Thought" was a profound and scholarly one, and his closing one, "What Has Christianity Abandoned?" left nothing to be said on the subject. His address is Saginaw City, Mich. By all means let him be constantly employed."

West Plains and Willow Springs, and other towns in or about Howell county, Mo., and on a railway from Kansas City to Memphis, Tenn., perfectly healthy region, high and dry, about latitude 37, in the midst of all varieties of the best timber ever seen, with some fifty saw-mills around, hav not one single furniture manufactory within a hundred miles or more of them. So says the West Plains Journal. A hint to those on the lookout is enough.

Science.

The Genesis of Man.

Phylogenesis, which is a cause, begins with the moner; ontogenesis, which is a consequence, begins with the cell. For man, as for all animals that hav advanced beyond an extremely low stage of existence, there is but one mode by which new individuals of the race can be created and the race itself perpetuated, and that is by the contact of two germinal principles having opposit sexual polarities. Each of these principles is a simple cell. The male is the sperm-cell, the female the germ-cell. Only by the union and literal blending of these two cells can generation take place.

The cell is the lowest organized form of existence. It is also the last term in the histological analysis of the tissues of the body. An animal is ultimately nothing more than an organized assemblage of cells, a compound individual.

The moner is a lower form of existence than the cell, the lowest known form, and may be distinguished as a wholly unorganized and undifferentiated individual.

There are but two essential properties of a cell, a central nucleus and surrounding protoplasm. The only organization, the only differentiation, is that which distinguishes these two substances. And this is itself very slight. Chemically they can scarcely be distinguished. Both consist of a carbon compound, containing a certain proportion of nitrogen, and belong to the albuminous group, of which all animal tissues are principally composed. The nucleus is generally of a darker color, but sometimes of a lighter, and may or may not contain in its center a minute dot—nucleolus. It also may or may not be surrounded by a membranous envelope. This is generally present in the cells of plants, while it is generally absent in those of animals.

The form of cells differs according to the circumstances of their existence. They are the most plastic and easily modified by external conditions of all organized beings, and therefore make the best subjects for the study of the law of adaptation. Stationary cells in a motionless medium are uniformly spherical. When subjected to pressure they assume hexagonal, elongated, or compressed forms, according to the nature of the pressure. Cells that are activ in a liquid medium hav a portion of the matter composing their outer parts extended into a caudal appendage away from the direction of motion. In addition to the forms named, cells frequently assume others, sometimes taking wholly amorphous shapes, resulting from the peculiar conditions to which they may be subjected. They frequently change their form, and this not only from external influences, but in obedience to internal or subjectiv determinations. For a cell is a living creature. It possesses all the essential characteristics of an organized individual. The only functions necessary to characterize a living being are nutrition and propagation. Both these the cell possesses. It grows by the absorption of nourishment from the medium in which it livs. Where this nourishment is not uniformly mingled throughout the medium, but exists in the form of scattered solid particles, the cell acquires the power to extend portions of its substance into temporary organs of grasping (pseudopia), and thus to inclose and devour its food. It thus improvises a mouth and jaws on whichever side it may need them, and feeds itself after the manner of another animal.

The cell propagates, like many much higher organisms, by division, or fission. It continues to take nourishment and to grow until it reaches the limit fixed by heredity for its size, and then, instead of growing larger or of ceasing to take food, it divides into two distinct cells. Each of these then goes through with the same process of nutrition and division, and so on.

But besides these two essential phenomena, which are common to all life, whether animal or vegetable, the cell performs two other truly animal functions. It possesses the power of locomotion, and the faculty of sensation. Cells with caudal appendages, called lash-cells (Geisselzellen), hav acquired that form in consequence of their independent activities in their liquid medium. Various other forms are traceable to similar causes. As a proof of the possession by cells of a faculty of sensation, we hav only to consider the efforts of various kinds to obtain their food. Some are actually carnivorous, and show a certain degree of dexterity in capturing their prey. They are, therefore, not only capable of feeling, but, in a qualified sense, of thinking and of reasoning.

There is no essential difference between the sperm-cells and germ-cells of higher animals, and the simple cells of which many lower animals consist, and beyond which they never advance. We can only say that among the infinitly varied forms of life we find that while most creatures hav developed into highly compound states, and only revert to the original unicellular condition at the beginning of each individual's existence, there are still many creatures that never progress beyond this primordial stage, and whose entire existence is passed in the form and condition of simple cells.* Among such creatures may be named the Amœbæ, the Gregarinæ, the Infusoria, etc. These animals, as well as those which consist simply of an accumulation or aggregation of cells, such as the Labryinthuleæ, etc., and which form the second stage of development, never rising above the cellular condition, are classed by Haeckel, together with his Planœada, in a grand division or department by themselvs, and called Protozoa.

According to the fundamental biogenetic law above stated, the cell must be the primordial form out of which all more highly organized beings, including man, hav developed, since it is the original stage of their ontogenetic development. And as there still exist unicellular beings resembling the sperm-cells and the germ-cells of higher organisms, the deduction is warranted that all higher creatures are the descendants of some form of these unicellular beings. Considering the differences that may and do exist even in cells, and in animals consisting of a single cell, Haeckel is led to the conclusion that of all the unicellular creatures known to science, the Amœba bears the strongest evidence of being the original progenitor of the human race.—Lester F. Ward.

*A complete description, both popular and systematic, of all the unicellular organisms known to exist, was published by Prof. Haeckel in 1878, entitled Das Protistenreich.

Curious Property of Ice.

Under certain circumstances ice does not behave as a solid, but as a viscous fluid, like very thick treacle. Glaciers do not move down in one block, but flow, accommodating themselvs to the varying width of their channel. Professor Tyndall planted a row of sticks in a straight line across a glacier, and after a few days the line had become a crescent, with a concavity upward, showing that the middle of the glacier moved faster than the sides, just as in a river the stream is stronger in the center. Two theories hav been put forward to account for the viscosity of ice; one is that it is a true viscosity, and the other is that it is produced by the effect of pressure in lowering the freezing point of water, so that whenever the ice is subjected to a great pressure it melts. The water then yields to the pressure, and instantly refreezes in its new shape. A striking experiment—due, I believe, to Mr. Bottomley—illustrates this. A block of ice being laid across the backs of two chairs, a fine iron wire is put over it, to which is hung a heavy weight. In a short time the wire passes completely through the ice, and allows the weight to fall, while the ice is not broken, nor is any mark visible where the wire has passed. The explanation is that the pressure of the wire melts the ice below it. The water is displaced by the wire, and fills the space above it, where, the pressure being removed, it instantly refreezes. The viscosity of ice can be shown by cutting a long, thin slab of ice, and supporting it on two chairs, when it will, even in a temperature below freezing, gradually bend with its own weight.—Nature.

Migration of Birds.

Familiar as the migration of birds is to us, there is, perhaps, no question in zoology more obscure. The long flights they take and the unerring certainty with which they wing their way between the most distant places, arriving and departing at the same period year after year, are points in the history of birds of passage as mysterious as they are interesting. We know that most migrants fly after sundown, though many of them select a moonlight night to cross the Mediterranean. But that their meteorological instinct is not unerring is proved by the fact that thousands are every year drowned in their flight in the Atlantic and other oceans. Nothern Africa and Western Asia are selected as winter quarters by most of them, and they may be often noticed on their way thither to hang over towns at night, puzzled, in spite of their experience, by the shifting lights of the streets and houses. The swallow and nightingale may sometimes be delayed by unexpected circumstances, yet it is rarely that they arrive or depart many days later, one year with another.

Professor Newton considered that were sea-fowls satellites revolving round the earth, their arrival could hardly be more surely calculated by an astronomer. Foul weather or fair, heat or cold, the puffins repair to some of their stations punctually on a given day, as if their movement were regulated by clockwork. The swiftness of flight which characterizes most birds enables them to cover a vast space in a brief time. The common black swift can fly 276 miles in an hour, a speed which, if it could be maintained for less than half a day, would carry the bird from its winter to its summer quarter. The large purple swift of America is capable of even greater feats on the wing. The chimney-swallow is slower—ninety miles an hour being about the limit of its powers; but the passenger pigeon of the United States can accomplish a journey of 1,000 miles between sunrise and sunset. It is also true, as the ingenious Herr Palmen has shown, that migrants during the long flights may be directed by an experience partly inherited and partly acquired by the individual bird. They often follow the coast lines of continents, and invariably take, on the passage over the Mediteranean, one of three routes. But this theory will not explain how they pilot themselvs across broad oceans, and is invalidated by the fact, familiar to every ornithologist, that the old and young birds do not journey in company.

Invariably the young broods travel together; then come, after an interval, the parents; and finally the rear is brought up by the weakly, infirm, molting, the broken-winged. This is the rule in autumn. The return journey is accomplished in the reverse order. The distance traveled seems, moreover, to hav no relation to the size of the traveler. The Swedish blue thrush performs its maternal functions among the Laps, and enjoys the winter holidays among the negroes of the Soudan, while the tiny, ruby-throated humming-bird proceeds annually from Mexico to Newfoundland and back again, though one would imagin that so delicate a little fairy would be more at home among the cacti and agaves of the Tierra Caliente than among the firs and fogs of the North. —London Standard.

The Body of Our Earth.

We hav long since thrown off that haughty illusion that our earth is a favorit star, and even the center of the universe, infinit in space and time. The earth is a star among stars. No special God has distinguished our globe and made it the throne of his glory. No God required for his glorification the servil adoration of kneeling mortals. No God needed the host of blind, humble children, to please whom he creates the sun and the moon and the stars to rise on the blue firmament as lights of day and night. Must these millions of creatures dwell in spiritual darkness that God may enjoy the fulness of his strength? Should God hav created all these immeasurable, astonishing, ever unattainable worlds on high but to impress our childlike mind with adoration? Is God the manager of a play-house, who exhibits the wonders of his creation to obtain as much applause and admission as possible?

It is clear that God wants not our admiration and prayers to be happy, but the church and her mortal priests need our admiration, prayers—and money—to reign, to deceive, and to liv. Needs God a throne, a central residence? Has infinitude limits, beginning, center, end? Can it suffice to infinity to be adored by an atom, as our earth is? Smiling, we but pity the hallucinations of our ancestors, who brought God and his happiness to depend on the psalms and anthems of this human race, wee and void in body and mind. Let us escape the misty surroundings of the church, which daylight but dimly enters; let us proceed into the free temple of nature. And lo! gay, verdant valleys, permeated by living springs, changing with voluptuous slopes; lofty mountains, overshadowed by gigantic pinnacles, covered with eternal snow; winter, autumn, summer, and spring clasp hands from the summit of the glacier down to the deep, deep lake that mirrors the sky and the stars! Earth ever rolls onward. Since millions of years she shows her changing surface to the sun. Here are drawn the long, undulating lines of the mountain ridge, from which slope endless plains and prairies, lacking the least elevation. Deeper and deeper it goes down, to the softest features of terrestrial physiognomy, to the majestic, glittering sea, to the infinit watery plain that embraces all continents, and cherishes and strengthens them as the nurse nourishes the infant. The sea is the heart and the lungs of the earth. From it the clouds arise to fall down, a fertilizing rain, all over earth's dry bosom. The sea is in continuous motion. Ebb and flood are its vivifying pulse and breath of life. In the formation of the clouds it regulates the current of the wind, and moderates all climates of the globe. The large rivers which on every shore originate from it and abduce the fertilizing fluid through the finest little veins of the brooklets and springs into the ribs, cracks, and furrows of the firm ground are comparable with the sanguinary system of the human organism. Through the cloud the sea effuses inexhaustible nutriment upon the earth, and feeds all springs and rivulets till, as powerful streams, on all shores they join again with the eternal ocean, to return as a cloud. This is the circulation of the water on earth, comparable with that of the blood in the human organism. Eternal laws regulate the weather on all the earth. Tornado and wind, rain and drought, decrease and increase of heat, are submitted to unchangeable rule from pole to pole. Earth is a whole, her regulator and respirator is the sea. The single countries present deviations according with their altitude, their accessibility and distance from the sea, with the bearance of the relativ parts of the surface of the sun, the first giver of heat. The laws of heat and moisture are the same on all our earth, and unalterable. They reign with the eternal immutability of a mathematical formula. The highly intelligent Egyptians, who undoubtedly formed the center of universal culture five thousand years ago, had then brought to consciousness the laws of heat and moisture. And we are reminded of these laws when we hear the Jewish rabbi's emphatic enunciation that "as long as the earth standeth, seedtime and harvest, and cold and heat, and summer and winter shall not cease."—Translated from the German of Dr. Adolf Silberstein by F. W. Opp.

Acts of Peter and Paul.

Some portions of the book entitled "Acts of the Holy Apostles Peter and Paul" are of an early date—certainly prior to Origen, A.D. 186–253. A book called the "Acts of Peter" was condemned by Pope Gelasius, about A.D. 494. We gave in our "Revelations" a very brief synopsis of all the "Apocryphal Acts and Revelations," but a more extended notice of those relating to Paul is now needful.

This book is a supplement to the Acts of the Apostles. The Jews in Rome, hearing that Paul was coming, besought the Emperor Nero to save them from such a calamity; they said that the presence of Peter was affliction enough. Nero promised to prevent Paul's landing in Italy. Peter's disciples notified Paul of this on the 20th of May (year not given) by a letter conveyed by two men to the island of Gaudo*melita*. (Melita agrees with Acts xxviii, 1, but how about Gaudo?) With this warning, Paul sailed to Sicily instead of Italy, landing at Syracuse, where the shipmaster left his vessel and followed the apostle. The next stopping-place was Rhegium, in Italy; then they crossed over the strait to Messina (in Sicily); thence they proceeded to Didymus (probably on a little island north of Sicily), and thence to Pontioli. At Messina Paul ordained a bishop, and at Didymus he stayed one night. But in the book of Acts only two days are allowed for the sailing from Rhegium to Pontioli (xxviii, 13), and no mention is made of any intermediate stopping.

The shipmaster who accompanied Paul to Pontioli is named Dioscorus. But Dioskouroi, "Twin Brothers," i.e., Castor and Pollux, is the Greek name of the ship that conveyed Paul from Melita to Syracuse; hence the probability that the apocryphal story-teller mistook the name of the ship for that of the captain. The Syriac name of the vessel is Thama, "Twins."

Dioscorus was bald-headed, like Paul; and while the apostle was hiding in Pontilio, the captain went out and talked so boldly that Nero's detectivs, believing that he was Paul in the disguise of a sea captain, took and beheaded him and sent his head to Cæsar, who showed it to the Jews, on the 14th of June, causing them to rejoice at the death of the heretic who had disturbed all Palestine.

Paul was grieved at th fate of his captain, and in retaliation prayed to the Almighty to punish Pontioli. Then he and those that believed in the word of God went forth to Baias (now Baja, ten miles west of Naples), where they had the pleasure of seeing Pontioli sink six feet under water; and the writer adds: "There it is until this day, for a remembrance, under the sea." But it must hav since emerged, for the town of Pozzuola now exists with 8,000 inhabitants, seven miles southwest of Naples.

From Baias (Baiæ on ancient maps) Paul went to Gaitas, where he stayed three days; thence to Tarcinas, stopping seven days; thence sailing by the river (canal?) to the Three Taverns, where he remained four days.

The destruction of Pontioli alarmed Nero, and he called the Jews together and said: "This is because I hav caused Paul to be beheaded." But the chief of the Jews appeased him by answering: "It is better that one city be destroyed and not the seat of thine empire."

Departing from the Three Taverns, Paul "came to Appii Forum, which is called Vicusarape" (vicus signifies "street," and rapio "to plunder"). Here he had a curious dream. He saw one sitting on a golden chair and a multitude of blacks beside him reporting certain evil deeds which they had seen done. One said: "I hav managed that the bishop Juvenalius, whom Peter ordained, should sleep with the abbess Juliana." This significant revelation was sent to the scandalized bishop the next day, and it caused him to run and throw himself at Peter's feet, saying: "I believe this is the light which thou wast awaiting." But Peter said: "How is it possible when Paul is dead?" Then the messenger was produced who satisfied Peter that Paul was alive. Peter then sent delegates to meet Paul at the Three Taverns, described by the writer as distant from Rome 38 miles; but a note from the "Antonine Itinerary" givs the distances as follows: "To Aricia is 16 miles, to Tres Trabernæ 17 miles, to Apii Forum 10 miles." Paul gave thanks at the arrival of the delegates, and departing from the Three Taverns they slept in the city of Aricia.

The reported arrival of Paul filled the Jews with consternation. They went to Simon Magus, and entreated him to inform the emperor. Simon was also astonished to learn that the bald head sent to Cæsar was not Paul's The Jews then waited on Paul, and tried to induce him to vindicate the Hebrew faith in opposition to Peter, who, they said, had abolished the Sabbath, and destroyed all the bulwarks of the law. Paul's answer was equivocal; he claimed to be a true Jew, and wished to meet Peter; if Peter had any new teaching, Paul would convict him in their presence; but if he conformed to the book of the testimony of the Hebrews, it became them all to submit to him.

So the Jews went and brought Peter. The two apostles wept for joy as they embraced each other. Paul related the story of his voyage, and Peter told what he had suffered from Simon the Magian. The rest of the day was spent in telling these things.

At dawn the next morning Peter came again to meet Paul. A multitude of the Jews were already before the door, and there was great uproar between the Christian Jews and the gentiles. Paul remonstrated with them, and by repeating some of the sentiments in his epistles appeased both parties. But then the Jews complained of Peter for renouncing their synagogs. This drew forth a speech from Peter, ending with the statement that on the cross Christ "offered the whole burnt-offering of his own body and blood as a sacrifice for all the world." This convinced most of the people. And on account of Paul's teaching many became Christians, even from the emperor's bed-chamber, and refused to return to the army or the palace. Among the believers were Libia, wife of Nero, and Agrippina, wife of the prefect Agrippa. (Nero's mother Agrippina, grand-daughter of M. V. Agrippa, was put to death A.D. 60, by her son. She had poisoned Claudius, A.D. 54.)

Simon Magus now began to denounce Peter as a wizard and a cheat. Simon had made a brazen serpent move, had caused stone statues to laugh, and had raised himself into the air. Peter had healed the sick, made the blind to to see, put demons to flight, and even raised the dead. Simon, being summoned before Nero, changed his own form and stature, becoming a child, a youth, and an old man, so that the emperor believed him to be the son of God. But Peter denounced Simon to the emperor as a liar and an apostate. Simon in turn warned Nero against both Peter and Paul, saying that if they were not destroyed the kingdom could not stand.

To test the claims of all three, Nero ordered them to appear before him on the following day. The report of the dialog between them and Nero is quite long. We note only a few points.

In answer to Nero's question, What is a Nazarene? Simon said: A man belonging to Nazareth, a city of Judah! (Nazareth was in Galilee if anywhere.)

Nero having asked, Who is Christ? Peter answered: What this Simon falsely affirms himself to be; but take the writing of Pontius Pilate sent to Claudius! (A D 41–54.)

The aforesaid letter was produced and read, being in substance as followers:

When I was procurator, the holy one promised to the Jews came and wrought miracles. All the people called him the son of God. The chief priests brought him to me saying that he was a wizard. Believing them, I scourged him, and delivered him up to their council. They crucified him. My soldiers guarded his grave, but he rose on the third day. They bribed the soldiers to say that his disciples stole the body. But the soldiers nevertheless testified that they saw him after he was risen. The Jews are not to be believed.

Nero appealed to Peter to say whether these things were so. Peter said they were, but that Simon was full of lies and deceit—was part man and part devil. Simon retorted that Peter was a poor uneducated fisherman, and wondered that Nero could endure him. "But," he added, "I shall forthwith order my angels to come and avenge me upon him."

Nero remarked that Simon had not only raised a dead man, but had presented himself before him three days after being beheaded. Peter answered: "But he didn't do it before me." And then he contrived a plan of circumventing Simon, by having Nero's servants bring a barley loaf, which Peter concealed in his sleeves, and challenged Simon to tell what he had done or was thinking of. Simon said that none but God knew the thoughts of men, and then called upon his great dogs to come forth and eat Peter up before Cæsar. The dogs came rushing at the apostle, who drew forth from his sleeves the pieces of barley loaf that he had blessed, and lo! the dogs vanished.

"Behold," said Peter to Nero, "I hav shown thee that I knew what Simon was thinking of; he promised to bring angels against me, but they are only dogs—not god-like but dog-like angels."

Nero now appealed to Paul, who said, "If thou permittest this magician to do such things, it will bring down thine empire."

Simon then said: "Build me a lofty tower, and I will go up on it, and call my angels to take me to my father in heaven in the sight of all. This will put to shame these uneducated men."

The angry dialog continued. Paul predicted that though Simon might seem to raise himself toward heaven, he would be sunk down to hades. Simon wished to cut short the controversy, and told Nero not to believe these circumcised knaves. Peter charged Simon with having been circumcised also, which the latter was forced to admit; but he said it was at a time when the rite was enjoined by God.

At last Nero began to doubt not only the pretensions of Simon, but of the other two men. So he ordered the tower built, and on the following day a multitude assembled to see what Simon would do. The rest of the story has been told in chapter lix of our "Life of Simon Kepha." The result was the fall and death of Simon Magus, whereupon Nero put Peter and Paul in irons, and soon after ordered Peter to be crucified and Paul beheaded. This glorious consummation, the writer tells us, was on the 29th of June. But history informs us that Nero died June 11th, i. e., eighteen days before he executed the apostles, and three days before he showed the Jews the head of Captain Dioscorus, believing it was Paul's!

Appended to this absurd fabrication is an account of Paul's death. As he was led out to execution a God-fearing woman, blind of one eye, named Perpetua, met him and wept. "Giv me thy handkerchief," said Paul to her, "and when I turn back I shall giv it to thee." She gave it. The soldiers laughed and told her she would lose it. "Bind his eyes with it," said she, "when you cut off his head." This was done. He was beheaded at a place called Aquae Salviae, near a pine-tree, three miles out of the city. Before the soldiers came back the handkerchief was restored to Perpetua, with drops of blood on it; and as she carried it her blind eye was opened. After three hours the same soldiers returned, and meeting Perpetua, said to her, "Thou hast lost thy handkerchief." "No," said she, "I hav both got my handkerchief and recovered my eyesight." This miracle converted the three soldiers, and they refused to return to the city. Perpetua reported this in the palace of Nero, who ordered the soldiers to be executed, and the woman to be imprisoned. But in the prison she converted the female keeper, named Potentiana, sister to Nero's wife, who also became a Christian, and fled from the palace with some of the senators' wives. But both these women were soon put to death by Nero; Perpetua was thrown over a precipice, and Potentiana was tortured and at last burnt in a furnace.

A Request from Elmina.

Will friends who write to Elmina please giv full name and address each time? I hav a letter to-day from Chloride, N. M., but no name or address; so how can I fill the order for books, papers, and photos? Once I had an order of $5 for books, and the only signature was, "A Natural-born Infidel." A year after, I came across an old letter of that friend that had his name to it, and I then wrote him how it was that no books had been sent. Some address me "Pa.," and some "Ga.," and then wonder why books don't come. Where one gets a hundred letters a week, they cannot remember names and addresses, or even take trouble to look over 200 or 300 letters for them. All publishers are bothered in this way; hence it is well for the memory of writers to be jogged now and then. Truly, ELMINA.

Comstock as a Moral Bookworm.

From the Brooklyn Eagle.

Mr. Anthony Comstock may be doing a good work in arresting publishers who happen to hav a novel on their premises of whose principles he disapproves. If he could exterminate all the novels ever written by Mr. G. W. Reynolds, of England, he would, in our opinion, do a service to literature by destroying a great amount of trash. But our opinion of the literary value of "The Mysteries of London" must not blind us to to the fact that publishers and booksellers hav rights which everybody except Mr. Comstock is disposed to respect, and that until an Index Expurgatorius is duly established by law, with Mr. Comstock as its presiding officer, we are not bound to accept him as our literary censor, still less as chief inquisitor of our book shelves. No doubt he is a good judge; he is so familiar with immoral literature that with him to see is to embrace and lug it along with him to the station house. But the bookseller may not be so deeply read in immoral literature as Mr. Comstock, and may suppose that a novel which has circulated all over England and never been objected to by that government, even though full of libels against the reigning family, may legally be reprinted and sold in our republican country. No doubt Mr. Reynolds would be much obliged to Mr. Comstock for advertising his book, which is now so old as to be in need of a fresh lease of publicity. But does Mr. Comstock seriously intend to visit the book stores as a smeller of bad odors? Will he last long enough for such an arduous and extensiv mission? By parity of smelling, he should at once seize "Tom Jones" and "Joseph Andrews," as well as "The Adventures of Jonathan Wild, the Great." Has he yet put hands on Rabelais, or is a Frenchman too much for him? Is he afraid of Pope and his friend Swift, the late dean of St. Patrick's? Why doesn't he make Shakspere giv bail for Sir John Falstaff's appearance? The courts will not be able to contain the books that he must seize. And he must make his complaint against a goodly company even of the inspired writers. The author of Solomon's Song, when discovered, must be sent to Sing Sing.

The most effectual way of exciting a morbid curiosity for unhealthy books is to prohibit them, or to advertise them sensationally, as Mr. Comstock is doing.

That Bible Amendment.

W. M. Kennedy, Recorder of Muscatine county, Iowa, asks:

"Is it possible to get the names of Senators and Representativs who hav in the past and do now advocate the God-in-the-Constitution measure? Why would it not be a proper thing to publish, that all might know who are striking at our liberties? There's to be an election soon for president and vice-president. I've been a Republican, but will never vote for a man who has advocated that damnable measure."

So long a time has elapsed since Senator Edmunds reported back from his Judiciary Committee the amendment which recognized the Bible as having a divine right in our schools, and which practically put the Christian God in our Constitution, that it may not be amiss to once more briefly set forth the facts.

On December 19, 1871, Senator Stewart, of Nevada, introduced into the Senate a resolution prohibiting the United States or any state or territory from aiding "in the support of any school wherein the particular tenets of any religious denomination are taught." Nothing came of this, and four years later Mr. Blaine, of Maine, then a Representativ, proposed in the House an amendment to the Constitution reading as follows:

"No state shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; and no money raised by taxation in any state for the support of public schools, or derived from any public fund therefor, nor any public lands devoted thereto, shall ever be under the control of any religious sect; and no money so raised or lands so devoted shall be divided among religious sects or denominations."

The House Judiciary Committee, to whom this was referred Dec. 13, 1875, reported it back on June 2, 1876, with this amendment:

"This article shall not vest, enlarge, or diminish legislativ power in Congress."

This, of course, rendered the measure valueless.

On August 7th the Senate considered Mr. Blaine's amendment, and several substitutes were offered. Mr. Sargent proposed this:

"There shall be maintained in each state and territory a system of free common schools, but neither the United States nor any state or territory, county or municipal corporation, shall aid in support of any school wherein the peculiar tenets of any religious denomination are taught."

Mr. Frelinghuysen, now secretary of state, offered the following:

"No state shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof. No public property and no money raised by taxation in any state, territory, or district, or derived from public lands or other public source, shall be appropriated to any school, educational or other institution, that is under the control of any religious sect or denomination; and no such appropriation shall be made to any religious sect or denomination, or to promote its interests; nor shall any public money, land, or property be divided between religious sects or denominations."

Senator Christiancy's substitute was in this form:

"No state shall make any law respecting the establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; nor shall Congress nor any state raise by taxation, donate, or appropriate any money or property for the support of any church or religious society, nor for the support or in aid of any theological school or seminary, or of any school or seminary teaching the peculiar religious doctrins, or subject in any respect to the control or direction, of any church, religious society, sect, or denomination; and no special or denominational system of religion or religious belief shall, in any state or territory, or in the District of Columbia, constitute any part of the course of study or instruction in any school or institution of learning supported wholly or in part by taxation, or by donation of any money or property by any state or by the United States."

All these substitutes, together with the House resolution, were referred to the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, which, on August 10th, reported them back in this form:

"Resolved, By the Senate and House of Representativs (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), that the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several states as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of the said legislatures, shall be valid as a part of the said Constitution. namely:

"Article 16. No state shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, and no religious test shall be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under any state. No public property and no public revenue, nor any loan of credit by or under the authority of the United States, or any state, territory, district, or municipal corporation, shall be appropriated to or made or used for the support of any school, educational or other institution, under the control of any religious or anti-religious sect, organization, or denomination, or wherein the particular creeds or tenets shall be read or taught, in any school or institution supported in whole or in part by such revenue or loan of credit, and no such appropriation or loan of credit shall be made to any religious or anti-religious sect, organization, or denomination, or to promote its interests or tenets. This article shall not be construed to prohibit the reading of the Bible in any school or institution, and it shall not hav the effect to impair the rights of property already vested.

"SECTION 2. Congress shall hav power by appropriate legislation to provide for the prevention and punishment of violations of this article."

On August 11th the question came up by Mr. Edmunds calling for the regular order of business. On the question of amending the House resolution as reported by the Judiciary Committee, the vote stood [Republicans in Roman type, Democrats in italics]:

Cockrell,	Gordon,	McCreery,	Ransom,
Cooper,	Kelly,	Maxey,	Stevenson—15.
Davis,	Kernan,	Norwood,

Messrs. Clayton, Wright, Morton, Robertson, Cameron, of Pennsylvania, Sherman, and Windom, who would hav voted in the affirmativ, were paired with Messrs. Merrimon, Dennis. McDonald, Wallace, Saulsbury, Thurman, and Bayard, who would hav voted in the negativ. The ques ion then being on ordering the joint resolution, as amended, to a third reading, it was agreed to by a vote of 27 yeas to 15 nays.

Mr. Edmunds then moved that the third reading of the joint resolution take place to-morrow at one o'clock, and said he was frank to say that he made the motion on account of the Senate not being full, and he feared to-night it might be lost on account of not having the necessary two-thirds vote. After a long discussion it was ordered that the joint resolution be read a third time at one o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. Conkling announced that he might not be able to be in the Senate at that hour to-morrow, and, to make the pair even, the senator from Massachusetts (Mr. Boutwell) had joined him in pairing with the senator from Kentucky (Mr. McCreery) on the joint resolution; that senator would vote against the resolution, while Mr. Boutwell and himself would vote for it.

At one o'clock on Saturday, Aug. 21st, the resolution was read a third time, in accordance with the order of the Senate on the previous evening. The presiding officer then announced that it would take its place on the calendar, the order of the Senate directing its third reading having been executed.

On Monday, the 14th, Mr. Edmunds moved to take up the resolution, which was agreed to—yeas, 25; nays, 13. A hot discussion ensued, and the vote on its passage was not arrived at till 1 o'clock in the evening session. A two-thirds vote being required to pass it, it was defeated—yeas, 28; nays, 16. The Republicans supported the measure solidly, the Democrats as unitedly opposing its passage.

This was a narrow escape for the country, and filled the National Reform Association—which is the misleading title the God-in-the-Constitution party hav assumed—with hope. Their organ, the Christian Statesman, indorsed the amendment and declared that "it is a virtual repudiation of the secular theory of government," and would be, if adopted, "an authoritativ interpretation of the meaning and design of the whole instrument." It would "recognize the use of the Bible in the schools of the nation as an existing fact, and will place on that fact the sanction of the Constitution." And at the annual meeting of the association held in Pittsburgh Feb. 7, 1878, the God-in-the-Constitution party adopted this resolution;

Resolved, That the amendment to the United States Constitution, presented by Senator Edmunds of Vermont, affords an opportunity to press the claims of this association, and will secure such amendments to the Constitution as will settle forever its Christian character.

The first part of the amendment was good enough so far as it went, but the portion we hav italicized is worse than poison in good food. Its acceptance would hav prevented, without another Constitutional change, the total separation of church and state, and rendered impossible the just taxation of the millions of dollars' worth of church property now escaping its share of the public burden. It would hav had practically the same effect as the recognition of the Jewish Jehovah. Senator Edmunds's warm advocacy of the measure ought to forever debar him from receiving a Liberal's vote for the presidency—for which place he is sometimes mentioned in connection with the Republican nomination—not because he is a Christian, but because he tried to revolutionize our Constitution, to subvert our government, and place it on a religious basis. No person who will use his official position to advance his private religious views is fit to be trusted. If a Freethinker should take advantage of his senatorial office to legislate against Christians, Mohammedans, or Confucians on account of their religious opinions, we would be the first to condemn him. So we denounce the traitors who tried to put their Bible and their Bible's God into the charter of our republic—a republic which owes its greatness and its liberty to the very fact that all governmental establishment of religion is strictly prohibited.

Theological Evolution in New England.

On the 2d instant the Rev. George A. Gordon, an able young Scotchman, was made pastor of the Old South church of Boston. "No stronger blow has ever been dealt the orthodox creed," says the despatch conveying the item of intelligence, "than by this installation." For over two centuries the Old South has been the leading evangelical church of New England, and its "fifteen pastors hav been foremost in upholding the Calvinistic articles in the orthodox creed." The new pastor is practically a Universalist, and by his installation the Old South has taken the long step from Calvinism to the more modern faith. The installation was no more orthodox than Mr. Gordon's creed. The leading churches and evangelical leaders of New England were invited to participate in the ceremonies, but they were given to understand that no objection they might make to the Rev. Mr. Gordon would be considered.

The heresy of the new pastor consists in denying that the death of Jesus could in any way be a propitiation of God for the sins of men, and in refusing to believe in the reality of eternal punishment. Without an activ and abiding belief in these two dogmas, it must be plain to everyone that Christianity is a lifeless body, simply moving about to save funeral expenses. If men cannot be sure of heaven through the suffering and death of Christ, of what earthly, or unearthly, use is there in worshiping him? To yield homage when such is the state of affairs, taking chances with big odds against us, can be nothing but gambling in spiritual things. If there be no hell, God is left powerless to punish, and is of no more practical use than a statute forbidding crime with no penalty attached for its commission.

Not the least significant part of Mr. Gordon's installation is the acceptance of him by the council by a vote of forty-eight to sixteen. It is true, he would hav been employed in any event, and the large majority in his favor may hav been influenced by the fear of a church fight in case of a refusal to confirm, and the consequent public ventilation of the heterodoxy latent in the different church bodies, but it is fair to assume that at least two-thirds of the whole number of affirmativ votes were cast because of sympathy with the advanced ideas of Mr. Gordon. New England has heretofore been considered the stronghold of Calvinistic orthodoxy. The idea must now be given up. The land of Wesley, Mather, and Bacon has gone over to the enemy, and but few are left to heed the despairing cries from the various Macedonias throughout the country. The truth is, the Freethinkers hav made the theologians ashamed of themselvs; and now all the time they can get between persecutions and sectarian and church quarrels they spend in amending their creeds so they may not insult the common sense of the century. An amended creed is an acknowledgement of error, and a sign of defeat, extremely gratifying to the friends of humanity. May the good work go on till the last serpent of superstition has been strangled!

Editorial Notes.

THE New York Journal tells this story regarding W. H. Vanderbilt's wealth:

"A few days ago Mr. Vanderbilt sent some papers to a gentleman with whom he had business relations. On looking them over, the recipient was astonished to find the rough draft of a memorandum in the czar's peculiar handwriting. It was dated Jan. 15, 1884, and was evidently his last balance sheet, which by oversight had been folded inside another paper. Of course the secret could not be kept, and the figures reached the Journal. An error or two may hav crept in on their travels; but in substance they tell the following:

"Mr. Vanderbilt has registered in his name and in coupon bonds $54,000,000 in 4 per cents, maturing in 1907. He has lately added to these $4,000,000 in 3 1-2 per cents, and yet retains a trifle over $1,000,000 in 6 per cents. The 4 per cents are worth 124, and the market value of his Governments is $70,580,000.

"But the bulk of the wealth of the king of millionaires is invested in railroad securities. He holds 240,000 shares of Michigan Central stock, 300,000 shares of Northwestern, including 80,000 of the preferred stock, and a block of Omaha, 200,000 shares of Lake Shore, and 120,000 shares of New York Central. Besides this are smaller amounts in a score of other stocks, among which are Rock Island, of which he had 29,000 shares, and Lackawanna, where the total was 20,000. Of the others he had in all 21,840—a grand total of 930,840 shares of stocks.

"Of various railroad bonds there was an aggregate of $22,120,000, and of state and city bonds $3,200,000. In miscellaneous securities, manufacturing stocks, and mortgages the sum of about $2,000,000 was shown to be invested.

"Reckoning at yesterday's prices, the value of Mr. Vanderbilt's railroad stock is $98.750.000; of his Governments, $70,580,000; of his railroad bonds, $25,867,420; of his other securities, a trifle over $5,000,000. The aggregate is $201,332,413.

"The czar puts down an item as 'real estate, etc., $3,000,000.' In this is included his splendid Fifth Avenue mansion, which, with its furniture and contents, cost nearly or quite $3,000,000. His magnificent art gallery, with its gems from the best modern masters, represents almost $1,000,000. the estimate being that of a local connoisseur who is familiar with the gallery. His stables on Fifty-first street, occupying one of the most desirable building sites in the city, represent $200,000, while the equine beauties there luxuriously lodged would not be disposed of for as much more. Maud S. would bring $75.000 at a forced sale, and her owner would not dispose of her for any price. Early Rose and Aldine are also held above price.

"The czar can take life comparativly easy on an income of twelve millions a year, and watch his wealth pile up without any effort of his. From his Governments he draws $2.372,000 a year; from his railroad stocks and bonds, $7,394,320; from his miscellaneous securities, $575 695; or $10,342 from his investments alone. Thus every day they earn for him $28,334.25. Every hour sees him $1,180.59 richer, and every minute means $19.67 added to his hoard. Besides this, he calculates to make $2,000,000 every year by fortunate sales. His reinvestments last year he calculates did this."

The Independent suggests that the "czar" establish in this country a university, to be called "the Vanderbilt University," on a scale so broad and magnificent as to be fully equal to the very best university in Europe, at a cost, including endowments and scholarships, of some twenty-five or thirty millions, or even forty millions of dollars. We would supplement this by urging Mr. Vanderbilt to return to the people who hav used his railroads the exorbitant sums he has wrung from them by extortionate charges and the wholesale purchase of legislatures. Or he might set apart a few millions as a conscience fund to help Felix Adler reform the tenement house system of this city and giv the railroad laborers who hav really produced this wealth a decent place to liv in. But it is in nowise likely he will do anything of the kind. A fast horse, a strong cigar, and a bottle of good old wine satisfy the "czar's" physical needs, and of intellectual ambitions and humanitarian desires he seems to be destitute.

SOME time ago the Liberals of Alexandria, Minn., made up a purse of about $20, and with it purchased from THE TRUTH SEEKER Liberal books, which were presented to the village library. No fault was found until last fall, when a writer in the Women's Christian Temperance Union stated that "Christian mothers were pained at the character of the books brought by their sons from the village library." One of the directors of the library, under the nom-de-plume of "Justice," asked for specifications, and was answered, "French novels and Ingersoll's works." As one of the regulations of the library provides that minors shall not be allowed to take out books without a certificate from their parents or guardians authorizing them to do so, it is difficult to see on what grounds "Christian mothers" can justly complain. The library is not supposed to be run for the exclusiv benefit of Christians, and if they do not want their children to read Ingersoll's works they can show their bigotry and fear for their religion by forbidding them to be taken out. But when a "Christian mother" publicly affirms, as did the writer in the Women's Christian Union Temperance column of the village paper, that Ingersoll is immoral, and points for proof to the scurrilous pamphlet issued by Clark Braden, she forgets what is due to her womanhood and to her pretended love of truth and purity. If "the solicitude of Christian mothers for the moral well-being of their children outweighs all other considerations," they should bear in mind that quoting the words of a liar is not the best example to set before them. The controversy over Mr. Ingersoll's works has extended through the winter, but as yet the books are on the library shelves, and we hope there are Freethinkers enough in Alexandria to keep them there. The French novels will hurt no one who lets them alone, but as they were not presented to the library by the Liberals, they may be left for the Christians to defend. They can certainly be no more salacious than the Song of Solomon, nor more vulgar than portions of Leviticus and Ezekiel, and we never heard a "Christian mother" condemn these. Probably the animus of the opposition may be found in the fact that the trustees of the library are all Freethinkers. But they are also the substantial men of the county, one being a member of Congress, another is the coroner and county physician, another the county superintendent of schools, and the postmaster is on the board, with the cashier of one of the national banks, also a judge of probate, county auditor, court commissioner, and village recorder. With all these Freethinkers in office, and five of their churches without pastors, the Christians of Alexandria will not be apt to get much public sympathy, except from the village editor, who charges the Agnostic regular advertising rates for publishing his share of the discussion.

A NEW censor has been appointed for the arch-diocese of New York by Cardinal McCloskey to designate the literature that may be read by Catholics, or rather to indicate what books may not be read. Explaining his new duties to a Telegram reporter the other day, the Rev. Father Brann said that he had simply been delegated to supervise the works issued from the Catholic press. A different light was put upon the matter, however, by the Rev. J. J. Riordon, of St. Peter's church. This clergyman says, "A censor of publication has always been deemed a necessity in the Roman Catholic church. In the early days of the church it was not, however, found to be in such need as in the sixteenth century, when Wicklif, Huss, and others began to scatter heretical writings and when printing was invented. When a person writes a book on faith or morals he submits it to the censor of his diocese for his approval. The censor is generally a bishop or cardinal. Upon examination, if the book contains nothing unusual or heretical it is so stated by the censor. It is mainly on account of the failing health of the cardinal that he has given this position to Dr. Brann and has directed him to read over and criticise any book submitted to him. In Rome we hav the Index Expurgatorius. Any book placed on the index is considered dangerous to morals and faith to read, and all are warned against them. Heretical works, such as Gibbon's 'Rome' and Eugene Sue's books, are placed on the index. Once a book goes on the index, Catholics are not permitted to read it. It is the same here, if a religious book has not the approval of the censors, it is deemed dangerous to faith and morality. Among those books I may mention those by Zola. I think one of the greatest evils to youths and others is the reading of immoral books. As a mother looks after the food of her child so that it may be properly nourished, so do we look after the mental food which is taken by those under our care." It must feel nice to be a Catholic slave, and hav to ask a priest what you may eat and what you may read. There are some seven millions of these cringing serfs in this country, and a million of them hav votes.

QUESTIONS.—A friend writes and inquires: "1. Does the book for the mailing of which D. M. Bennett was imprisoned come under the head of Freethought literature, as the term is generally understood? 2. Can or hav the present postal laws ever been used to the exclusion from the mails of writings antagonistic to the Christian religion?"

With regard to the first question, we think that the publication alluded to was rather physiological than otherwise; yet free mails are one of the features of the Freethought movement. As for the second question, we must say No, to the best of our remembrance.—Investigator.

Mr. Seaver forgets that Mr. Bennett's first arrest was for mailing his "Open Letter to Jesus Christ," and that it was because of his failure to procure Mr. Bennett's indictment upon that and "How Do Marsupials Propagate?" that Comstock arrested him for mailing "Cupid's Yokes." Pending the arrest and the quashing of proceedings, the "Open Letter" was tabooed as much as or more than the "rather physiological" pamphlet. Comstock seized all the "Open Letters" he could find, and they hav never been returned.

Mr. Seaver also forgets that W. H. Lamaster's Iconoclast was denied mail privileges by the postmaster of Indianapolis without any legal proceedings because, as the postmaster affirmed, it was indecent, but really because it was blasphemous.

When one recollects how easy it is to say "indecent" and "obscene" of any book or paper that is objectionable the dangerous elasticity of the Comstock postal laws becomes plainly apparent, and the reasons for its total repeal are obvious. Freethinkers generally regard certain portions of the Bible as obscene and indecent, and if an Infidel postmaster chooses he could refuse the minister the privilege of sending a copy of that book to his female friends. This would be unsatisfactory to the ministers, as their conquests are easier when preceded by a thorough perusal of that ancient work. But seriously, the man who ca not see the danger these laws are to literature, when bigoted prudes and Christians are the sole judges, must be afflicted with the blindness of ignorance, or rendered incapable of reasoning by previous Christian training. The latter is most likely to be case with the Investigator's carping Boston contemporary.

ONE of the liveliest printed discussions ever held between representativs of Infidelity and Christianity is the "Humphrey-Bennett Discussion," well known to the majority of our readers. In it the affirmativ reverend, G. H. Humphrey, pastor of the Welsh Presbyterian church, Nos. 225, 227, and 229 East 13th street, made reckless charges of immorality against Paine, Voltaire, and all the prominent Freethinkers whose names he could call to mind. Mr. Bennett's retort was to publish a long list of clerical misdemeanors, mostly of an amatory nature. Were Mr. Bennett alive now it would pain him to hav to add to the monument of iniquity that on April 3d, in the alleged year of Mr. Humphrey's lord and savior 1884, Justices Ford and Smith, sitting in Special Sessions court at the Tombs in this city, found it necessary, according to the evidence presented to them, to compel the Rev. Griffith H. Humphrey, pastor of the Welsh Presbyterian church in East Thirteenth street, to giv bonds in $500 to pay $5 per week to support Laura A. Jones's child. As Mr. Humphrey is a married man and as Miss Jones is an unmarried young female, it seems queer that a decision of this nature should be given by such eminent police jurists as Messrs. Ford and Smith, but the bald fact remains that they hav done so. We trust there is some mistake. We trust the General Sessions court, to whom the case is appealed, will reverse this expensiv decision and vindicate the pastor, for it is inconceivable that one who, seven years ago, was so loud in comdemnation of immorality can be guilty of being the father of a child by a woman not his wife. Similar cases hav been heard of, but Mr. Billings has proved that they are not common—at least not over 33 1-3 per cent of the ministers can be rightly accused of such practices.

ON Thursday of week before last Dwight W. Thrall, agent of the Connecticut Humane Society, visited the house of Geo. C. Velie, in Winchester Center, to investigate a complaint which had been made regarding the treatment of Velie's insane wife. They found the woman in the attic of Velie's house on a bunch of hay, covered with a worn-out buffalo robe and a bundle of rags. The condition of filth which she was in was so abominable that it forbids description. Officer Thrall says that this is the most inhuman case that ever came under his observation. Mrs. Velie has been fastened in a room during the nights of the past cold winter without fire, and the wonder is that she has not frozen to death. Steps were at once taken to rescue the woman, and provide for her needs. She has been insane for years. She is about fifty years old, and the mother of quite a large family. Three of the children—one of the three being a grown-up son, and another a grown-up daughter—liv at home and were knowing to the treatment of their mother. "As near as we can find out," says the Winsted Press, "Velie is a true Christian. He is very pious, a church-member, and a regular church attendant. Being true Christians these people cannot of course be expected to hav many of the finer sentiments and humanitarian impulses which distinguish unbelievers and mere nominal Christians from the simon-pure of the church, and they should be judged leniently. So we judge them. Pity and piety are as wide apart as the poles, and as a pious man thinketh so is he."

THE World devotes considerable space to the examination of the evidence for and against the Catholicism of the Hon. James Gillespie Blaine, of Maine, and concludes by urging Mr. Blaine to settle the point for the public. Although we hav no evidence that would hold in court, the word of Texa Siftings has been passed that the ex-secretary of state is a Freethinker. It is also common rumor in Washington that Mr. Blaine is an ardent admirer of Col. Ingersoll's sermons. But, like many other eminent persons, the Maine statesman is willing to conceal his theological notions that he may lose no votes when running for office. We will wager that the World will receive no answer to its query.

THE faithful are warned not to hav anything to do with the Rev. A. C. Dixon, of this and other states. He is a powerful Methodist exhorter, has been the means of bringing many souls into the church of John Wesley, and carries a pocketful of credentials, but he is a bad man. Notwithstanding that he has several wives, he professed to become enamored of a young lady at Ellenburg, N. Y., and endeavored to persuade her to marry him. Failing in this, he got drunk, and in that condition took a train for the West. Broad is the road that leads to pious rascality, and thousands walk together there.

UNDER date of March 31st, Mrs. Slenker writes us that she had received no substantial encouragement to go out on her tour of Spiritual investigation. Her correspondents all "hope she will go," but forget to inclose the wherewithal to buy railroad tickets and pay mediums. She concludes, therefore, that "friends who seem to desire her to go are not wishing it enough to put money in it." This is all right, she says, but it is a great disappointment to her, and she hopes that the way will yet be opened by friends buying books of her, or donating the necessary amount.

DR. HAMLIN once nursed back to life a blasphemous sailor whom he found in the streets of Constantinople apparently dying of cholera. Three years after he received the following letter from him: "DEAR DOCTOR HAMLIN: Thank God, I still survive the ded! I am here workin' and blowin' the gospel trumpet on the Eri Kanal." Dr. Hamlin felt that he had had his reward. To reclaim a sailor from his sins, and send him "blowin' the gospel trumpet on the Eri Kanal," he realizes, is something that is not given to every man to accomplish.

AT the anniversary meeting of the Methodist Educational Society held in this city on the 3d, one of the clergymen said that "the sweetness and light of Matthew Arnold is a bank of London fog; it hides the stars of heaven, and chills the hearts of men. The cup he offers to humanity is the same old cup that was offered to Jesus on Calvary—a cup of vinegar and gall." This sentiment was loudly applauded by the assembled preachers. Mr. Arnold will undoubtedly feel flattered if he hears of this.

MR. D. G. KALB, of Springfield, Ill., is preparing a "Combination Historic Picture" of Methodism in the Sangamon district. It will consist of face likenesses of the pastors, presiding elders, and bishops of that vicinity. The photographs of those lights of Methodism whose names appear in Col. Billings's year book will not be included.

THE pious temperance women of Cleveland, Ohio, close their doors against the families of men who sell liquor. Yet the chances are ten to one that there is more morality, and twice as much happiness, in the families of some liquor dealers as in the family of the average minister. It has passed into a proverb that the sons of ministers hav the devil for a godfather.

WHEN Father McGlynn celebrated solemn high mass on last Sunday a large rat appeared in one of the aisles, walked up to the middle of the sanctuary, and paused directly in front of the high altar. Who says these are not days of degeneracy—for rats?

THE Tribune has heard of a preacher whose first name was Ananias. Strangely enough, his last name was not Cook.

LET every man do his own thinking and say his own saying. —J. M. Buckley (Methodist).

Letters from Friends.

CHARLOTTE, MICH., March 25, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find 75 cents for three of the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL. I fully indorse every word in Elmina's letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 8th, and will do all in my power to circulate the instructiv book among my friends. A worker in the Liberal cause, LAURA POLHAMUS.

NORTH HURON, N. Y., Feb. 21, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I hav on hand a hundred or more copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER, which I am willing to giv to any person who would like them to read or distribute, for that purpose, and I will pay postage on the same. Persons wishing them can address G. W. SMITH.

MAUSTON, WIS., March 31, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been waiting for the past two weeks to send you the inclosed $11, but circumstances over which I had no control prevented me from doing so. Bad roads prevented D. C. Robinson from coming to Mauston, and for the past week sickness prevented me from such duties, and I am scarcely able to pen these few lines to you to-day. But I hav no doubt you will excuse unavoidables. THE TRUTH SEEKER is the best Liberal paper ever published in this or any other country.

Please use the inclosed money as directed.

WM. HOLGATE.

AURORA, MINN., March 26, 284.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $3.25, to renew my subscription on THE TRUTH SEEKER for another year, and 25 cents for the FREETHINKER'S ALMANAC.

It is a very easy matter to step over to one's neighbor's, but when you come to ask them to take THE TRUTH SEEKER it is not so easy to get them to subscribe. There are several in this place who call themselvs Freethinkers, but when I ask them to subscribe for your paper they are not so free.

I hope you will ever be able to keep on in the good way you hav commenced. A. RICHARDS.

WEST FAIRLEE, VT., March 25, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: By a little exertion last evening I procured seven names, to which you will send THE TRUTH SEEKER for three months. The Methodists and Adventists are holding revivals every night, so I thought a few TRUTH SEEKERS would be beneficial, as most are accosted by the leader, a Miss Haley: "Don't you want to come to Christ? Do you want to lose your soul? Jesus died to save you; why will you delay?" etc.

Fraternally, ETHAN DIMOND.

P. S.—The "Crimes of Preachers" and "Christian Questions Answered" which I sent for are doing good service. I am circulating them where they do the most good. E. D.

MAMMOTH HOT SPRINGS, WYO., March 19, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: My subscription having expired, I inclose money for renewal. Also send me the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL.

A most important and valuable feature of your paper is the correspondence. It enables one to estimate the actual condition of thought throughout the country, and also enables Liberals to communicate with each other. Special information is often correctly obtained about land and opportunities for settlement, which, coming from Liberals, is considered quite reliable. The Park Iron Company has paid out no money for eight months to workmen, hence all business at this place is quite dead. If workmen had been paid and work continued, several new subscribers could hav been got for THE TRUTH SEEKER. G. L. HENDERSON.

WEST UNION, OHIO, March 23, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Orthodox superstition rules here with a strong hand and an ignorant brain, but I think there is some ground into which good seed can be drilled, harrowed, or hammered. So we intend to try to sell the "False Claims," and if we can't sell it, we will giv it away, for it is the grandest array of solid historical facts on the subject of Christianity that I ever read. "The Short History of the Bible," I intend to study thoroughly and shoot a portion of it at them in the shape of a lecture. Some of them shall hear the truth or else keep their fingers very tight in their ears. Our pocket-books are short, or we would invest in a large order for books, and a long subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. If you would drop in a small package of leaflets and tracts, we would distribute them free for your benefit and the good of the cause.

Yours in the search for truth, J. F. BECK.

MERIDIAN, TEXAS, March 24, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I will inform you that my dear husband, Charles Ahlstedt, departed this life October 29, 1883. He was a great Freethinker all his life. He always tried to help the cause of Freethought all he could so far as he was able. We hav been subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year, and my husband always seemed so glad when it came. He often said he could not liv without it, and told me on his death-bed to always renew my subscription when it expired. I am left alone with two little children. They are both boys, and I hope if they liv they will be good Freethinkers.

I would hav written sooner, but trouble and sickness hav prevented me. Please find inclosed twenty-five cents for the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL. I am a good friend of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I wish it success. ANN AHLSTEDT.

MILFORD, PA., March 24, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $4, for which continue my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and send me the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL and "Crimes of Preachers," and the balance use to help make up the deficit on Mr. Bennett's monument.

I wish to congratulate you on the success of THE TRUTH SEEKER since the death of its grand and fearless founder. He was truly a martyr in behalf of Freethought. I had great fears for the life and success of his paper, the adored child of his brain, for which he sacrificed his life, after his death; but it livs, and in many respects has improved. There is less controversy, and more solid reading and seeds of thought sown. You may rest assured that any person who subscribes for THE TRUTH SEEKER has brains that are not devoid of some culture and thought. They require and can digest solid food.

Wishing you success and growing prosperity, I am,

Respectfully yours, W. W. WEBB, M.D.

MADRID, N. Y., March 27, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I hav had very good success in circulating THE TRUTH SEEKER. I hav got six families reading it here. I hav sent the first six numbers on a six-mile heat down the river. I hav got the next six numbers tied up to follow after. I am going to send for the Nonconformist. I believe it to be a good paper to circulate. I will try and get ten or twelve families to read THE TRUTH SEEKER this summer, and get attached to it; then I think the most of them will take it, unless they are too ignorant to do their own thinking. To tell you the truth, it is extremely unpopular here to be an Atheist. The hell-fire insurance agents hate the Atheists the same as their illustrious predecessors did the abolitionists fifty years ago. I can count more than a dozen Liberals here now. Six years ago I did not know one. I find a great many Infidels who will not speak their sentiments nor take a paper. H. A. RAYMOND.

So. GARDNER, MASS., March 24, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed is 25 cents, for which please send me TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL. I intend to renew my subscription soon. I am sitting up in a bed of sickness, from which my doctor told my friends that I could never arise, and I felt prepared to meet my fate cheerfully as a Pantheist. The doctrin of THE TRUTH SEEKER is good to liv and die by.

I hav been looking through Paine's "Age of Reason" months past, and I noticed that it is filled, as it were, with his belief in a creating, superintending, personal God, and he seems to think rather meanly of those who did not. He raves against the Old Testament Jehovah for calling Joshua and Samuel to their indiscriminate butcheries (and so do I), but is it not strange that his clear brain, with the writings of the great Spinoza before him, could not see that a cyclone or an earthquake, or the relentless lightning, sent by his merciful, superintending God, does as cruel work in the way of destruction and carnage as did any or all of those New Testament brutes? I wish that some of your correspondents would take up Paine on this question, as I think he deserves it. SILAS ADAMS.

MILLSVILLE, N. S., Jan. 5, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: This is my fifty-eighth birthday, and so I spend it writing to you. I don't believe in a personal God or a personal devil, or any life hereafter. There is nothing but orthodoxy around here, and they all say I am going headlong to hell and the devil. They can't tell me where hell is, but say I will find out soon enough. When I am dead and under the ground I don't care for all their hells and sulphurous pits, where it is said that nine-tenths of mankind go. The clergy can bark away, like the cock that crowed at the sun, which neither shortened the day nor lessened the heat or light. The poor cock had to suffer all the scorching heat of the noonday sun in spite of his merry din. Priestcraft is like the sirens, who are said to entice mariners from their ships by singing to them, and then destroy them. If what M. E. Billings says is true about the sky-pilots, I think it is well to hav nothing to do with them. All we know about a God is what somebody has told us, and the one that told us knew nothing more about him than we do ourselvs.

Our good old friend, D. M. Bennett, who founded THE TRUTH SEEKER, should not be forgotten. He should hav a grand obelisk, and his statue of full size placed on the top of the monument. Although Brother Bennett is dead, THE TRUTH SEEKER livs, and it is to be hoped that it will liv for a thousand years to come.

I gave a copy of the "Open Letter to Jesus Christ" to Wm. Martin Rae, an old man of over seventy, and he said the man who wrote it ought to be hanged. I asked him if he would put the rope on him, and he said he would. I would like to know how he would relish being hung for praying to his God or his Jesus Christ? We all count him a good man, and better than a great many. I believe if friend Rae had lived in Christ's time he would hav helped the priests to put Jesus Christ to death, and then think he was doing right. If the Christians could hang or burn us they would do it.

JOHN SILLARS ARTHUR.

FRANKLIN, March 31, 284.

MR. EDITOR: A calm, as it were, has come over the little town of Franklin; the conductor of the gospel of fear, of superstition and bigotry, has left. In his last sermon he impressivly told his congregation how degraded they were, and he made the startling declaration that even preachers sometimes fall to the lowest depth of degradation. He knew a preacher, in a certain Western town, who ran away with another man's wife. It struck me that he had been reading "Crimes of Preachers in the United States," by M. E. Billings. Mr. Graves has been instrumental in converting upwards of one hundred souls, all of them, I presume, happy and looking forward with fond expectations to the great day when Gabriel shall come and blow his horn. I hope that they will not lack the confidence and nerve necessary to meet such a great personage. I hope they will not get excited and run for dear life, say at the rate of fifty miles an hour, as a band of Christians known as Ascensionists did in Georgia. Harper's Magazine has it as follows: "Some years ago, in Georgia, that band known as Ascensionists were having a grand revival. One day, when the meeting was in full force, a storm came up, and a young gentleman who was out hunting with his servant took refuge in the church door. Being curious to see the service, the two hunters crept up into the gallery, and there hid in a place where they could observe without being observed. 'Come, Lord, come, our robes are ready; come, Lord, come!' cried the preacher, while all present gave a loud Amen. 'Marsa Gabe,' whispered Cuffy, lifting his hunting horn to his mouth, 'let me gib dem jist one toot.' 'Put that horn down, or I'll break your head,' replied the master, in a whisper. The horn dropped by Cuffy's side, and again the minister said, 'Come, Lord, we are all ready for thy coming. Come, Lord, come.' 'Do, Marsa Gabe, do jist lemme gib 'em just one little toot,' pleaded Cuffy, wetting his lips and raising the horn. 'If you don't drop that horn, Cuffy, I'll whip you within an inch of your life,' whispered the exasperated master. 'Blow, Gabriel, we are ready for his coming; blow, Gabriel, blow!' pleaded the minister. Cuffy could no longer resist the temptation, and sent a ringing blast from end to end of the church; but long before its last echo died away, his master and himself were the only occupants of the building. 'I's ready for the licking, Marsa Gabe,' said Cuffy, showing every tooth in his head, 'for I 'clare to gracious it's worf two lickings to see de way common farm cattle kin git ober de ground wid skeared 'Scensionists behind them.'"

There is quite a Liberal element prevalent in this town. There are eighteen Spiritualists, over sixty Atheists, and a great many more Liberal-minded people. I know of only five persons in the town that take the great TRUTH SEEKER. I do not know how to account for it. Lukewarmness is a sympton that I cannot help but notice. I must hav the great TRUTH SEEKER. I cannot do without it—it is my bible.

THOMAS V. WILLIAMS.

THE FREE LAND QUESTION ANSWERED.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to say a few words in reply to friend Chapman's article in THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 15th, on "The Free Land Question." I am somewhat surprised that "after a dozen years' experience and much thinking," he can offer no other cure for the evil of a homeless people than to "quit raising incapables." For such being impossible, were it the only remedy, the evil must necessarily continue, and if some other remedy is not found and administered, we fear will soon so undermine the waning health of our bloated "robberment," that nothing but some extreme remedy, bleeding, perhaps, will save its life. Although the case is chronic, we believe it can be cured without the shedding of blood if attended to in time. The remedy we would like to see tried is this: So amend the Constitution that no individual or company, not now owning to exceed 160 acres of land, shall hereafter own in excess of that amount. The effect would be that large land estates and monopolies would break up, and the land in excess of 160 acres to each heir would revert back to the government, to be disposed of as other government land, allowing heirs compensation for improvements thereon.

"Here in Kansas are most likely half a million of people that hav been thus cared for by the nation. Every citizen over twenty-one years of age is allowed to purchase 160 acres of land at $14, and take take their choice at that." Is not friend Chapman a little mistaken? The fact is, the choicest lands in Kansas hav been owned by Indian tribes and been ceded to the government to be sold at $1.25 per acre, or $200 per 160 acres, or granted to monopolies, railroad companies, etc., for nothing; and are held from both capables and incapables or from five to ten dollars charged for ever acre of it, thus driving the "homeless people" farther west to the land of the cactus and drouth, away from employment or any means of support. No wonder three-fourths of them failed; the wonder is that all hav not. Another reason that many hav failed was on account of interest on money. To illustrate, a fifty-mile strip of the southern part of the state, save some hundred thousand acres that our robberment allowed Joy to gobble up at seventeen cents per acre, was ceded to the government by the Osage Indians, to be sold for them at $200 per 160 acres. The homeless, landlord-oppressed people of the East flocked to this land and took claims with a forlorn hope of making a home and paying two hundred dollars for it in two years, besides supporting a family. Being poor as poverty, and no chance to make money in time to pay for it, they had not a dollar wherewith to do it, many being unable to pay expenses to and from the land office; so they borrowed money at 60 per cent per annum, getting $200 and giving their note secured by mortgage for $320 to be paid in a year from date, but at the end of the year they found themselvs no better off, it being all they could do to keep meal, meat, and quinine in the shanty. So the Shylock closed, took their land, and sent them on rejoicing over the misery produced by usury.

Cursed be usury! Those people were not drunkards, not vicious, not bad citizens, but simply incapable of paying 60 per cent interest. Now, friend Chapman, we would not prevent a poor farmer from selling his land to a good one, if the good one had not already his full share; there are plenty of good capable farmers that would be glad to get it and able to buy that hav none at all. But, were they to keep it, the condition would be no worse for the capables than for Jay Gould or some foreign capitalist to own it and hold it for speculation. Think again, Brother Chapman, and if you are a reformer, as I take you to be, I believe you will use your influence and ballot to crush this land monopoly before it crushes us, as it is sure to do if let alone. H. H. HUTCHESON.

THE FREE LAND QUESTION AGAIN.

COLUMBUS, KAN.

J. H. COOK TO GEORGE W. CHAPMAN, Dear Sir: I am glad you hav brought your logic (?) to bear on J. Hacker, myself, and others on the land question. "My head or yours," as Capt. John Smith said to the Turk.

You say that before I talk about giving land to a large class, who will not work it, I must tell how to keep these people in possession of a home. Is that your measure of justice to humanity? If a poor man works for you, I suppose you first find out how he will use his money, or whether he will spend it for bread or whisky before you will pay him. I see you are a physician. You ask of a patient pay for your services. He says to you, "Before I pay you must find out what you will do with your money," or whether you hav "mental capacity" to take care of it or keep it. What do you think of such logic when applied to yourself?

Shall we be unjust to man and deny him his natural rights and possessions because he may not use them as we would? You say that in Kansas many hav been cared for (bought land or taken homesteads) by the nation. I suppose you would say that railroad companies hav been cared for to the amount of 200,000,000 acres by the nation. What is the nation? And who compose it?

You tell about getting land at "government prices." Who are the "government," or who ought to be? The whole people, Kansas included, or the president, his cabinet, and Congress? Where did this nation get the right or power to sell or buy one foot of the land which, like the air and sunbeam, belong, in use, not possession or legal ownership, to every man, woman, and child.

That great legal authority, Blackstone, says, "No just reason can be given why a piece of parchment should giv title to land" If, according to your logic, no one should hav any land but those who hav brains to "conduct agricultural operations with profit," what do you say of those few who legally own millions of acres, conduct no agricultural operations, but hold them for speculation? I infer you think that is right, since you hav nothing to say about it. You do not attempt to refute any of the propositions which the land-reformers present, but seem to ignore or evade them.

I am impressed that you are opposed to orthodox opinions, but not to orthodox laws, customs, and practices. You may be a humanitarian in some respects, but a man who questions the land's being free to all, and not to be monopolized, is not a full-fledged reformer.

It is possible you are a land-grabber, and hav yourself sold land "for a thousand dollars that cost you nearly nothing?" If so, I do not expect you to sympathize much with the landless, or to hav a very nice or keen sense of natural right or justice. I am for eternal truth and justice in regard to land as well as every other subject. I am an agitator and educator, and expect it will require time, if not war and devastation, to bring the land and humanity into true, just, normal, natural relations.

Now, if you please, giv me "fits," and show up my false logic and absurdities. J. H. Cook.

Eureka, Cal., March 19, 1884.

Mr. Editor: It is about a year ago that I wrote to you last. I often see articles in The Truth Seeker to which I would like to reply, but the distance is too great, and, besides, I am like Paul—the spirit is willing but the flesh is weak.

It seems the prohibitionists are not tormenting you so much as they used to; and it is to be hoped that they will take a rest. Every Liberal will admit that intemperance is a great evil, but few Liberals seem to be aware that prohibitory laws are a greater evil than intemperance. On the whole, we are too much governed already, and half the laws on the statute books ought to be repealed. There is no sense in making laws in regard to anything which is governed by the laws of supply and demand. So long as there is demand for liquors, so long will the supply be forthcoming. Sumptuary laws, usury laws, liquor laws, etc., always prove useless.

I am astonished at a certain class of Socialists who would like to hav it regulated by law when and how often a husband ought to kiss his wife, and what people ought to eat and drink, and on which side they ought to sleep at night. Nothing is more senseless and derogatory to human progress. The Milwaukee Congress erred to a great extent in the same direction. We may all boast of our freedom, but few people know what freedom is. A person who would like to see everything regulated by law, is nothing but an abject slave. The editors of Lucifer are doing good service to the world just now in trying to liberate from mental serfdom those who are slaves without knowing it.

Your correspondent, J. Hacker, givs himself a great deal of unnecessary trouble in regard to government land. The troubles he complains of exist; but they cannot be avoided in the way he proposes. Had he lived on the frontier as long as I hav, he would think different from what he now does. Within a few miles of where I write this, about 50,000 acres of timberland were stolen from the government within the last two years by a syndicate. They had five men in their emyloy, who scoured the country to hunt up men to take up land for the syndicate. As no improvements are necessary in taking up a timber claim, the thing was easily done. The entryman was furnished with the numbers of the land he was to take up. With them he went to the land office, swore to anything he might be asked to swear to, and filed on the land described. Then he went to the company's office, signed the deed which was made out while he was at the land office, received his fifty dollars (the usual amount paid), and went his way; the company paying for the land and taking the title.

This is certainly all wrong, but how can it be remedied? Not under existing laws. But of one hundred persons who pre-empt or homestead land, there is not one who takes it in good faith. The whole of it is a swindle; and the homestead and pre-emption laws ought to be repealed. If Mr. Hacker knew what class of people pre-emptors and homesteaders usually are, he would view the matter in a different light from what he now does. He means well, but lacks the practical experience.

For the edification of those who know nothing about pre-empting or homesteading land, I will giv a short description how it has been done where I liv.

The land here is mostly timber land, and when lumber rises to a high figure, which may happen from six to ten years, millionaires and speculators will buy up timber land. This is the time for the pre-emptor. The country at once gets alive with people, you cannot tell where they all come from, and they all start out for pre-emption claims. They pick out a piece of land, or pay some adept in the business to pick it out for them, and then file on it. As improvements are required, they build a cabin on it with boards split on the premises; that is not done to comply with the law, it is done to keep others from jumping it. The cabin is usually a little larger than a child's playhouse; high enough to stand up in and long enough to lie down in. This holds the claim. When spring comes, the pre-emptors club together in small squads and go upon their claims to put in a crop. The seed they often take out in their pockets. When they arrive on the claim they take a little brush and inclose a circle containing a few yards of ground, and there they sow the seed. And so they go from claim to claim. Often the potatoes that are planted in the evening are dug up again in the next morning and cooked for breakfast, for nothing that is sewed or planted is ever looked at afterwards. When the time of probation is up, each squad goes to prove up their claims, they all acting as witnesses one for the other. If you should read the testimony after the proof is taken, you would think that there was a nice house on each of the claims, and several acres of ground in good cultivation, yet the whole of it is a fraud and a lie. After proving up, the pre-emptor sells for whatever he can get, if he had not sold before he proved up, and if the excitement is still raging he starts out the next day for a homestead; but if the excitement is over he wants no homestead, and if a stranger, starts out for other parts of the world to play the same trick over again. This is the way pre-empting is carried on. There is no use in howling about monopolists and land-grabbers. Poor people are no more honest, on an average, than rich ones; they are really the parties who steal the land from the government, and often, after they hav sold out to the land-grabber, they turn against him, not from principle, but out of envy and regret that they cannot steal the land over again. Yours fraternally, Robert Gunther.

Evansville, Wis., March 11, 1884.

Mr. Editor: Inclosed find $1 for the Bennett Monument. I never expect to see it. I am an old man past seventy-seven. I hav thought many times I would like to be at your meetings held in New York, but never expect to. I expect to take your paper as long as I can see to read it. I never had any in my family that would read it, or any of the books that I hav bought. My family consists of three grown up daughters; my wife I lost about a year and a half ago. I think more of the success and progress of the work you are engaged in than all others. Hope you will succeed as Garrison did with slavery.

Yours in a good cause, Peter F. Spencer.

Millbrook, March 25, 284.

Mr. Editor: The complacent way in which Mrs. Slenker offers to do Spiritualism the favor (!) of investigating if Spiritualists will furnish the means is highly amusing to me. "It would be of no personal profit to me," she says—this investigation. Indeed, she seems to think that Spiritualism would be put under the greatest obligation to her should she deign to look at it. This beats the impudence of the clergy. I am a Spiritualist, and hav been for thirty years, but when I hire anybody to investigate Spiritualism I shall count myself a lunatic. It is not of the slightest consequence to Spiritualism whether Mrs. Slenker believes it, or investigates it, or looks at it, or sniffs at it, or not, though she seems to fancy that her dictum on the subject is of great importance. Nobody goes about hiring people to investigate astronomy or geology. It's my opinion that no sensible Spiritualist will hire Mrs. Slenker or anybody else to investigate Spiritualism. If my memory serves me right, she saw enough of the manifestations, according to her own statement, during her Northern trip, a year or two ago, to hav excited in an unprejudiced mind, it seems to me, a desire for further investigation, but she seems so willing to believe in annihilation, and so averse or indifferent to being convinced to the contrary, let her enjoy it if she can. If she is satisfied with what warmth she can extract from an iceberg it is nobody's business. A woman convinced against her will does not differ essentially from a man under similar circumstances. Harvey W. Pinney.

Oregon, Mo., March 29, 1884.

Mr. Editor: The prejudice against Freethought is very remarkable. It may be that they are beginning to take alarm so strongly that hate is agitated by fear.

I cannot see among our to-day Christians the least symptom of vital religion. All seem to follow it from habit or ambition. They evidently don't believe it themselvs.

The case of James B. Johnson, of St. Joseph, that is making such a stir, is in print. This man, amiable, popular, and exceedingly religious, has for years been stealing from his employers and generous, trusting friends. Put in charge over a large wholesale drug house, he has stolen enough to set up two considerable places for himself. He had a room whence he shipped the stolen goods. He was a kind, generous man; a most zealous churchman in season and out of season; a shining light among the Christians (Cambellites). Once he told me with a ring in his voice that sounded of tears and prayers, "I fear you are a lost soul, Mr. Irvine." I don't know when I heard such ill news as this about him. Position, friends, family, pride, religion—all were risked or sacrificed. And his fine little family—great God, it is awful! His employers were his warmest friends. Daily he wronged them. And after a competence was secured, he still persisted. Surely there must be something in the theory of obsession by evil spirits. One thing shows his superiority over some of his kind. On discovery he shot himself to death. Not suddenly, but deliberately, after some days of reflection. This is as it should be. But it is an awful example of the utter inefficiency of Christianity to restrain even a naturally good man.

Clarke Irvine.

Tyrzabad, Oudh, India.

Mr. Editor: I am in receipt of your post card, and in accordance with the same hav this day taken out a postal in your favor. I am astonished at the cheapness of your paper. The National Reformer, edited by Mr. Bradlaugh and Mrs. Besant, and to which I am a subscriber, costs me 15s. 2d. a year. The price of a copy of this paper is 2d., and the postage 1 1-2 d. The Truth Seeker, which is a paper about twice the size of the National Reformer, comes all the way from America to this country for only one cent, which is about one-third of the postage paid by me on the National Reformer. England, though the first to introduce cheap postage, seems to be in a state of retrogression in such matters now. You may consider me a life-subscriber to your paper, which is the largest, cheapest, and best Freethought journal it has ever been my lot to peruse. Therefore, should I fall into a few days' arrears with my subscription, do not impute it to a desire on my part to stop my paper, but to forgetfulness.

I hav been fortunate enough to be able to get together a sufficient number of members of the National Secular Society, of which Mr. Bradlaugh is the president, to form a branch of the same here. This is called the Tyrzabad branch of the National Secular Society, and I am its corresponding secretary. It was dreadfully up-hill work when I first started, but the ultimate success is all the sweeter for the difficulties at first encountered. I am in correspondence with Mr. Kedar Nath Basu, of Murshedabad, who is doing grand work for the cause of Freethought in Bengal. It would be superfluous, almost, for me to giv you any praise for the noble manner in which you are carrying forward the good cause, but this much I must say, that you, through your paper, are helping to clear away the myths of superstition from the world, and are helping forward the dawn of a brighter day, not alone for future generations, but also for the present one.

It is my intention to open a subscription list for the Bennett Memorial Fund, and as soon as I hav collected as much money as I can I'll remit it to you.

In conclusion, I hav the pleasure to convey to you the cordial greetings and good wishes of the members of the Tyrzabad branch of the National Secular Society, and beg to subscribe myself Yours truly, W. C. Gibson.

Sebewa, Mich., Feb, 26, 1884.

Mr. Editor: If you will allow me space in your valuable paper, I would like to say a few words on Commemoration Day. Also a few words on prohibition. I think the 23d day of December ought to be considered a sacred day in the Liberal ranks, and I, for one, held it this year, and intend to continue to hold it, in preference to the 25th of December. We held a meeting on the 23d of December to honor our hero, D. M. Bennett. Our speaker was a Mrs. Hubbard, of Berlin, Mich., an inspirational speaker, and I must say that I think D. M. Bennett never received his just amount of praise as he did that day. He never received the honor his moral character and noble labors deserved in this world. She mentioned all the noble men from Washington's time down to D. M. Bennett's, and then placed his name above them all for moral worth and noble works for humanity. Long may his memory be honored, and The Truth Seeker, the child of his brain, be sustained, is the wish of one of his dearest friends. I notice that prohibition is creating quite a good deal of comment from your many readers. And I would say that "the greatest good to the greatest number" should be our motto in relation to prohibition. And by prohibition I mean prohibition of the manufacture of whisky, for just so long as it is manufactured just so long will it be drank, and as long as drunken fathers beget children just so long will drunkards encumber the earth. There is no use in trying to preach drunkenness out of people. It is a waste of time and labor. Reason has no effect on them. You might as well go to the insane asylum and try to reason insanity out of the patients. I consider the drunkard in a condition similar to that of the negro before the war. He does not realize his condition, but we who are not cursed with the appetite for strong drink can see and realize his condition as we did that of the slaves. And therefore it is our bounden duty to free him from his slavery as we did the negro. And in doing this by prohibition I will admit that we take from him the power to get drunk. But in return for this we giv him freedom from drunkenness, which is a greater good, both to him, his family, and society at large. We had to do an injustice to the Southerners, I think, in taking from them their slaves without paying for them. But in doing so we freed the slaves, which was the greatest good to the greatest number. And so it is in every move in life. There is scarcely any great movement in progression that does not crush some things under the wheels of progression's car.

I cannot see as there is any likelihood of ever being relieved from this curse of drunkenness except by prohibition, for there is no use in fighting the effect. But let us strike at the cause. There is no use in condemning drunkards and saloon-keepers so long as our government allows the cause that makes drunkards and saloon-keepers to flourish, as it is at the present time. I know that there are a great many who are very sensitiv about being deprived of their rights. Are they the only ones who hav any rights? Has the mother that bore them no rights that they are bound to respect? Must she stand silent and see her son going the way of all drunkards? Has the wife that they hav promised to cherish and protect no rights, that through their appetite for strong drink they can bring her to the deepest depths of poverty and disgrace? Has the innocent child no rights, that it must be cursed from the day of its birth to the day of its death by the sins of a dishonored father? Away with the idea of being deprived of our rights. It is a disgrace to the Liberal cause to bring such an excuse for one of the most damnable habits that ever cursed the human race. Rather let us consider it a privilege to sacrifice such a right for humanity's good. O woman, must you always be cursed by drunken fathers, drunken husbands, and drunken children; bringing innocent children into the world cursed by the habits of a drunken father, and to fill a drunkard's grave? Giv us the ballot, which these same drunkards deprive us of, and we will see if this curse cannot be removed, and men become what nature intended they should be—worthy the respect and love of woman, which I am sorry to say is not the case now. Scarce one man in ten is worthy to become the husband of a good woman and the father of her children. For God's sake let us be up and doing while the day lasts, before this curse of drunkenness sinks this nation in eternal night. A temperate slave is preferable to a free drunkard.

Yours for prohibition, with all my might and strength,

Mrs. Hattie Reeder.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"His life is long whose work is well,
And be his station low or high,
He who the most good works can tell,
Livs longest though he soonest die."

"Something to Show for It."

BY MAUD MILLER.

How well I remember those words long ago,
When running to father, with a shilling in hand,
How he patted my head in his fatherly way,
And gave me a smile that was suuny and bland;
How he put down the paper just fresh from the press,
And looked into my eyes with his own blue and clear,
And said, in a voice that was earnest and true,
"Hav something to show for that shilling, my dear."

I treasured the words of my father that day,
And straightway I went then and bought me a book,
And often that summer I culled its bright thoughts,
While seated for hours in some shady nook.
And the good that I got from its pages was great;
Although but a child, yet my memory was clear,
And I always remembered my own father's words,
"Hav something to show for that shilling, my dear."

If you hav a dollar to spare, then, young man,
Why fritter that dollar so easy away?
Why not sow the good seed as you journey along,
And invest that same dollar to do good to-day?
What though 'tis but little you hav of your own,
That little spent rightly will happiness giv,
But one hundred cents, do not squander it now,
Hav something to show for that dollar you hav.

Said old Farmer Brown to his neighbor Sinclair,
"How is it, my friend, that your son prospers so?
Why, he owns a nice farm and a home of his own,
And he is but twenty; yes, that much I know."
Then replied his old neighbor, with bright gleaming eye,
"You know his aunt left him some money last fall;
So, instead of spending it foolishly then,
He got something to show for his money, that's all."

Hav "something to show for it" all through this life,
How well it applies to the youth of the land,
As they get their hard earnings each Saturday night,
Be they workingmen's sons or the sons of the grand.
Hav something to show for that hour you hav,
For an hour once gone it can never return;
And would the dear laddies and lassies so bright
Hav something to show from each lesson they learn.

A Wedge of Gold.

"Now, John," said old Mr. Oliver to his son, "I am going to giv you this wedge of gold. It is solid clear through, and will be of great benefit while you are plodding through this world. Be careful you do not lose it, for if it is once lost you will find yourself in great trouble, and I doubt if you could ever replace it. With a good common school education and this wedge of gold I see no reason why you should not be prosperous and happy all the days of your life."

"It isn't a very big wedge," said John, feeling the paper that it was wrapped in.

"No, John; but it weighs considerable, after all, as you will find upon examination."

John was eleven years old when he received the wedge of gold from his father, but, as he said to his mother, it seemed to him a very little wedge to be so cautious about.

"That is because you do not yet realize its full value," said his mother. "The longer you keep it the more you will prize it. You must never part with it, anyhow, and it may be the means of saving your life sometime."

When John was fifteen years old he had to go to work, to strike out for himself, and he came to Fall River, in Massachusetts, with his clothes tied up in a good strong bundle, and his wedge of gold in his pocket. He went to work in a cotton factory, where he learned to make cotton cloth. He was a stranger, and he didn't hav great pay for his labor at first, but he made a rule to save a part of his earnings every month. He soon became acquainted with some boys who worked in the same mill, and the homesickness that had possessed him as he trudged to and from his work the first week began to wear off.

"Come, go to the circus with us, won't ye?" asked Patsy Murphy, as he and four more boys were going home from work, overtaking John Oliver. "It's a big show—is Barnum's—elephants, camels, monkeys, cockatoos, and everything!—almost every kind of bird and beast you can name and mention."

John had never been to a circus in all his life, having lived in a part of the country that was not visited by traveling showmen.

"How much do you hav to pay to go in?" he inquired.

"Fifty cents, and half-price for children; but of course we fellows pay the regular fare, you know."

John thought a moment, and concluded he could afford it, and said he would be on hand to go with the the boys to see the show.

"Oh, it's just gay, I tell you, boys; and your eyes will stick right out like big white onions, or Muscovy ducks' eggs, when you see the tigers and the elephants and the giraffes! They're funny fellows, giraffes are."

"And the lions, Patsy! You forget them," said Timothy Winkle. "Did you ever see any lions, John, eh?"

"No," answered John, "no live ones."

"We'll show him the lions, won't we, Tom?"

"Yaw," replied that individual.

At the appointed time the boys started together for the circus. They were in high glee, and when the band began to play they were so excited that they could scarcely contain themselvs. They looked at all the animals, and fed the elephants and monkeys with peanuts and cookies, saw the big giant and the little dwarf, the living skeleton, the electric lady, the tattooed lady, the Circassian beauty, and all the other curiosities, after which they went into the other tent, and took a seat to witness the ring performances. As the riders came in, seated on their elegant horses, dressed in velvet and glistening with spangles, and rode so easily and gracefully, keeping perfect time to the music, Timothy Winkle said to John, in a hoarse whisper,

"Wudden't ye like to be a circus man, eh?"

John did not reply, he was so taken up with the brilliant pageant.

"Hold your tongue," said Patsy, "an' don't be bothering the boy. Whist! there comes the clown."

To John it was like fairy stories, and when he saw "Mademoiselle Celeste" riding round and round the ring, and no saddle on the horse, and then jump through six hoops and land on the horse's back every time, he looked puzzled.

"Do you suppose it's a woman?" he asked.

"Course," said Dick Riley. "What a greeny you are, anyway! Where d'ye come from?"

"I came from Berkeley," he said, innocently.

"Oh, let him alone," said Patsy; "pay attention to the show. Just look at that for a summerset. Heigho! there goes the clown. He s the best one among 'em, I'll bet yer."

It was late when the circus was over, and the men began taking down the tent before the people were half out. John thought he had seen enough to last him a lifetime. His companions were almost uproarious in their praise of the performance. On their way home they had to past several drinking saloons, and when opposit one that was well lighted John inquired what kind of a store it was, for, although the outer door was open, there was a black screen before it. "I guess they are having a party in back there, aren't they?' he asked. "I hear music."

"They are having a party—yes!" said Timothy, winking to Patsy. "Let us take John in and show him the lions."

"Lions? Hav they lions in there?" exclaimed John, in amazement.

"Yes, lots of 'em! Come on. Let's go in," and John followed his companions. He saw what it was the moment he passed beyond the black screen, and turned to go out, but the boys would not hear of it. "Oh, hav some beer! hav some beer!" they all cried, and in another moment every boy had a glass of foaming, sparkling beer in his hand. "You can't see a lion till you drink," laughed Timothy. "Go ahead! Here's your good health, boy."

John thought he would not be odd, and was just going to follow the example of the others, when all at once he remembered his wedge of gold, and he felt a sudden chill at his heart, his face turned pale as death, and the glass of beer dropped on the floor, the glass shattered in a hundred fragments.

"O you fool!" said Timothy.

"Chicken!" exclaimed Dick Riley.

"Dough-head!" sneered Tom.

"What did ye do that for?" said Patsy.

"He wants to hav a fight!" declared Timothy. "I'll make yer nose bleed for ye," and he ran up to John with his fist doubled up.

"I don't want to fight," said John, "and I won't fight; I'm going home," and off he started amid sneers and jeers, amid many jokes and much laughter.

The cold sweat stood on his brow as he reached the boarding-place he called home, and crept up to his bed.

"Ah," thought he, "they might hav made me drunk and got my wedge of gold from me, and then I should hav been ruined forever."

When John was nineteen he was invited to go to a clambake on the banks of the Kickamint river. There were seven young men in the party, the day was fine, the sail delightful, and the bake all that could be desired. After the feast was over, one young man said, "Trot out the little black bear, Sam!"

John looked surprised, but said nothing, and waited to see the bear. It came out in the shape of a black bottle, and, one by one, six young men drank of its contents, and when it was passed to the seventh, which was John, he said firmly, "No, not any for me, if you please."

"O sho! What's the matter with you? Can't you be sociable on an occasion like this?"

"I dare not be sociable, as you call it, in that way," and John spoke up very bravely.

"Signed the pledge?"

"No."

"What's the matter, then? Here, drown your prejudices, and forget your squeamishness in this," and a cup of brandy was pressed to his lips. "Don't be an idiot, John."

"I hope not," he said, "but I can't touch that," and John pushed away the cup, thinking all the time of his wedge of gold, and fearful lest he might lose it among those gay young men.

He endured their bantering in silence, but it was with alarm that he observed the condition of the six when they embarked for home. Hardly one was able to sit upright, and not one was in a condition to steer the boat except John. His clear, cool head brought the boat and its living, though sadly bewildered, human freight in safety to the land, and it was with a great sigh of relief John saw them safely on shore. He reflected that had he been in the condition of the others, and embarking so, they would undoubtedly hav swamped the boat, and all would hav been lost. Thus the remembrance of his wedge of gold saved not only his life, but the life of the six who were with him.

John is steadily rising in business, being no longer an operativ in the weave-shop, nor a spinner, but a superintendent of a cotton factory, with a comfortable salary. He is quiet, gentlemanly, kind, and obliging, honored and respected by all who know him.

The wedge of gold that his father gave him is still in his possession, and he means to carry it with him to his grave. Timothy Winkle, who remains still a spinner, and always will, probably, said the other day to John, "Mr. Oliver, is it true that you hav a wedge of solid gold?" Somehow it had leaked out that John had such a wedge.

"Yes, it is true," said John.

"Hav you any objection to letting me see it?"

"None in the least. Here it is," and John took an envelope from his pocketbook. See for yourself."

Timothy took a piece of paper from the envelope, and read: "Beware of intoxicating liquors. Never, upon any account, let a drop of anything intoxicating pass your lips as a beverage. Touch not, taste not, handle not the unclean thing. Remember."

"Is this the wedge of gold?" and Timothy looked surprised.

"It is."

"Well, if I had remembered and carried such a wedge of gold as that I might hav been in better circumstances than I am to-day," sighed Timothy.

"And so might many another," said John.

Our Puzzle Box.

ENIGMAS.

Here is our song or chorus,
Like soldiers in a line;
One thousand now before us,
Behind us "ninety-nine."

Now simply change the order,
An order of plants to find;
One thousand still in front of us,
One hundred and one behind.

Oh, why should we be troubled?
The "angels" all are gay;
Their "rejoicings" I hav doubled
For the two that "went astray."

Yet for the "ninety-nine,"
And the thousand that would stay,
A melody divine,
Must now forever play.
For the song at last is mine,
Humanity's the day,
And to do right is better quite,
Than to repent and pray.

CROSSWORD.

In money, not in sunny;
In ponder, not in wander;
In orange, not in porridge;
In grape, not in wait;
In flow, not in beau;
In look, not in foot;
In animal, not in camel;
In day, not in weigh;
In nice, not in wife.
My whole is the name of a race of people.

3.

AULD LANG SYNE PUZZLE.

I'll sing a song of "auld lang syne,"
Of the days that are no longer mine.
My youthful fire long since burnt low,
Even my mantle had to go.
And so I died of neglect and cold—
Perhaps of age, for I was old.
I felt it come like an ague fit,
And I grew too cold to even spit.
One vice I had, like human kind,
To smoke, I sometimes was inclined.
So while I lived some tears were shed,
And most were glad when I was dead.
Even my faithful dogs were sent Into perpetual banishment,
And my loved cranes, that were my pride,
Hav had no roost since the day I died.
A new friend came—he hid his flame,
But gained their favor, all the same.
They could not do too much for him,
And always kept his pipe in trim.
But they walled me up in my little room,
Which ever since has been my tomb,
With the gods and creeds of my early day,
For they, like me, hav passed away.
But I sometimes come as I do to-night,
As a memory bright, or a ghostly sprite.

Irwin, Iowa. J. K. P. BAKER.

NUMERICAL PUZZLE.

Mark off 25 squares thus:

Put a number in each small square, beginning with any number. Then take all the rest of the numbers in regular succession, not omitting a number, nor use the same number a second time, the numbers to be so selected and arranged that all the numbers in each vertical column when added will make the date of next year, 1885; all the numbers in each horizontal column when added will make 1885; all the numbers in each diagonal column when added will make 1885; the four corner numbers added to the central will make 1885.

CEDAR GROVE, N. Y., March 30, 1884.

RESPECTED MISS WIXON: I hav THE TRUTH SEEKER taken for me for three months. I like the Children's Corner very well. I will send the answer of two puzzles (and one to be printed) for March 29th. The crossword (No. 1) is Naples, and the enigma (No. 4) is Buffalo, I think. If you think the puzzle I send is fit to be printed, please do so. If it is not, all right. I am twelve years old.

Yours respectfully, HATTIE R. OTINGER.

CHICAGO, March 31, 1884.

MISS WIXON: My father takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and we all like to read it since the Children's Corner was put in. I like to work out all the puzzles.

I remain yours, A. E. WINEMAN.

Poetry.

Answer to a Mother's Prayer.

As the forces spent their motion,
As the planets onward rolled,
Came to deity a notion—
This, at least, hav I been told.

As the myriads of people,
Toiling on for that which seemed
Should be theirs without a struggle,
Life, which better had been dreamed,

Circled round by heaven's bright border,
High up on a mystic throne,
God, the father, gave this order.
In a gentle, loving tone,

"Let a child be born." And seeing
That the order was obeyed,
That a struggling little being
In his mother's arms was laid,

Blessed the mother and the infant
With the holy bond of love—
Sweet fruition! joy each instant!
Given by the God above.

And the mother pressed this dear one
To her throbbing, loving heart.
Dearer than her life this near one,
Of her being but a part.

Thankful for the gift God gave her,
For his mercy and his love
Prayed most humbly to her savior,
In the regions far above:

"Shield my child from all temptation,
From foul Folly's baleful wiles,
From all sin and degradation.
Let him bloom 'neath heaven's smiles.

"Teach him of thy love unbounded,
Teach him all thou'dst hav him know,
Giv him fairest faith well founded,
Guide him where thou'dst hav him go.

"Take my darling little treasure
To celestial joys, and then,
If in nether regions, pleasure
Will be mine, O God. Amen."

. . . . . .

From the lake that burneth ever,
Where the dark, damned devils dwell,
Where foul fumes ascend forever—
From a grim and horrid hell,

Came a wailing cry for mercy,
From a mother's only son,
Pleading for a drop of water,
For his crisped and parched tongue:

QUERY.

Did that mother's crown of glory
Rest above a smiling face?
Did she speak that sweetest story—
Story of God-given grace?

Obituary.

"Leaves hav their time to fall,
And flowers to wither at the north wind's breath,
And stars to set; but all—
Thou hast all seasons for thine own, O death!"

Died, Sunday evening, Feb. 24, 1884, at his late residence in Altona, Ill., after a protracted illness, greatly endeared to an affectionate family, and beloved by all who knew him, J. B. McCalmont, in his seventy-seventh year.

"Rest you, my friend; the endless sleep
Has closed your kindly eyes to-night;
Your form has vanished from my sight
Into the silence dark and deed.

"Rest you; no more shall ill befall,
Nor pain, nor anguish hard to bear,
Nor mortal grief, nor earthly care,
For death has overcome them all.

"Rest you; your heart was brusque but kind;
Of friends you were an honest one,
Nor trumpeted your kindness done;
To your good deeds the world was blind.

"Rest you in peace beneath the sod;
Your good intents, your actions fair,
Were sounded not in pompous prayer,
Nor heard of men, but known to God.

"Rest you; your failings were but few,
And ever leaned to honor's side,
Your virtues many—'twas your pride
To scorn the false, to love the true.

"Rest you; all soon with weary feet
I too shall follow in the way,
Beyond the twilight cold and gray;
When morning breaks, oh, may we meet.

"Rest you. Oh, hope forevermore,
Like starbeams, lights us on and on,
Beyond the night, into the dawn,
That breaks upon a brighter shore.

"Rest you; this life is but a dream,
But that beyond is real and sure,
Where gold is gold, where pearls are pure,
And friends forever what they seem."

Y. G.

Jason Kirk died at Cleveland, Ohio, March 21, 1884, aged forty-three years. He was a Freethinker in the broadest sense of the term; a subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER since its first issue in Paris, Illinois; an investigator of all live subjects, and an ardent supporter of truth wherever found. He died as he lived, and passed away with his lifetime crowned with honesty and good deeds. In September, 1875, he married Annie E. Edwards, a bright, intelligent woman, a mate to him in all that goes to make up a true, happy, and harmonious union. His wife survives him, and feels keenly the loss of a true and devoted husband. The funeral services were largely attended, Major Clemmer, of Salem, officiating. The Liberal choir sang some very beautiful and appropriate songs, after which the body was laid to rest in the cemetery at Alliance, Ohio.

"A good man to his rest has gone,
A husband true as polar star;
A husband whose affections won
The love of him that naught could mar.
Peace, sweetest peace, be to his soul,
And fragrant may his memory be;
He's fought the fight, and gained the goal
Of unalloyed eternity."

C. E. W.

With deep sorrow we chronicle the death, by consumption, of Levi J. Ball, one of our stanchest and most prominent Liberals, who passed from earth-life March 21st, aged fifty-seven years.

His funeral service was conducted by the J. H. Harter, of Auburn, N. Y. Brother Ball has been a life-long Liberal and truth seeker, and for years the president of our Liberal club at North Hannibal, N. Y., and during his sojourn with us, he won the esteem and affection of all who knew him; even his Christian acquaintances, whose isms and errors he so boldly and successfully fought, cannot say aught against him as a man, a neighbor, a devoted husband, and a kind and loving father. As he lived, so he died, calmly, peacefully, and with his mind unclouded by superstition, retaining his full mental faculties, and his life-long views of a mythical system of religion, and even detailing his wishes in regard to funeral arrangements, with a composedness far exceeding that of his listeners. Thus putting to silence any (would-be) Christian "I told you so." He has left the record of a death-bed scene which thousands of our Christian friends would do well to envy, and which our Christian ministers will probably not relate in their revival meetings. He has left a loving wife and a son and daughter to mourn their loss, who hav the sympathy of a host of friends. And though we submit to the inevitable, we feel the keen pang of sorrow caused by the death of him we held so dear, and who will not soon pass from our memory. Brother Harter was the right man (for this occasion) to stand between the living and the dead; to administer consolation to the bereaved, and also to meet our Christian friends with the bonds of a common brotherhood.

D. M. BENNETT'S LAST WORK.

A TRUTH SEEKER

Around the World.

FOUR LARGE VOLUMES.

With a steel plate engraving of the author in Vol. I. and each volume illustrated with forty-seven cuts.

BY D. M. BENNETT,

Late editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, author of "A Truth Seeker in Europe," "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," "Champions of the Church," etc., etc.

Handsomely bound in red cloth, $6.50; in leather, red edges, $9.50; in morocco, gilt edges, $10.50.

Readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER know the circumstances under which this work was written. The last words penned by the great author were for the fourth volume which was nearly completed at his death, and which will now contain an account of his world-lamented death and burial. Mr. Bennett was a very patient and faithful chronicler of the habits and customs of the different peoples of the many places he visited. The every-day life of all nations is laid before the reader by one who has visited them and beheld them with his own eyes. Particular attention is paid to the progress of Freethought in the various countries he visited, and the morality of so-called pagan nations is contrasted with the morality of Christian countries, much to the detriment of the latter The work is a

Freethinker's History of the World.

This work and "A TRUTH SEEKER IN EUROPE" should be in every Liberal's library Besides its intrinsic worth it is a memento of one of the greatest Freethinkers the world has known—of one who ranks with Voltaire and Paine in the force and clearness of his writings.

DEITY ANALYZED AND THE DEVIL'S DEFENSE

By Col. John R. Kelso, A.M.

Not since Hudibras has there been such damaging blows given to these old myths and fables. Remarkable Cure of Paralysis in One Week.

CINCINNATI, Dec. 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: As I feel greatly indebted to you for the benefit I hav received from your treatment, and the use of your Magnetic appliances, I can say without hesitation to those afflicted as I hav been that the effect was simply marvelous. Two weeks ago I was stricken with paralysis in my right arm and could not use it at all, but after wearing a suit of your MAGNETIC CLOTHING for one week, can use it quite as well as ever. I hav also been troubled with Dyspepsia and Kidney Complaint for a number of years, from which I hav suffered intensely, and, although doctoring all the time, never found but temporary relief. Since putting on your appliances I hav experienced great benefit, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav in the past two weeks, will soon be well. I would, therefore, recommend to those suffering as I hav your Magnetic appliances as the only means of effecting a sure cure. Yours respectfully,

WM. H. CLEMMER,
No. 80 Eastern avenue.

Remember that the same appliances which will effect a cure in a case of Paralysis will at the same time eradicate CATARRH or DYSPEPSIA in the same patient. We do not, like the Old School Physician, change medicins every day until, after dosing the patient almost to death, he may possibly strike something (if he is very skilful) that brings relief for the time being.

Neuralgia of the Heart of Six Years Standing Cured in Three Weeks.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., Dec. 11, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: After wearing one of your MAGNETIC VESTS for about three weeks, I was entirely cured of Neuralgia of the Heart and Side, which had been a source of misery to me for the last six years. I had tried numerous remedies before without benefit, but as soon as I put on the MAGNETIC VEST I got relief instantly. With unbounded gratitude, I remain

Yours respectfully,

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been under drug treatment for eight years with nervous prostration and female weakness:

OSBORN, O., Dec. 15, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY: Your letter just received; also the Clothing on Tuesday last. Fitted perfectly. FELT BETTER FROM THE FIRST HOUR I HAD THEM ON. Am not joking, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav since Tuesday, will soon be well. Will report again soon. Respectfully yours, E. J. K.

This lady reports herself entirely cured in less than six weeks after putting on the garments, and, although in bed, unable to get out, when applied, she nevertheless was able to ride twenty miles in two days after the application. The lady's name can be had upon application at this office, by anyone desiring to communicate with her.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been suffering for two years with an Ovarian Tumor, and who had been told that nothing but the knife would save her life, and the chances were as 9 to 1 against recovery. In four months' time she is perfectly well, and has not taken a dose of medicin since putting on the appliances. Consult us when your physician tells you he can do nothinog for you; it will pay you.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., November 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY, Dear Sir: About two years ago my health began to fail me; I became nervous, lost all desire for food, and, in fact, began to fail rapidly, so that I became alarmed and consulted several physicians of St. Louis, at which place I was then stopping, all of whom declared that I had an Ovarian Tumor, and that the only thing that would save my life would be the knife. About six months ago I grew rapidly worse, and had about made up my mind to take the only course that seemed left to me, and submit to an operation, when my attention was called to the Eureka Magnetic Appliances. As a drowning man will catch at a straw, so did I catch at this faint hope of a cure. Four months ago I purchased a suit of your appliances. From the very first I felt invigorated, the tumor, which had extended entirely across my abdomen, began to decrease, my pains became less from day to day, until now I am as well as I ever was in my life. Since putting on the appliances I hav not taken a single dose of medicin. My bowels, which before were constipated, are now regular. I would therefore cheerfully recommend them to anyone suffering as I hav, believing that they will do all and more than you claim for them. I remain,

Gratefully yours, MRS. MARY J. STEWART.

Remember that these appliances are not worn next the skin, but over the under-garment, and, unlike all other appliances in the market, they impart no shocks and leaves no sores.

Children's garments upon application.

Any of the above garments sent to any address upon receipt of price, and we will return the money if they are not as represented in every respect. If you are uncertain as to what would best suit your case send us word stating symptoms, and we will advise you what would be best suited to treat you. While our appliances are offered at less than one-third of what others are selling worthless appliances for, yet we will guarantee that the magnetic quality is a hundred fold superior to any other appliance ever offered the public, and will outlast the garments themselves. Every magnet is put through a particular process, and hav raised five times their own weight six months after being magnetized, while not a single appliance in the market will attract the smallest particle of iron, the majority of such worthless appliances having so-called magnets made of material no better than hoop-iron, and not capable of retaining magnetism for a moment. All of our garments are made from the very best material for the purpose, and will outlast any and all other garments now before the public. Every magnet is arranged in the garments upon scientific principles, and not haphazard as in all the others. We offer you therefore

The Only Scientific Magnetic Appliance Ever Constructed.

And challenge comparison with any of the so-called magnetic garments now offered under that head. At the same time the application of labor-saving machinery in our manufacture enables us to offer them about

ONE-THIRD THE PRICE HERETOFORE CHARGED,

So that we can say with truth, None are so poor that they cannot procure them, being but a trifle higher than ordinary clothing.

Remember that we are offering you the cheapest and best magnetic appliances in the market, and if upon receiving the garments they do not meet your expectation, return them at our expense and we will refund your money.

Ladies' Abdominal Jackets and Gentlemen's Vests are made to order, and a fit guaranteed.

The oldest reform journal in United States, is published every Wednesday at the Paine Memorial Building, Boston, Mass.

By JOSIAH P. MENDUM.

Edited by HORACE SEAVER.

PRICE, $3.00 per annum; single copies seven cents. Specimen copies sent on receipt of a two-cent stamp to pay postage

The Investigator is devoted to the Liberal cause in religion; or in other words, to universal mental liberty. Independent in all its discussions, discarding superstitious theories of what never can be known, it devotes its columns to things of this world alone, and leaves the next, if there be one, to those who hav entered its unknown shores. Believing that it is the duty of mortals to work for the interests of this world, it confines itself to the things of this life entirely. It has arrived at the age of fifty-one years, and asks for a support from those who are fond of sound reasoning, good reading, reliable news, anecdotes, science, art, and a useful family journal. Reader, please send your subscription for six months or one year, and if you are not satisfied with the way the Investigator is conducted we won't ask you to continue with us any longer 8m52

Gems of Thought.

IT does not follow, then, because we cannot believe that of which there is no evidence, that we are immoral. A credulous person may be very defectiv in morals, while an incredulous person may hav the best moral character. Morality is to be measured by actions, not by opinions.—D. M. Bennett.

THE primal duties shine aloft—like stars;
The charities that soothe, and heal, and bless,
Are scattered at the feet of man—like flowers.
The generous inclination, the just rule,
Kind wishes, and good actions and pure thoughts—
No mystery is here. —Wordsworth.

LOVE AND LIFE.

They stood alone in the light of the west,
He said that he loved her well,
He loved her well, but she loved the best;
There were none but the birds to tell.
The bluebells laid their heads to rest,
The birds flew over the wave;
And the heart of the woman who loved the best
Lay still in her silent grave.
For the love of the man who loved her well,
Lived but the life of a fair bluebell.

EVERYBODY knows the story of early astronomy and the school divines. Come down a little later. Archbishop Usher, a very learned Protestant prelate, tells us that the world was created on Sunday, the 23 I of October, 4,004 years B C. Deluge, Dec. 7, 2,348 B.C. Yes, and the earth stands on an elephant, and the elephant on a tortoise. One statement is as near the truth as the other.—O. W. Holmes.

HE must be a thorough fool who can learn nothing from his own folly.—Guesses at Truth.

WHAT is "the fact of revelation?" Probably to no two persons is it the same thing. The God "revealed" to Calvin and Jonathan Edwards, as predooming the great majority of the human offspring "to most grievous torments in soul and body, without intermission, in hell-fire forever," is surely a different being from the God revealed to Fenelon and Channing, as "not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance," and as only waiting to be sincerely sought to be found as the all-forgiving father.—W. B. Carpenter.

THE question is not whether a doctrin is beautiful, but whether it is true. When we want to go to a place we don't ask whether the road leads through a pretty country but whether it is the right road, the road pointed out by authority, the turnpike-road.—Guesses at Truth.

WHEN Bishop Berkeley said there was no matter,
And proved it, 'twas not matter that he said.
—Byron.

PATIENT study and perfect impartiality must precede rational conviction whether ending in faith or in doubt. Need it be asked how many are capable of such an examination?—Sharpe's Letters and Essays.

WE figure society as a machine, and that mind is opposed to mind as body is to body; whereby two, or at most ten, little minds must be stronger than one great mind. Notable absurdity! For the plain truth—very plain, we think—is that minds are opposed to minds in quite a different way, and one man that has a higher wisdom, a hitherto unknown spiritual truth in him, is stronger, not than ten men that hav it not, or than ten thousand, but than all men that hav it not; and stands among them with a quite ethereal, angelic power, as with a sword out of heaven's own armory, sky-tempered, which no buckler and no tower of brass will finally withstand. —Carlyle.

MEN hav no right to complain of evils which they themselvs are competent to remedy by mere common sense, joined to common humanity.—Coleridge.

HEREDITARY bondsmen! know you not,
Who would be free, themselvs must strike the blow?
—Byron.

IT is an old proverb, used by Chaucer, and quoted by Elizabeth, that "the greatest clerks are not the wisest men," and it is as true as if the poet had not rhymed, or the queen not reasoned on it.—Scott.

A MAN'S earnest and sincere belief is that which he must deal with as truth, and he has more chance of exchanging it for truth if he does so. He is bound —within reasonable limits—to make his protest against whatever he feels to be important error, and if he sees large buildings given up to the propagation of a mischievous mistake, men educated and paid to teach it, the state sanctioning an institution which has this sole aim with its partnership, the poor giving up a large part of their scanty time and energy to the study of it—shall he not do all in his power to destroy it? Ought he not to watch for every opportunity to attack this belief in every human soul, and most especially in those who spend their lives in propagating it?—London Spectator.

WE must remember that religious freedom was not dreamed of in the Jewish state any more than it subsequently was in the states of the church, for instance, as long as the chief priest of Rome had temporal jurisdiction. Indeed, before the French Revolution [Who hath ears to hear, let him hear!] there was hardly such a thing as religious freedom anywhere—and for how short a time hav Spain, Italy, and Scandinavia known it!—The Bible for Learners.

HEARD ye o' the tree o' France,
I watna what's the name o't;
Around it a' the patriots dance—
Well Europe kens the fame o't.
It stands where ance the Bastile stood,
A prison built by kings, man,
When superstition's hellish brood
Kept France in leading strings, man.
—Burns.

CHARLES JAMES FOX used to say that there was only one thing better than lying on the grass with a book, and that was lying on the grass without a book.—London Society.

THE progress of knowledge is slow. Like the sun, we cannot see it moving; but after a while we perceive that it has moved, nay, that it has moved onward.—Guesses at Truth.

PROSPECTUS OF

The Truth Seeker

FOUNDED BY D. M. BENNETT.

THE LEADING FREETHOUGHT JOURNAL OF THE WORLD.

LARGEST, CHEAPEST, BEST.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY, AT $3.00 PER YEAR; $1.50 FOR SIX MONTHS.

SAMPLE COPIES FREE.

33 CLINTON PLACE, NEW YORK CITY.

Among the reforms THE TRUTH SEEKER aims to effect are:

Total separation of church and state, including the equitable taxation of church property; secularization of the public schools, abolition of Sunday laws, abolition of chaplaincies, prohibition of public appropriations for religious purposes, and all other measures necessary to the same general end.

Its sixteen large pages are filled every week with scientific, philosophic, and Freethought articles and communications by the ablest Freethinkers in the country. It gives all the Liberal news, and keeps its readers posted on current secular and theological events. It is the armory from which hundreds draw their weapons in contests with priesthood. All the Liberal papers are good, but THE TRUTH SEEKER is

THE BEST AND LARGEST.

It is conducted in a broad and truly liberal spirit, and gives everyone a hearing upon all subjects pertaining to the welfare of the human race.

OPINIONS REGARDING IT.

A paper like THE TRUTH SEEKER is something more and better than an advocate of truth. Through it its subscribers touch elbows with each other. Each reader knows that he is one of a goodly company who find comfort and inspiration in its pages. If they should meet each other they would feel like brothers and sisters. They hav lived under one intellectual roof, felt the glow of the same fireside, and broken together the bread of life. Such a paper is to thousands a substitute for the church.—GEORGE CHAINEY, in This World.

THE TRUTH SEEKER, founded by D. M. Bennett, is to-day perhaps the strongest foe with which superstition has to contend, and a long future of great usefulness is, we trust and believe, before it.—Winted, Conn., Press.

There ought to be five hundred subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER in this county, just to rebuke the infamous church bigots who are using force and fraud to suppress Liberalism.—Worthington, Minn., Advance.

This sterling and widely-circulated Freethought journal has won its way deep into the hearts of its readers. THE TRUTH SEEKER is a great paper, and deserves the most generous support of the Liberal public. The recent numbers received are splendid in every respect.—San Francisco Universe.

THE TRUTH SEEKER has gathered its resources, and will be a stronger, better, and brighter paper than ever.—Liberal League Man.

THE TRUTH SEEKER has become a necessity to the Liberal cause.—Kansas Blade.

Odds and Ends.

THE story came from the West that at an evening dance recently a mob forced its way into the building, and hung up the fiddler and the beau.

BRAKEMAN (rapidly)—Next stop Broad street passengers will please remain seated until train comes to a full stop at the station!" Suddenly awakened deacon (fervently)—"A-m-e-n."

"No one dying," says a Baltimore clergyman, "sends for a dancing-master to comfort him." Certainly not. And no one giving a party sends for a Baltimore clergyman to lead the german.

THE sheriff of Walla Walla, W. T., recently received two letters at the same time inquiring for two long lost brothers. One of the lost brothers had been hanged a week before for the murder of the other lost brother.

"ARE you having much practice now?" asked an old judge of a young lawyer. "Yes, sir, a great deal, thank you." "Ah, I'm glad to hear it. In what line is your practice particularly?" "Well, sir, particularly in economy."

ANOTHER coroner's verdict. It was rendered at Pekin, Ill., on the body of a man found in the river, and declared "that the late deceased had come to his death by a blow on the head inflicted either before or after he was drowned."

"HELLO!" said the policeman, "what are you sitting out here in the cold for? Why don't you go in the house; hav you lost the key?" "No," responded the disconsolate citizen, "I—hic—havn't lost ther key; I've—hic—lost ther key-hole."

THE late Rev. Dr. Raphall was fond of a witty retort. Once a gentile physician attended the funeral of an Israelite. "I don't like a Jewish funeral," said he, afterward, to Dr. Raphall. "There is no long oration, and everything is too quiet. I prefer a Christian funeral." "So do I," replied Dr. Raphall. "I prefer a hundred Christian funerals to one Jewish."

A COLORED man with his right foot bound up with numerous rags and cloths yesterday entered a grocery on Woodward avenue and asked for a cash contribution of twenty-five cents toward the erection of a new colored people's church edifice. "Where is it to be located?" asked the grocer. "Wall, that hasn't been dun decided on yet." "What is it to cost?" "Hain' figgered on dat, sah." "Who is the pastor?" "Dun forget, but I reckon we kin find one." "Who is the head-man in the enterprise?" "De head man? Wall, I'ze bout de head man, I reckon." "I am not satisfied with your explanations," said the grocer. "How can I be certain that you won't appropriate the money to your own purposes?" "Am dat what bodders you?" "I confess it is." "Well, sah, we kin git ober dat purty easy. Instead of making a cash contribution, just weigh me out two pounds of crackers wid instrukshuns to turn 'em ober to de buildin' committee. I'ze chairman ob dat committee if I ain't nobody else."

THE OLD CONFEDEDATE STORY.

We had all grown weary listening
To the stories of war and death,
When the old Confederate rested
A moment to catch his breath.
And one disgusted listener,
In rather sarcastic tone,
Said, "Now, see here, old soldier,
As we're all of us here alone,
Come, tell us, about how many
Of the Yanks did you ever kill?"
The old Confederate answered,
"It's a ticklish question. Still,
I don't mind tellin' it private
An' in confidence jest to you;
I've been fig'rin' 'em up here lately,
An', in fact, I've just got through.
It's a strange coincidence, very,
'Bout the strangest I ever see!
For I killed jest as many of the yuns,
As the yuns killed of me!"

"HOW TO MAKE HOME HAPPY."—He was a book agent. He rang a door-bell, and a woman who was sweeping opened the door so suddenly that he fell off the step and nearly lost his best equilibrium. But he was a book agent, and he recovered his momentum, and said fluently: "I am agent for the most celebrated book ever offered to the public since 'Uncle Tom's Cabin' was written, and filled with useful hints of things that cannot be found outside the covers of any other book, and with recipes for cooking and family prayers, and how to keep moths out of furs, and some fine poems by well-known and popular writers, and you can giv me your order to-day, and needn't pay for it till next June, or on the installment plan, which is cheaper than going without, and the name of it is, 'Three Million Hints, or Inquire Within How to Make Home Happy.'" "Oh, yes," said the woman sweetly. "How to make home happy. I hav one already," and she looked at the broom in her hand with dreamy eyes. He fell off the door-step again, and this time he didn't recover till there was a block between them.

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Entered at the Post-Office at New York, N. Y., as Second-class Matter.

Vol. 11. No. 16. | PUBLISHED WEEKLY. | New York, Saturday, April 19, 1884. | 33 CLINTON PLACE. | $3.00 per year.

Notes and Clippings.

"They seem to forget," said the deacon, regarding the collection's slim returns, "when they experience religion, that it must be paid for, just like any other experience."

The New Orleans Picayune says: "The Israelites were originally to the manna born." The Burlington Hawkeye corrects this by saying: "We always thought the manna was originally borne to the Israelites."

Barnes, the mountain evangelist, claims to hav converted thirty-four thousand souls. If this is true, he is entitled to a golden harp when he dies, and that ought to satisfy him. He should retire from the field now, and giv some one else a chance, but he keeps right on. Some men are not contented with the prospect of heaven; they want the earth.

At Page, Texas, they hav a peculiar way of settling religious arguments. Recently two men, Mr. Burkhardt and Mr. Bale, were arguing the proper mode of baptism, and Mr. Burkhardt thinking that his theory was the best, tried to impress it upon Mr. Bale's mind by striking him on the head with a spade. It is said that he so far succeeded in his purpose that the argument stopped right there, and will probably never again be renewed.

The Rev. John Jasper was requested by a large number of leading white people, including many Northerners, to deliver his sermon, "De Sun Do Move," one night last week. Some three hundred whites were present. Before commencing Mr. Jasper told the deacons to close the doors. This being done, he said that a note for $100 was due by the church the day following, and unless the amount was contributed no sermon would be delivered. The deacons went around with the hat and the $100 was collected. Mr. Jasper then proceeded with his solar theology.

A Massachusetts clergyman declares that "Paradise is situated at the North Pole." It is evident that that clergyman longs for a land of pure delight, where the atmosphere is not inclined to be sultry. It is not stated what the trouble in his church is about, so it would be unfair to guess his reason for locating that future country in a land where skates and ulsters would be more in keeping with the surroundings than harps and song books. The North Pole, however, is a good place to locate Paradise, as it will afford a good excuse, suggests Peck's Sun, for those who fail to get there.

The following law and law case are taken from the records of the New Haven colony in 1669. The statute says: "Whosoever shall inveigle or draw the affections of any maide or maide servant, either to himself or others, without first gaining the consent of her parents, shall pay to the plantation for the first offence forty shillings; for the second, four pounds; for the third he shall be imprisoned or corporeously punished." Under this law, at a court held in May, 1669, Jacobeth Murtine and Sarah Tuttle were prosecuted "for setting down on a chestle together, his arms around her waiste, and her arme upon his shoulder or about his neck, and continuing in that sinful posture about half an hour, in which time he kyssed her and she kyssed him, or they kyssed one another, as ye witnesses testified."

Several years ago a Brooklyn florist named Fitzsimmons gave $2,000 to Father Philip Kenny, then secretary to Father McGuire, pastor of St. Paul's Roman Catholic church, in Court street. Father Kenny was to use the money for the purpose of bringing Fitzsimmons's daughter out from Ireland and educating her in a convent. The agreement was not carried out, and when the florist applied for the return of his money the priest denied having received it. Fitzsimmons then sued Father Kenny and recovered a judgment for the full amount. Judgment was issued and returned unsatisfied, the defendant having transferred his property to his mother for a nominal consideration some time before. Fitzsimmons then began a new suit to set aside the deed of transfer on the ground that it was made to avoid a judgment. The case was tried at Special Term of the Brooklyn city court, and last week Judge Reynolds gave judgment for Fitzsimmons, and granted the plaintiff $50 extra allowance.

The Philadelphia Medical Society, the largest county association of physicians in the United States, has refused, by a vote of nearly two to one, to admit females as practitioners. One year ago the constitution of the society was amended to make female graduates of reputable colleges eligible as members. Several candidates of the gentler sex were speedily proposed, and were blackballed. The experiment was tried again and again, with the same result, until it became unmistakable that some members had determined to blackball women to the end of time. A general meeting was then called, and a house-to-house canvass was made to defeat the resolutions. The result was a surprise to the fairer-minded members of the society. The vote stood seventy-nine to forty-eight.

The following presents a thought as to the power of a preacher over his congregation which, perhaps, has not before been pressed upon the attention of many. It is from George Eliot's Essays: "The platform orator is subject to the criticism of hisses and groans. Counsel for the plaintiff expects the retort of counsel for the defendant. The honorable gentleman on one side of the House is liable to hav his facts and figures shown up by his honorable friend on the opposit side. Even the scientific or literary lecturer, if he is dull or incompetent, may see the best part of his audience slip quietly out one by one. But the preacher is completely master of the situation; no one may hiss, no one may depart. Like the writer of imaginary conversations, he may put what imbecilities he pleases into the mouths of his antagonists, and swell with triumph when he has refuted them. He may riot in gratuitous assertions, confident that no man will contradict him; he may exercise perfect free will in logic and invent illustrativ experience; he may giv an Evangelical edition of history with the inconvenient facts omitted; all this he may do with impunity, certain that those of his hearers who are not sympathizing are not listening. For the press has no band of critics who go the round of the churches and chapels, and are on the watch for a slip or defect in the preacher to make a 'feature' in their article; the clergy are, practically, the most irresponsible of all talkers."

The closing of the Methodist Episcopal church in Coxsackie, N. Y., has led to the publicity of a scandal concerning the Rev. Henderson Davis, its pastor, and the wife of Benjamin Williams, one of the church wardens. "I hav a letter in my pocket that proves Davis to be a scoundrel in sheep's clothing," said Mr. Williams, and he produced an epistle addressed to his wife in the words, "Dearest Emma." The letter said: "But my tongue is too short, and language too limited to express my love. They may hunt us, and tease us, yet our love shall remain the same. Keep yourself from him as much as you possibly can. . . I hope he will go fishing this spring. How nice that will be; but I am afraid he will not go; ha! ha! ha! What does he say about it? Good-bye, darling. Yours truly, Henry." Mr. Williams said as his wife is illiterate she gave the letter to him to read to her. He took the letter to Mr. Davis, and that gentleman snatched it, and attempted to throw it in the stove. Mr. Williams knocked him down and kicked him. The minister became unconscious, during which time Williams recovered the letter and obtained an ax, with which he chased the preacher, when he had recovered his senses, down the street. "I would hav chopped him to piecss," said Williams, "but I accidently stumbled, and this saved me from committing a murder." Mr. Davis admits writing the letter, but says it was a fit communication to pass between brother and sister. He was a widower, and came from Elmira.

In favor of opening national institutions on Sunday, the earl of Dunraven, in the Nineteenth Century, says: "I presume most men are agreed that appreciation of beauty, acquaintance with art in the widest sense, artistic feeling, knowledge of literature, and interest in scientific subjects, are beneficial to a people. Sabbatarians hav objected that art sometimes has a demoralizing tendency. That may be true under certain circumstances to a very slight extent, but the same may be said of literature; yet no sane person would suggest that children ought not to be taught to read because immoral subjects are treated of in some books. Art can exercise a bad influence on the characters of those only who are unacquainted with art. The danger lies in ignorance. A true perception of art cannot fail to exercise a civilizing and harmonizing influence upon the human mind. Moreover, it adds a great charm to existence. The surroundings among which multitudes of English men and women spend their days are depressing and unlovely in the extreme. Their perceptions are stunted from lack of sustenance, or poisoned by pernicious food. From birth to death their senses are outraged by unwholesome smells, evil sights, and discordant sounds. . . . Material comforts are not all-sufficing; the mental palate must be pleased, and wholesome food must be supplied to the mind as well as to the body. Large towns, mining and manufacturing industries, make the aspect of nature hideous. The rich workers can escape, for a time at any rate, and refresh themselvs among the fairest scenes the earth can show, but the poor workers cannot. The beautiful in nature is denied to them; it is necessarily unattainable; but beauty in art is attainable; it is denied them only by the folly and injustice of their fellowmen."

It would be cruel to laugh at the crocodile tears which were shed in the White House, a few days ago, by Arthur and Frelinghuysen, when they got the official announcement of the death of Her Majesty Queen Victoria's son, His Royal Highness Prince Leopold, who, according to all accounts, came to his end amid the drunken debaucheries of a gambling house. The "spree" which closed his royal highness's career was an all-night affair, as described in the London dispatch to the Sun. For some time, he "had been living as fast as he could," and on the night of his death, according to the Sun's dispatch, "drank pretty freely, stopped up all night, danced furiously, and so brought on the fatal fit." For some days previous he had lost heavily on gambling, and stories are told of his doings that ought to bring a blush even to the faces of the ghosts of George the Fourth and William the Fourth. When the news of the death of the royal prince was conveyed, without decoration, to the president through the secretary of state, both Arthur and Frelinghuysen immediately began to shed crocodile tears in public places. They cabled their crocodile tears over the loss of the prince to the British court; they communicated them to the British minister at Washington; they sent them out to the Associated Press; they were plunged in grief; the American people were plunged in crocodile grief; the government of the United States condoled in crocodile tears with all the other bereaved governments of the world. It was even a more harrowing spectacle than was offered by the London reporter, who described at length the crocodile tears of the flunkies and maid-servants of the household of his royal highness. Now, then, were the American people bemoaning, in lachrymose crocodileism, the loss of the English prince? Were we all, for the time being, poor crocodiles? Could even Arthur and Frelinghuysen carry their cant further? Almost at the very time this pampered prince fell in his vices, the gallant young American patriot who, two years ago, shattered the Andre monument was done to death by half-a-dozen police ruffians in Brooklyn, under circumstances that hav been already described here; but who, of all the toplofties in the land, had shed even a crocodile tear over the grave of poor George Hendrix?—John Swinton's Paper.

Charles Reade, the English novelist, died on the 11th inst.

Henry George has started on his return to New York from Europe.

Ten-dollar Confederate notes are in circulation in Montreal, Canada, and many merchants hav been victimized.

The pope is preparing a strong encyclical letter against the order of Freemasons and other secret societies.

Advices which are subject to contradiction report that Khartoum has surrendered to the False Prophet, and that Gen. Gordon is a prisoner.

In the Sharon divorce case in San Francisco, on the 10th, all persons admitted to the court-room, including the lawyers, were examined to see whether they carried dangerous weapons.

The man who was to hav personated Pontius Pilate in Salmi Morse's Passion Play, and with whom Morse broke his contract, has recovered over $1,400 damages from the co-partners of Morse.

Matsada Sorackichi, a famous Japanese wrestler, is giving crack American athletes a great deal of trouble, winning most of the contests which he has entered into. He weighs about 200 pounds.

La Monde, a clerical newspaper published in Paris, says that five French missionaries and thirty catechists hav been massacred at Thanhoa, a Tonquin town (in Anam) of some importance not far from the coast.

Keely, the motor man, promised to explain to the stockholders the operation of his engin at a meeting on the 10th. He afterward announced himself as not quite ready for the demonstration, and the meeting was postponed.

Col. Ingersoll will not be a delegate to the Republican convention this year. It is reported that he will spend the summer in New Mexico, where he has built him a house, and will take no part in the presidential campaign.

A woman came into Parson Newman's church on Madison avenue last Sunday, marched down the aisle toward the pastor, and screamed, "I hav a telegram from Christ direct to you." The woman was a religious lunatic. She was led out by a deacon.

The police of Jersey City arrested thirty-two boys last Sunday for desecrating the Sabbath by playing ball. The grand jury at Fort Wayne, Ind., was last week instructed to investigate Sunday base ball playing by the Fort Wayne Base Ball Club. They failed to return an indictment, and Sunday playing will be continued.

One of the most remarkable of late disclosures is the announcement of the "discovery of sundry musty rolls of parchment containing what is alleged to be the original manuscript of the Mosaic books of the Old Testament." The suicide of Shapira has proved an ineffectual warning, and the work of "discovery" goes bravely on.

A new eight-story apartment house in this city, completed two months ago at an expense of more than $200,000, and supposed to be fire-proof, caught fire last week and burnt like tinder. The house was full of people, and many narrow escapes were had. During the fire the place was looted either by the firemen or other persons, and many thousand dollars' worth of jewelry stolen.

The cause of temperance received a great impetus through the performance of Weston, the walker, who recently traveled five thousand miles on foot in one hundred days, without the aid of alcoholic stimulants. But for the sake of pulling down the argument which Weston so laboriously built up, a Mr. Spencer proposes to walk five thousand miles, and drink nothing but alcohol and alcoholic liquors. It is not desirable that Mr. Spencer should succeed.

The Coming Slavery.

BY HERBERT SPENCER.

From the Popular Science Monthly.

The kinship of pity to love is shown, among other ways, in this, that it idealizes its object. Sympathy with one in suffering suppresses, for the time being, remembrance of his transgressions. The feeling which vents itself in "poor fellow!" on seeing one in agony excludes the thought of "bad fellow" which might at another time arise. Naturally, then, if the wretched are unknown, or but vaguely known, all the demerits they may hav are ignored; and thus it happens that when, as just now, the miseries of the poor are depicted, they are thought of as the miseries of the deserving poor, instead of being thought of, as in large measure they should be, as the miseries of the undeserving poor. Those whose hardships are set forth in pamphlets and proclaimed in sermons and speeches which echo throughout society are assumed to be all worthy souls, grievously wronged, and none of them are thought of as bearing the penalties of their own misdeeds.

On hailing a cab in a London street it is surprising how generally the door is officiously opened by one who expects to get something for his trouble. The surprise lessens after counting the many loungers about tavern doors, or after observing the quickness with which a street performance or procession draws from neighboring slums and stable yards a group of idlers. Seeing how numerous they are in every small area, it becomes manifest that tens of thousands of such swarm through London. "They hav no work," you say. Say rather that they either refuse work or quickly turn themselvs out of it. They are simply good-for-nothings, who in one way or other liv on the good-for-somethings—vagrants and sots, criminals, and those on the way to crime, youths who are burdens on hard-worked parents, men who appropriate the wages of their wives, fellows who share the gains of prostitutes; and then, less visible and less numerous, there is a corresponding class of women.

Is it natural that happinnss should be the lot of such, or is it natural that they should bring unhappiness on themselvs and those connected with them? Is it not manifest that there must exist in our midst an immense amount of misery which is a normal result of misconduct and ought not to be dissociated from it? There is a notion, always more or less prevalent, and just now vociferously expressed, that all social suffering is removable, and that it is the duty of somebody or other to remove it. Both these beliefs are false. To separate pain from ill-doing is to fight against the constitution of things, and will be followed by far more pain. Saving men from the natural penalties of reckless living eventually necessitates the infliction of artificial penalties in solitary cells, on tread-wheels, and by the lash. I suppose a dictum on which the current creed and the creed of science are at one may be considered to hav as high an authority as can be found. Well, the command "if any would not work neither should he eat" is simply a Christian enunciation of that universal law of nature under which life has reached its present hight—the law that a creature not energetic enough to maintain itself must die; the sole difference being that the law which in the one case is to be artificially enforced is, in the other case, a natural necessity. And yet this particular tenet of their religion which science so manifestly justifies is the one which Christians seem least inclined to accept. The current assumption is that there should be no suffering, and that society is to blame for that which exists.

"But surely we are not without responsibilities, even when the suffering is that of the unworthy?"

If the meaning of the word "we" be so expanded as to include with ourselvs our ancestors, and especially our ancestral legislators, I agree. I admit that those who made, and modified, and administered the old poor-law were responsible for producing an appalling amount of demoralization, which it will take more than one generation to remove. I admit, too, the partial responsibility of recent and present lawmakers for regulations which hav brought into being a permanent body of tramps, who ramble from union to union; and also their responsibility for maintaining a constant supply of felons by sending back convicts into society under such conditions that they are almost compelled again to commit crimes. Moreover, I admit that the philanthropic are not without their share of responsibility; since, while anxiously aiding the offspring of the unworthy, they do nothing for the offspring of the worthy save burdening their parents by increased local rates. Nay, I even admit that these swarms of good-for-nothings, fostered and multiplied by public and private agencies, hav, by sundry mischievous meddlings, been made to suffer more than they would otherwise hav suffered. Are these the responsibilities meant? I suspect not.

. . . . . .

The blank form of a question daily asked is, "We hav already done this; why should we not do that?" And the regard for precedent suggested by it is ever pushing on regulativ legislation. Having had brought within their sphere of operation more and more numerous businesses, the acts restricting hours of employment and dictating the treatment of workers are now to be made applicable to shops. From inspecting lodging-houses to limit the numbers of occupants and enforce sanitary conditions we hav passed to inspecting all houses below a certain rent in which there are members of more than one family, and are now passing to a kindred inspection of all small houses. The buying and working of telegraphs is made a reason for urging that the state should buy and work the railways. Supplying children with food for their minds by public agency is being followed in some cases by supplying food for their bodies; and, after the practice has been made gradually more general, we may anticipate that the supply now proposed to be made gratis in the one case will eventually be proposed to be made gratis in the other, the argument that good bodies as well as good minds are needful to make good citizens being logically urged as a reason for the extension. And then, avowedly proceeding on the precedents furnished by the church, the school, and the reading-room, all publicly provided, it is contended that "pleasure, in the sense it is now generally admitted, needs legislating for and organizing at least as much as work."

Not precedent only prompts this spread, but also the necessity which arises for supplementing ineffectiv measures, and for dealing with the artificial evils continually caused. Failure does not destroy faith in the agencies employed, but merely suggests more stringent use of such agencies or wider ramifications of them. Laws to check intemperance, beginning in early times and coming down to our own times, when further restraints on the sale of intoxicating liquors occupy nights every session, not having done what was expected, there come demands for more thorough-going laws, locally preventing the sale altogether; and here, as in America, these will doubtless be followed by demands that prevention shall be made universal. All the many appliances for "stamping out" epidemic diseases not having succeeded in preventing outbreaks of small-pox, fevers, and the like, a further remedy is applied for in the shape of police power to search houses for diseased persons, and authority for medical officers to examin anyone they think fit, to see whether he or she is suffering from an infectious or contagious malady. Habits of improvidence having for generations been cultivated by the poor-law, and the improvident enabled to multiply, the evils produced by compulsory charity are now proposed to be met by compulsory insurance.

Every extension of the regulativ policy involves an addition to the regulativ agents—a further growth of officialism and an increasing power of the organization formed of officials. Take a pair of scales with many shot in the one and a few in the other. Lift shot after shot out of the loaded scale and put it into the unloaded scale. Presently you will produce a balance, and if you go on the position of the scales will be reversed. Suppose the beam to be unequally divided, and let the lightly loaded scale be at the end of a very long arm; then the transfer of each shot, producing a much greater effect, will far sooner bring about a change of position. I use the figure to illustrate what results from transferring one individual after another from the regulated mass of the community to the regulating structures. The transfer weakens the one and strengthens the other in a far greater degree than is implied by the relativ change of numbers. A comparativly small body of officials, coherent, having common interests, and acting under central authority, has an immense advantage over an incoherent public which has no settled policy, and can be brought to act unitedly only under strong provocation. Hence an organization of officials, once passing a certain stage of growth, becomes less and less resistible, as we see in the bureaucracies of the continent.

Not only does the power of resistance of the regulated part decrease in a geometrical ratio as the regulating part increases, but the private interests of many in the regulated part itself make the change of ratio still more rapid. In every circle conversations show that now, when the passing of competitiv examinations renders them eligible for the public service, youths are being educated in such ways that they may pass them and get employment under government. One consequence is that men who might otherwise reprobate some further growth of officialism are led to look on it with tolerance, if not favorably, as offering possible careers for those dependent on them and those related to them. Anyone who remembers the numbers of upper-class and middle-class families anxious to place their children will see that no small encouragement to the spread of legislativ control is now coming from those who, but for the personal interests thus arising, would be hostil to it.

. . . . . .

The diffusion of education has worked, and will work still more, in the same direction. "We must educate our masters," is the well-known saying of a Liberal who opposed the last extension of the franchise. Yes, if the education were worthy to be so called, and were relevant to the political enlightenment needed, much might be hoped from it. But knowing rules of syntax, being able to add up correctly, having geographical information, and a memory stocked with the dates of kings' accessions and generals' victories no more implies fitness to form political conclusions than acquirement of skill in drawing implies expertness in telegraphing, or than ability to play cricket implies proficiency on the violin. "Surely," rejoins some one, "facility in reading opens the wav to political knowledge." Doubtless; but will the way be followed? Table-talk proves that nine out of ten people read what amuses or interests them rather than what instructs them, and that the last thing they read is something which tells them disagreeable truths or dispels groundless hopes. That popular education results in an extensiv reading of publications which foster pleasant illusions, rather than of those which insist on hard realities, is beyond question. Says "A Mechanic," writing in the Pall Mall Gazette" of December 3, 1883:

"Improved education instils the desire for culture—culture instils the desire for many things as yet quite beyond workingmen's reach; . . . in the furious competition to which the present age is given up they are utterly impossible to the poorer classes; hence they are discontented with things as they are, and the more educated the more discontented. Hence, too. Mr. Ruskin and Mr. Morris are regarded as true prophets by many of us."

And that the connection of cause and effect here alleged is a real one we may see clearly enough in the present state of Germany.

Meanwhile there goes on out-of-doors an activ propaganda to which all these influences are ancillary. Communistic theories, partially indorsed by one act of Parliament after another, and tacitly if not avowedly favored by numerous public men seeking supporters, are being advocated more and more vociferously under one or other form by popular leaders, and urged on by organized societies. There is the movement for land nationalization which, aiming at a system of land tenure equitable in the abstract, is, as all the world knows, pressed by Mr. George and his friends with avowed disregard for the just claims of existing owners, and as the basis of a scheme going more than half-way to state communism. And then there is the thoroughgoing Democratic Federation of Mr. Hyndman and his adherents. We are told by them that "the handful of marauders who now hold possession [of the land] hav and can hav no right save brute force against the tens of millions whom they wrong." They exclaim against "the shareholders who hav been allowed to lay hands upon [!] our great railway communications." They condemn, "above all, the activ capitalist class, the loan-mongers, the farmers, the mine-exploiters, the contractors, the middlemen, the factory lords—these, the modern slave-drivers," who exact "more and yet more surplus value out of the wage-slaves whom they employ." And they think it "high time" that trade should be "removed from the control of individual greed and individual profit."

It remains to point out that the tendencies thus variously displayed are being strengthened by press advocacy daily more pronounced. Journalists, always chary of saying that which is distasteful to their readers, are some of them going with the stream and adding to its force. Legislativ meddlings which they would once hav condemned they now pass in silence, if they do not advocate them; and they speak of laissez faire as an exploded doctrin. "People are no longer frightened at the thought of Socialism," is the statement which meets us one day. On another day, a town which does not adopt the Free Libraries act is sneered at as being alarmed by a measure so moderately Communistic. And then, along with editorial assertions that this economic revolution is coming and must be accepted, there is prominence given to the contributions of its advocates. Meanwhile those who regard the recent course of legislation as disastrous, and see that its future course is likely to be still more disastrous, are being reduced to silence by the belief that it is useless to reason with people in a state of political intoxication.

See, then, the many concurrent causes which threaten continually to accelerate the transformation now going on. There is that spread of regulation caused by following precedents, which become the more authoritativ the further the policy is carried. There is that increasing need for administrativ compulsions and restraints which results from the unforeseen evils and shortcomings of preceding compulsions and restraints. Moreover, every additional state interference strengthens the tacit assumption that it is the duty of the state to deal with all evils and secure all benefits. Increasing power of a growing administrativ organization is accompanied by decreasing power of the rest of the society to resist its further growth and control. The multiplication of careers opened by a developing bureaucracy tempts members of the classes regulated by it to favor its extension, as adding to the chances of safe and respectable places for their relativs. The people at large, led to look on benefits received through public agencies as gratis benefits, hav their hopes continually excited by the prospects of more. A spreading education, furthering the diffusion of pleasing errors rather than of stern truths, renders such hopes both stronger and more general. Worse still, such hopes are ministered to by candidates for public choice to augment their chances of success; and leading statesmen, in pursuit of party ends, bid for popular favor by countenancing them. Getting repeated justifications from new laws harmonizing with their doctrins, political enthusiasts and unwise philanthropists push their agitations with growing confidence and success. Journalism, ever responsiv to popular opinion, daily strengthens it by giving it voice; while counter opinion, more and more discouraged, finds little utterance.

Thus influences of various kinds conspire to increase corporate action and decrease individual action. And the change is being on all sides aided by schemers, each of whom thinks only of his pet project, and not at all of the general reorganization which his, joined with others such, are working out. It is said that the French Revolution devoured its own children. Here an analagous catastrophe seems not unlikely. The numerous Socialistic changes made by act of Parliament, joined with the numerous others presently to be made, will by and by be all merged in state Socialism, swallowed in the vast wave which they hav little by little raised.

"But why is this change described as the coming slavery?" is a question which many will still ask. The reply is simple. All Socialism involves slavery.

What is essential to the idea of a slave? We primarily think of him as one who is owned by another. To be more than nominal, however, the ownership must be shown by control of the slave's actions—a control which is habitually for the benefit of the controler. That which fundamentally distinguishes the slave is that he labors under coercion to satisfy another's desires. The relation admits of sundry gradations. Remembering that originally the slave is a prisoner whose life is at the mercy of his captor, it suffices here to note that there is a harsh form of slavery in which, treated as an animal, he has to expend his entire effort for his owner's advantage. Under a system less harsh, though occupied chiefly in working for his owner, he is allowed a short time in which to work for himself, and some ground on which to grow extra food. A further amelioration givs him power to sell the produce of his plot and keep the proceeds. Then we come to the still more moderated form which commonly arises where, having been a free man working on his own land, conquest turns him into what we distinguish as a serf; and he has to giv to his owner each year a fixed amount of labor or produce, or both, retaining the rest himself. Finally, in some cases, as in Russia until recently, he is allowed to leave his owner's estate and work or trade for himself elsewhere, under the condition that he shall pay an annual sum. What is it which, in these cases, leads us to qualify our conception of the slavery as more or less severe? Evidently the greater or smaller extent to which effort is compulsorily expended for the benefit of another instead of for self-benefit. If all the slave's labor is for his owner the slavery is heavy, and if but little it is light. Take now a further step. Suppose an owner dies, and his estate with its slaves comes into the hands of trustees, or suppose the estate and everything on it to be bought by a company; is the condition of the slave any the better if the amount of his compulsory labor remains the same? Suppose that for a company we substitute the community; does it make any difference to the slave if the time he has to work for others is as great, and the time left for himself is as small, as before? The essential question is, How much is he compelled to labor for other benefit than his own, and how much can he labor for his own benefit? The degree of his slavery varies according to the ratio between that which he is forced to yield up and that which he is allowed to retain; and it matters not whether his master is a single person or a society. If, without option, he has to labor for the society, and receives from the general stock such portion as the society awards him, he becomes a slave to the society. Socialistic arrangements necessitate an enslavement of this kind; and toward such an enslavement many recent measures, and still more the measures advocated, are carrying us. Let us observe, first, their proximate effects, and then their ultimate effects.

The policy initiated by the Industrial Dwellings acts admits of development, and will develop. Where municipal bodies turn house-builders, they inevitably lower the values of houses otherwise built, and check the supply of more. Every dictation respecting modes of building and conveniences to be provided diminishes the builder's profit, and prompts him to use his capital where the profit is not thus diminished. So, too, the owner, already finding that small houses entail much labor and many losses—already subject to troubles of inspection and interference and to consequent costs, and having his property daily rendered a more undesirable investment—is prompted to sell; and, as buyers are for like reasons deterred, he has to sell at a loss. And now these still multiplying regulations, ending, it may be, as Lord Grey proposes, in one requiring the owner to maintain the salubrity of his houses by evicting dirty tenants, and thus adding to his other responsibilities that of inspector of nuisances, must further prompt sales and further deter purchasers—so necessitating greater depreciation. What must happen? The multiplication of houses, and especially small houses, being increasingly checked, there must come an increasing demand upon the local authority to make up for the deficient supply. More and more, the municipal or kindred body will hav to build houses, or to purchase houses rendered unsalable to private persons in the way shown; houses which, greatly depreciated in value as they must become, it will, in many cases, pay to buy rather than to build new ones. And then, when in towns this process has gone so far as to make the local authority the chief owner of houses, there will be a good precedent for publicly providing houses for the rural population, as proposed in the Radical program, and as urged by the Democratic Federation, which insists on "the compulsory construction of healthy artisans' and agricultural laborers' dwellings in proportion to the population." Manifestly, the tendency of that which has been done, is being done, and is presently to be done, is to approach the socialistic ideal in which the community is sole house proprietor.

Such, too, must be the effect of the daily growing policy on the tenure and utilization of the land. More numerous public benefits, to be achieved by more numerous public agencies, at the cost of augmented public burdens, must increasingly deduct from the returns on land; until, as the depreciation in value becomes greater and greater, the resistance to change of tenure becomes less and less. Already, as every one knows, there is in many places difficulty in obtaining tenants, even at greatly reduced rents; and land of inferior fertility in some cases lies idle, or when farmed by the owner is often farmed at a loss. Clearly the margin of profit on capital invested in land is not such that taxes, local and general, can be greatly raised to support extended public administrations, without an absorption of it which will prompt owners to sell, and make the best of what reduced price they can get by emigrating and buying land not subject to heavy burdens, as, indeed, some are now doing. This process, carried far, must hav the result of throwing inferior land out of cultivation; after which there will be raised more generally the demand made by Mr. Arch, who, addressing the Radical Association of Brighton lately, and contending that existing landlords do not make their land adequately productiv for the public benefit, said "he should like the present government to pass a Compulsory Cultivation bill;" an applauded proposal which he justified by instancing compulsory vaccination (thus illustrating the influence of precedent). And this demand will be pressed, not only by the need for making the land productiv, but also by the need for employing the rural population. After the government has extended the practice of hiring the unemployed to work on deserted lands, or lands acquired at nominal prices, there will be reached a stage whence there is but a small further step to that arrangement which, in the program of the Democratic Federation, is to follow nationalization of the land—the "organization of agricultural and industrial armies under state control on co-operativ principles."

If any one doubts that such a revolution may be so reached, facts may be cited to show its likelihood. In Gaul, during the decline of the Roman empire, "so numerous were the receivers in comparison with the payers, and so enormous the weight of taxation, that the laborer broke down, the plains became deserts, and woods grew where the plow had been." In like manner, when the French Revolution was approaching, the public burdens had become such that many farms remained uncultivated, and many were deserted; one quarter of the soil was absolutely lying waste; and in some provinces one-half was in heath.

Then again comes state ownership of railways. Already this exists to a large extent on the Continent. Already we hav had here a few years ago loud advocacy of it. And now the cry which was raised by sundry politicians and publicists is taken up afresh by the Democratic Federation, which proposes "state-appropriation of railways, with or without compensation." Evidently pressure from above joined by pressure from below is likely to effect this change, dictated by the policy everywhere spreading, and with it must come many attendant changes. For railway proprietors, at first owners and workers of railways only, hav been allowed to become masters of numerous businesses directly or indirectly connected with railways, and these will hav to be purchased by government when the railways are purchased. Already exclusiv carrier of letters, exclusiv transmitter of telegrams, and on the way to become exclusiv carrier of parcels, the state will not only be exclusiv carrier of passengers, goods, and minerals, but will add to its present various trades, many other trades. Even now, besides erecting its naval and military establishments, and building harbors, docks, breakwaters, etc., it does the work of ship-builder, cannon-founder, small-arms maker, manufacturer of ammunition, etc., etc.; and when the railroads hav been appropriated "with or without compensation,' as the Democratic Federationists say, it will hav to become locomotiv engin builder, carriage-maker, tarpaulin and grease manufacturer, passenger vessel owner, coal-miner, stone-quarrier, omnibus-proprietor, etc. Meanwhile its local lieutenants, the municipal governments, already in many places suppliers of water, gas-makers, owners and workers of tramways, proprietors of baths, will doubtless hav undertaken various other businesses. And when the state, directly or by proxy, has thus come into possession of, or has established numerous concerns for wholesale production, and for wholesale distribution, there will be good precedents for extending its function to retail distribution, following such an example, say, as is offered by the French government, which has long been a retail tobacconist.

Evidently then, the changes made, the changes in progress, and the changes urged, are carrying us not only toward state-ownership of land and dwellings, and means of communication, all to be administered and worked by state agents, but toward state usurpation of all industries; the private forms of which, disadvantaged more and more in competition with the state, which can arrange everything for its own convenience, will more and more die away, just as many voluntary schools hav in presence of board-schools. And so will be brought about the desired ideal of the Socialist.

And now when there has been reached this desired ideal, which "practical" politicians are helping Socialists to reach, and which is so tempting on that bright side which Socialists contemplate, what must be the accompanying shady side which they do not contemplate? It is a matter of common remark, often made when a marriage is impending, that those possessed by strong hopes habitually dwell on the promised pleasures, and think nothing of the accompanying pains. A further exemplification of this truth is supplied by these political enthusiasts and fanatical revolutionists. Impressed with the miseries existing under our present social arrangements, and not regarding these miseries as caused by the ill-working of a human nature but partially adapted to the social state, they imagin them to be forthwith curable by this or that rearrangement. Yet, even did their plans succeed, it could only be by substituting one kind of evil for another. A little deliberate thought would show that under their proposed arrangements their liberties must be surrendered in proportion as their material welfares were cared for.

For no form of co-operation, small or great, can be carried on without regulation and an implied submission to the regulating agencies. Even one of their own organizations for effecting social changes yields them proof. It is compelled to hav its councils, its local and general officers, its authoritativ leaders, who must be obeyed under penalty of confusion and failure. And the experience of those who are loudest in their advocacy of a new social order under the paternal control of a government shows that, even in private voluntarily formed societies, the power of the regulativ organization becomes great, if not irresistible; often, indeed, causing grumbling and restivness among those controlled. Trades-unions which carry on a kind of industrial war in defense of workers' interests versus employers' interests find that subordination almost military in its strictness is needful to secure efficient action, for divided councils prove fatal to success. And even in bodies of co-operators, formed for carrying on manufacturing or distributing businesses, and not needing that obedience to leaders which is required where the aims are offensiv or defensiv, it is still found that the administrativ agency acquires so great a power that there arise complaints about "the tyranny of organization." Judge, then, what must happen when, instead of combinations, small, local, and voluntary, to which men may belong or not as they please, we hav a national combination in which each citizen finds himself incorporated, and from which he cannot separate himself without leaving the country! Judge what must under such conditions become the power of a graduated and centralized officialism, holding in its hands the resources of the community, and having behind it whatever amount of force it finds requisit to carry out its decrees and maintain what it calls order! Well may a Prince Bismarck display leanings towards state Socialism.

. . . . . .

"But the governing agency would be a master which he and others made and kept constantly in check, and one which therefore would not control him or others more than was needful for the benefit of each and all."

To which reply the first rejoinder is that, even if so, each member of the community as an individual would be a slave to the community as a whole. Such a relation has habitually existed in militant communities, even under quasi-popular forms of government. In ancient Greece the accepted principle was that the citizen belonged neither to himself nor to his family, but belonged to his city—the city being with the Greek equivalent to the community. And this doctrin, proper to a state of constant warfare, is a doctrin which Socialism unawares reintroduces into a state intended to be purely industrial. The services of each will belong to the aggregate of all; and for these services such returns will be given as the authorities think proper. So that even if the administration is of the beneficent kind intended to be secured, slavery, however mild, must be the outcome of the arrangement.

A second rejoinder is that the administration will presently become not of the intended kind, and that the slavery will not be mild. The Socialist speculation is vitiated by an assumption like that which vitiates the speculations of the "practical" politician. It is assumed that officialism will work as it is intended to work, which it never does. The machinery of Communism, like existing social machinery, has to be framed out of existing human nature; and the defects of existing human nature will generate in the one the same evils as in the other. The love of power, the selfishness, the injustice, the untruthfulness, which often in comparativly short times bring private organizations to disaster, will inevitably, where their effects accumulate from generation to generation, work evils far greater and less remediable; since vast and complex and possessed of all the resources, the administrativ organization once developed and consolidated must become irresistible. And if there needs proof that the periodic exercise of electoral power would fail to prevent this, it suffices to instance the French government, which, purely popular in origin, and subject from time to time to popular judgment, nevertheless tramples on the freedom of citizens to an extent which the English delegates to the late Trades-Union Congress say "is a disgrace to, and an anomaly in, a republican nation."

The final result would be a revival of despotism. A disciplined army of civil officials, like an army of military officials, givs supreme power to its head—a power which has often led to usurpation, as in medieval Europe and still more in Japan—nay, has thus so led among our neighbors within our own times. The recent confessions of M. de Maupas hav shown how readily a constitutional head, elected and trusted by the whole people, may, with the aid of a few unscrupulous confederates, paralyze the representativ body and make himself autocrat. That those who rose to power in a socialistic organization would not scruple to carry out their aims at all costs, we hav good reason for concluding. When we find that shareholders, who, sometimes gaining, but often losing, hav made that railway system by which national prosperity has been so greatly increased, are spoken of by the council of the Democratic Federation as having "laid hands" on the means of communication, we may infer that those who directed a socialistic administration might interpret with extreme perversity the claims of individuals and classes under their control. And when, further, we find members of this same council urging that the state should take possession of the railways, "with or without compensation," we may suspect that the heads of the ideal society desired would be but little deterred by considerations of equity from pursuing whatever policy they thought needful—a policy which would always be one identified with their own supremacy. It would need but a war with an adjacent society, or some internal discontent demanding forcible suppression, to at once transform a socialistic administration into a grinding tyranny like that of ancient Peru; under which the mass of the people, controled by grades of officials, and leading lives that were inspected out-of-doors and in-doors, labored for the support of the organization which regulated them, and were left with but a bare subsistence for themselvs. And then would be completely revived, under a different form, that regime of status—that system of compulsory co-operation, the decaying tradition of which is represented by the old Toryism, and toward which the new Toryism is carrying us back.

"But we shall be on our guard against all that—we shall take precautions to ward off such disasters," will doubtless say the enthusiasts. Be they "practical" politicians with their new regulativ measures, or Communists with their schemes for reorganizing labor, the answer is ever the same: "It is true that plans of kindred nature hav, from unforeseen causes and adverse accidents, or the misdeeds of those concerned, been brought to failure; but this time we shall profit by past experiences and succeed." There seems no getting people to accept the truth, which, nevertheless, is conspicuous enough, that the welfare of a society and the justice of its arrangements are at bottom dependent on the characters of its members; and that improvement in neither can take place without that improvement in character which results from carrying on peaceful industry under the restraints imposed by an orderly social life. The belief, not only of the Socialists but also of those so-called Liberals who are diligently preparing the way for them, is that by due skill an ill-working humanity may be framed into well-working institutions. It is a delusion. The defectiv natures of citizens will show themselvs in the bad acting of whatever social structure they are arranged into. There is no political alchemy by which you can get golden conduct out of leaden instincts.

A WESTERN CRITICISM.

From the Chicago Inter-Ocean.

Herbert Spencer has an article in the current (April) Popular Science Monthly, in which he defines "The Coming Slavery" to be Socialism. He thinks most of the poor are undeserving, that the poor-rates in England tend chiefly to breed paupers, and that it is a very serious interference with sound social laws not to let the starving starve. It would be well for Herbert Spencer to call to mind the fact that a few years ago his friend Prof. Youmans made a partial tour of the United States, on purpose to pass around the hat for the collection of a fund to relieve Herbert Spencer from a condition of impecuniosity, which was represented to be unfavorable both to his personal comfort, and to the publication of certain portions of his work which were not selling for enough to pay the cost of publication. We believe the mission resulted in the presentation to Mr. Spencer of a voluntary offering of $5,000. In this connection it may be remarked as a coincidence that the other great apostle of the "let-the-beggars-alone-and-the-devil-take-the-hindmost" theory, Mr. Cobden, had a collection taken up in his behalf of £80,000, to lift him out of bankruptcy. Also that Prof. Sumner, who has just issued a book to prove that the social classes owe nothing to each other but indifference, is currently believed to participate in the exemption of Yale College from state and city taxes in a manner to make him the recipient in some degree of the forced contributions of all the people of the state. We do not intimate that either of these contributions in the nature of parochial relief to the impecunious is or was wrong. It is in questionable taste, however, for a charity scholar, in his graduating oration, to denounce charity scholarships.

Indeed, so many are the ways in which society endeavors to help the unfortunates, however imperfectly it may succeed in doing real good, that there are few who hav not during considerable periods of their lives derived their sustenance from others. Gentlemen who, like Cobden, Spencer, and Sumner, hold that such an act is admissible only on the part of infants, should not grasp the teat so firmly when it is extended to them by society, which in this case deserves at least the respect due to a generous stepmother.

The Liberal Club.

At the 335th meeting of the Manhattan Liberal Club a fine large audience gathered to listen to Mr. Andrews's criticism of Herbert Spencer's article, "The Coming Slavery." The principal part of that article will be found in THE TRUTH SEEKER this week. Mr. Wakeman was in the chair. Mr. Shook came in a little late, and sat on a campstool beside Dr. Lambert, his face beaming with that effulgence which shows itself on the countenance of him who is inwardly satisfied with himself and has a proper appreciation of his own merits. Mr. Andrews was applauded when he took the platform. The secretary had furnished him with a tall and glittering brass lamp to read by, the brightness of which evoked favorable criticism. Mr. Andrews's lecture is regarded as a very thorough answer to the objections to state Socialism raised by Mr. Spencer. As it is to be published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, it is unnecessary to say more of it here except to remark that this was one of the speaker's most lucid occasions. Once in a while, to be sure, a word that exhausted the capacities of the alphabet would slip out and twist the point off the stenographer's pencil, but these occasions were so rare as to hardly warrant even this brief and inadequate allusion to them. Mr. Andrews is capable of meeting Mr. Spencer on his own ground, and can bring to a discussion of any subject in philosophy a degree of learning and an amount of thought in no wise inferior to that of the distinguished English philosopher himself.

Mr. Langerfeld was the first to venture upon the platform after the speaker of the evening had left it. He spoke in a very uncomplimentary way of the lecture, and claimed that it had not cleared the matter up as should hav been done. He would therefore proceed to supply that deficiency. State Socialism, economic basis, etc., are Mr. Langerfeld's weapons, and he wields them with more or less effect. His theory is that if property were held in common there would be no stealing, because the incentiv to steal would be absent.

Mr. Palmer said that the article by Herbert Spencer in the Popular Science Monthly was a disappointment to his friends. It was not what they expected from so eminent a writer. One of Mr. Spencer's best friends in this country had so expressed himself to Mr. Palmer. The speaker believed that the suffering of the poorer classes was the fault of the present system, which system we had it in our power to ameliorate. Mr. Andrews's lecture had been a thorough and remarkable reply to the misrepresentations of Herbert Spencer.

Mr. Cohen held that our present political system was wrong and that our legisiators had no reason to wish it righted, because it was a source of profit to them, and the more mischief the people did the better for the legislators. But he believed in compelling people to do right if they did not show a disposition to do so without legislativ encouragement. Our Congressmen were not fit to associate with decent people.

Professor Vaughan, of Virginia, mounted the platform with the declaration that he had something to say. He had spent his life laboring in the interests of Communism, and, impliedly, of Freelove. Otherwise honors would hav been showered upon him, and there was hardly a position which wealth and the gratitude of a great public would not hav bestowed upon him. As it was, he was poorer than Job's turkey and had to scratch with all his might to get enough to eat. If he were to answer to the law for all the offenses he had committed against it, a term of 976 years and 9 months would be necessary, besides a fine of several million dollars.

Dr. Lambert began by saying that one speaker had asked why we did not build post-offices and other public structures. He would reply, Because we do not get the contract. He had no objection to associating with Congressmen or other public officials. If we could not love them for their personal attractions we should respect them for the position to which they had been raised by the people. A great cause of misery was to be found, Dr. Lambert thought, in the manufacture and sale of liquor and tobacco. While these industries engaged half our labor and money we need not expect anything better than the evils we now enjoy.

Mr. Andrews, in his closing speech, said that almost nothing had been said which required special comment. He therefore proceeded to a further elaboration of his objections to Mr. Spencer's article under criticism. His remarks were, if possible, more direct and interesting than what he had previously said. When the lecture appears in print it must be apparent to all that these were among the most timely and important utterances of the day.

Professor Rawson will speak at the next meeting on questions relating to Biblical research.

E. B Thompson and Dr. W. Byrd Powell.

I notice in THE TRUTH SEEKER of April 5th that Mr. C. B. Thompson, of St. Catherines, is making inquiry as to the labors of Dr. Wm. Byrd Powell in the department of temperaments and the result thereof. If you can spare a little space in THE TRUTH SEEKER I think I can giv Mr. Thompson the desired information. I shall not undertake to giv exact dates in many matters, as it would require more time than I can spare at this moment.

The great work of Dr. Powell's life was unfortunately destroyed by fire. It was in manuscript, and was nearly ready for publication when he was stricken with paralysis. His negro servant, in his haste to build a fire for making some preparations for the treatment of the patient, gathered up these manuscripts and consigned them to the flames! After recovering from this first attack, the doctor prepared a small work of two hundred and forty-six pages, octavo, entitled "The Natural History of the Human Temperaments, and their Laws in Relation to Marriage." This book was published by H. W. Derby & Co., Cincinnati, Ohio, and bears the date of 1856. Although a valuable work in many respects, I was informed by the late Dr. Robert. S. Newton, who had an opportunity of looking over the manuscripts of the larger work, that it was quite inferior to that. The paralytic stroke left Dr. Powell in a condition to do little laborious literary work. In 1863 the New American Cyclopedia was issued by the Appletons, and that contained a valuable contribution from Dr. Powell on the temperaments. The later issues of the American Cyclopedia for some reason contained nothing in regard to Dr. Powell's discoveries. Most of the contributors to this work of the Appletons, I notice, are strongly old school. Dr. Powell was a new school man, and was identified with the eclectic medical movement in this country. It may be, therefore, that he was ruled out by old school bigotry. In the transactions of the Eclectic Medical Society of the City of New York for 1870, a large volume of some eight hundred and sixty-four pages, there is an interesting essay by W. Byrd Powell, M.D., on Marriage and its relation to Physiological Law, in which he treats quite extensivly of the temperaments. The late Prof. Robert S. Newton was not only a warm personal friend of Dr. Powell, but was a thorough believer in his original views regarding the temperaments. And every winter, from the time of the establishment of the New York Eclectic Medical College up to the death of Prof. Newton, some three years ago, the pupils of that institution were instructed in the science of temperament in accordance with the views advocated by Dr. Powell. In 1869–70 I made a revision of my "Medical Common Sense," which I entitled "Plain Home Talk, Embracing Medical Common Sense," and in this revision of my work I adopted Dr. Byrd Powell's classification and views of the temperaments, and devoted about thirty pages to the consideration of the subject. As this work has already sold to the extent of some two or three hundred thousand copies in this country, England, Germany, and far-off Australia, there are many people scattered throughout the world who hav been made more or less conversant with Dr. Powell's views. In the fall of 1880, when the first convention of the Institute of Heredity was held in this city, Dr. E. V. Wright, of Boston, gave an interesting address upon the importance of observing the laws of temperamental adaptation in marriage, and based the rules which he gave upon the discoveries of Dr. Powell. For the last three winters there hav been held in this city parlor meetings of the patrons and members of the Institute of Heredity, and the subject of the temperaments was presented during the first winter that these meetings were held, and at the next meeting, to be held on the last Thursday evening in April, the views of Dr. Powell will be further presented, according to announcement, by one of the speakers. It will be seen, therefore, that the valuable discoveries of Dr. Powell hav not been lost to the world, but that they are steadily taking root in various fields of inquiry, and may be expected to bear good fruit in due time. Our London Letter.

The enemies of liberty flattered themselvs that they had great cause for rejoicing when Charles Bradlaugh applied for the stewardship of the Chiltern Hundreds, as they declared themselvs certain that his popularity was decidedly on the wane, and the electors of Northampton must be tired out; but because they shut their eyes they thought it must be dark to others as well as themselvs. Great, however, was their consternation when the champion of the rights of man was once more returned by an overwhelming majority, and his enemies were brought to shame.

But though they could not prevent his re-election, they could prevent him from taking his seat, and this they of course did. Their victory was largely due to the weakness and vacillation of the present so-called government, for which there will come a day of reckoning at the next general election, in which the question of Freethought will be brought conspicuously forward. The system of persecution persevered in during the last few years has added some thousands of recruits to our ranks, and more are constantly coming in. Though hard for the individual, it has done good for the cause. The imprisonment of those connected with the Freethinker has made a very considerable impression upon many to whom the word "Atheist" was formerly scarcely known, and allusions hav from time to time been made in the daily papers to the matter, and the release of Mr. Foote was noticed by most of them. The so-called leaders of public thought find that Atheism, as it is termed, has assumed such proportions that it can no longer be justly ignored as a thing of no moment, and its rapid growth is becoming more alarming to the salaried apostles of Jesus. Many of them, shrewd enough to read the signs of the times, are carefully trimming their sails to the breeze and following as closely behind as they dare—educating their congregations, they call it—but the fact of the matter is that while they must pander to the prejudices of the older members of their flocks, they wish to retain the younger ones, so manage skilfully to sandwich a slice of Freethought between two of orthodoxy, so as to make the mental pabulum palatable to all their members. This certainly shows worldly wisdom, but the least said about its honesty the better. Nowadays it is quiet refreshing to find an old-fashioned divine who firmly believes in the beasts and elders, the new Jerusalem, the millennium, a heaven built of gold and precious stones, and hell fire, and who hurls so much damnation on unbelievers that his church smells quite strong of brimstone. The parson who a few days back refused to bury a man because the grave was dug so that his feet did not face the east, and would cause him some difficulty in rising properly at the day of resurrection, was far more honest and deserving of patronage than those who are willing to concede that the world was not made in six days, and the deluge was not universal, and that the miracles were not just as recorded, and hell fire is not quite so hot as it once was, and people are not bound to stop in it long. Such men are not to be trusted, either by one party or the other, for if they saw an opportunity of making their salaries by lecturing on our side, they would very willingly do it. Last week I listened to a discourse given in one of our halls by an accredited agent of the Christian Evidence Society. He is reckoned one of the ablest men amongst them, "a champion for the truth." Poor man! he endeavored to prove that the Bible miracles must be true, and such a string of illogical arguments and hopeless conclusions I never listened to. All he said could be summed up in a few words. If one miracle could be proved true, it must be taken for granted that all were equally so, and as the Jews still keep up the feast of the Passover, that is sufficient proof that the slaughter of the first-born among the Egyptians took place at the exodus. Consequently all Bible miracles are true, and if the miracles are true, so must the whole of the Bible be. Two or three workingmen opposed and demolished his arguments in a few moments. As it is so many years since I attended a church I had well-nigh forgotten what the parsons talked about, but after hearing a grand effort put forth by one of the champions of the faith I don't think I hav lost much by my absence. If a grand effort, carefully prepared to convert intelligent thinkers, is composed of such poor materials, and amounts to nothing more than a house of cards, easily puffed down by the slightest breath, what must be the ordinary discourse delivered Sunday by Sunday to the believers? To Correspondents.

Lyman Smith.—The Iconoclast has suspended.

The individual who sent us the Dominion Oddfellow, with the query, "True or false?" over the article on "Buddhism in Relation to Christianity," is respectfully referred to The Truth Seeker of April 5th, page 216.

D. B. Scofield, of Baker City, Oregon, has our thanks for a long list of trial subscribers and renewals. The circulation of papers is the best way in the world to spread Liberalism. We hope we may continue to deserve Mr. Scofield's kindness; and also that all the "trials" will become permanent subscribers.

W. A. D. Hume asks, "If a man cannot be, philosophically speaking, a free agent, how can he be, philosophically speaking, a free thinker?" To which we would say that, philosophically speaking, there is no such thing as a free thinker. All men must think as circumstances and their environment force them to; and their conclusions must be those which to them are supported by the strongest evidence. Innumerable things go to the making up of a man's mind—education, hereditary influences, transient occurrences, etc., etc. Everything in the universe is governed by law. There are no "accidents," and no "free agency."

D. R. Fruit.—Mr. Bennett had very good authority for giving two hundred and fifteen years as the length of the sojourn of the children of Israel in Egypt. It is true that Exodus xii, 40, says that "now the sojourning of the children of Israel, who dwelt in Canaan, was four hundred and thirty years," but this does not support your Christian friend, for it does not state that all the "sojourning" was done in Egypt. And other versions—the Vatican copy, the Alexandrian version, and the Samaritan—say the sojourning was done in Egypt and the land of Canaan. St. Paul says that the time from the making of the promis to Abraham to the giving of the law was four hundred and thirty years. From the making of the promis to the going down into Egypt of the seventy souls was two hundred and fifteen years, according to the generations given. Subtracting these two hundred and fifteen years from four hundred and thirty years leaves two hundred and fifteen years as the period the Jews stayed in Egypt. This is also in accordance with the dates assigned in the marginal notes by the Bible compilers. God told Jacob to go down into Egypt, and said he would go with him. The account of this is given in Genesis xlvi, and the date assigned is 1706 B.C. After they got there the Egyptians oppressed them sorely, but the Jews stood it till Moses was born, and then he headed a rebellion. God told them, through Moses, to borrow all the Egyptians' jewelry—a command they obeyed with wonderful alacrity, and a scrupulous fidelity to details, adding, on their own hook, the old clothes of the Egyptians—and then get out of Egypt between two days. This the Jews did. The date of this confiscation and flight is assigned to 1491 B.C. Therefore the time they sojourned in Egypt can be stated with exactness, or else the Bible is untrue:

Time Jacob went into Egypt	1706 B.C.
Time Moses and crowd left Egypt	1491
Number of years they remained in Egypt . .	215

Josephus, the Jewish historian, givs this period, and he is sustained at the present day by the best biblical scholars. Of course all these dates are taken from the Bible itself, and are true if it is true, and false if it is false. If the Jews went into Egypt at all, they "sojourned" this length of time.

Literature.

Mrs. Josephine R. Cables has begun the publication of a little four-page monthly devoted to the theosophical philosophy. Its name is The Occult Word, published at 40 Ambrose street, Rochester, N. Y.

Of Putnam's "Problem of The Universe," A. E. Giles, the distinguished Spiritualist philosopher says: "I do not remember to hav seen a better presentation of the Materialist position. It is valuable both to those who agree and those who disagree with the author." Says the famous octogenarian LaRoy Sunderland, "The solution is sweet and good—good for humanity and inspiring to the soul."

Canon Curteis's article on "Christian Agnosticism," which will appear in the Popular Science Monthly for May, is a reply to Herbert Spencer's recent paper on "Religious Retrospect and Prospect." Though declining to regard the "Great Unknown" as simply an Everlasting Force, he givs Mr. Spencer credit for pruning away many excrescences from the idea of God, and maintains that the attitude of the early Christian fathers differed little from what is now know as Agnosticism—a position he will hav much difficulty in holding.
